Where there has been a voluntary assignment for the benefit of the creditors, a partial payment of the debt by the assignee does not take the case out of the statute, since the act of the assignee in paying a portion of the debt is beyond the control of the assignor, who cannot accompany the payment with a qualification or disclaimer as when made by himself.

Pickett v. Leonard, 34 N. Y. 175.

So it has also been held, and for the same reason, that a partial payment by an administrator or executor is not sufficient to revive a demand against the estate.

36 N. Y. 88.

So a payment by an administratrix, out of the assets of the estate, under a decree made by a surrogate, does not amount in law to a promise to pay the balance so as to deprive her of the benefit of the statute.

Arnold v. Downing, 11 Barb. 554.

The payment by the assignee of an insolvent, upon a note, under the direction of the insolvent debtors' court was held insufficient to take a case out of the Statute of Limitations as against the insolvent or the other makers of the note.

Davies v. Edwards, 6 Eng. Law & Eq. 520.

II. Where parties in interest testify to a series of personal conversations and transactions with the opposite party, making out their alleged claim, and such opposite party fails to produce the evidence directly within his power to explain or contradict the testimony adduced against him, it is not error to refuse to submit to the jury the question of fact established by the testimony.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If we assume that the learned trial judge correctly decided that the plaintiffs' evidence was sufficient to establish the contract pleaded beyond any necessity for submitting that question to the jury, because there was no direct contradiction of the witnesses; and the circumstances tending to raise doubt or suspicion were more than balanced by the silence of the defendant who might have made an effectual denial (an assumption not above criticism, and as to which we do not all agree), there yet remains a material question which, if not decided in favor of the defendant, should at least have been submitted to the jury.

The Statute of Limitations was pleaded as a defense, and confessedly barred the right of recovery, unless the debt was revived by a payment upon it. So far as such payment is sought to be deduced from the collection by plaintiffs of the sums obtained from John O. S. Lynch, through the pressure of an examination and an order of the court, it is quite clear that the effort must fail. The efficacy of a payment to avert the effect of the statute as a bar resides in the conscious and voluntary act of a debtor, explainable only as a recognition and confession of the existing liability.

But here there was no act of the defendant. He paid nothing to the plaintiffs. The man who did pay was not his agent, or acting or authorized to act in his behalf. The payment which he made was on his own debt to plaintiffs, and not on defendant's contract with them. The very existence of that contract was unknown to him, and the fact of his payments unknown to defendant until after they were made. The debtor paying did so by compulsion, and not in obedience to any direction or request of the defendant. The money paid never belonged to the latter, but passed from the ownership of John O. S. Lynch to that of the plaintiff. Its transfer was in no respect the act of the defendant, and could serve to indicate no purpose or intention of his. One must go outside of the act and busy himself with spoken words and debatable inferences, changing its inherent and obvious character before it can be connected with the defendant; and then it amounts only to a direction that plaintiffs should collect from their debtor a sum due to them and, when that remedy was exhausted, a promise that the defendant would take the security and pay the balance remaining. If those payments operated to reduce the defendant's liability it was not through any act or agency of his, and their existence indicates absolutely nothing as a recognition or admission on his part. They were entirely consistent with a denial by him of any liability whatever and with an utter repudiation of the alleged contract. They might equally have been made if plaintiffs had held the claim in their own right, having no recourse against the defendant, and so open to a complete explanation, in no manner dependent upon any purpose or intention of his. We should infringe a very wise and valuable rule of evidence if we gave to the act of John O. S. Lynch a constructive effect amounting to recognition of a contract by the defendant, the existence of which he could, nevertheless, consistently dispute.

The other payment relied upon was that of $1,800 in exchange for which the plaintiffs executed and delivered to the defendant an assignment of one half of the Slattery mortgage. The consideration for this payment was expressed in writing by the parties concerned, and the terms of that instrument so far from purporting a payment upon the contract pleaded, are on their face and without explanation inconsistent with the existence of that contract. The writing expresses that the payment was made upon a contract of purchase, and in full discharge of that contract. It not only fails to admit that something more might be due or become due, but negatives any such inference. It speaks of the mortgage as being the property of the plaintiffs, and involves the concession that only one half of it became the property of the defendant, and that by a purchase then and there made. Stopping with the written paper, the conclusion is irresistible that the $1,800 was paid upon a contract of purchase made at its date, and not upon a broader one already existing.

But the plaintiffs offer an explanation: having proved a previous agreement, by the terms of which they were to obtain the mortgage for defendant, and hold and enforce the legal title for his benefit, looking to him for direction and for the reimbursement of their unpaid advances, they further testify that the $1,800 was one half of the $3,600 which that contract called for; and that after such payment they demanded of defendant the balance remaining due, which he promised to pay. They then argue that the assignment made was a transfer of the legal title pro tanto for the protection of the defendant, and that both the assignment and the payment made were consistent with the contract of agency alleged, and were steps in furtherance and in execution of that principal contract. By that process they seek to show that the payment of $1,800 was made and accepted upon the contract pleaded.

The question is not without its difficulties. It cannot be decided in favor of plaintiffs as a pure question of law. The most that they can reasonably claim is that it raised a question of fact, or a mixed question of law and fact. Adhering to the assumption upon which our reasoning has been founded, that the contract of agency was proved beyond contradiction and to be taken as a conceded fact, we have a case in which two contracts have been proved, upon either of which the $1,800 might have been intended to apply and upon one or both of which it must have been applied. The writing indicates one application; the conversations another.

It does not solve this difficulty to say that the assignment was but an incident in the execution of the principal contract, for the defendant may have intended not to recognize or admit it by a payment upon it, and for that very reason have made a special contract of purchase upon which alone his money should be applied and which only he would recognize. The facts proved admit of conflicting inferences; and it seems to us, therefore, that the question (whether the payment made in form upon the contract of purchase was also made and accepted upon the contract of agency within the intent of the parties) was a question which, under proper directions from the court, should have been submitted to the jury.

The defendant asked to go to the jury upon all the evidence in the case as to such matters as the court should direct; but the request was refused, the court holding that there were no questions of fact and directing a verdict for plaintiffs. To this there was an exception which we think points out error.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

1. Held, in an action of replevin for chattels claimed under a mortgage which had not been accompanied with an immediate change of possession, that sufficient evidence of good faith on the part of the mortgagee (plaintiff) was given, to take the case to the jury under a charge which correctly stated that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the mortgage debt was just and that the mortgage was made in good faith and without any intent to defraud; a nonsuit was therefore properly refused.
2. Where notice to the mortgagee of sales of the mortgaged chattels by the mortgagor and of the appropriation of the proceeds by the mortgagor on his own account is only evidence from which a previous agreement to permit such sales and appropriation may be inferred, it is not ground for an absolute direction to the jury to find for the defendant in such case.

APPEAL from the judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term, on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action for the alleged wrongful seizure of goods. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Matthew Hale, for appellant:

There can be no question as to the fraudulent intent of the mortgagors. The intention was to keep the business from interruption, and levy on the judgment obtained by Sutherland.

Plaintiff was not a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration. The mortgage was given in renewal of a former mortgage and to secure an antecedent indebtedness.

The plaintiff had notice of the fraudulent intent of the mortgagors, and is therefore not protected by the statute.

The knowledge of the president of the bank acquired in the course of the transaction is the knowledge of the bank.

Holden v. N. Y. & Erie Bank, 72 N. Y. 286, 293, 294; Getman v. Second Nat. Bank, 23 Hun, 498.

The mortgage, not having been accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, is to be presumed to be fraudulent as against creditors; and the fact that there was no such change of possession is conclusive evidence of fraud, unless it was made to appear on the part of the plaintiff, that it was made in good faith, and without any intent to defraud such creditors.

2 R. S. § 5.

The uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that there was an arrangement between the parties to the mortgage, which permitted the mortgagors to remain in possession and to sell the mortgaged property, and use the proceeds for their own benefit.

Proof that a mortgage was given to secure a debt actually owing by the mortgagor does not, as matter of law, disprove the existence of a fraudulent intent on the part of the debtor.

Billings v. Russell, 101 N. Y. 226; reversing S. C. in 31 Hun, 65.

The court erred in excluding evidence of the knowledge, by the executive officers of the plaintiff, of the fraudulent intent of the mortgagors.

The court erred in excluding evidence that the mortgage in question was never intended to be enforced, and that the first chattel mortgage was fraudulent.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 467, 468; Kaufman v. Schoeffel, 37 Hun, 140, 143, 144.

The proposition of the plaintiff that, having taken possession of the goods, before the levy under the execution by defendant, it is immaterial whether there was fraud originally in the mortgage or not, is untenable. Precisely the contrary has been repeatedly held by the courts of this and other States and of the United States.

Mr. John G. Milburn, for respondent:

The court charged the jury that if the mortgage was not executed for the sole purpose of securing the plaintiff's debt, but was executed with the view and purpose of defrauding the creditors of Woodruff & Co., it was void. It also charged that if there was any such arrangement or understanding as the defendant claimed, with respect to the sale of the stock by the mortgagors, it made the mortgage void and the plaintiff could not recover.

The charge of the court was a correct presentation of the law bearing on the case.

Brackett v. Harvey, 91 N. Y. 214; Frost v. Warren, 42 N. Y. 204; Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 123; Conkling v. Shelley, 28 N. Y. 360; Potts v. Hart, 99 N. Y. 168.

There was no direct proof that the intention of the mortgage was to defraud creditors, or of an agreement that the mortgagors could go on and dispose of the property as their own. All parties disclaimed any fraudulent intention. Thus the existence of such an intention or agreement was purely a matter of inference from the other facts and evidence in the case; and it was the province of the jury to weigh those facts and draw the inference which they warranted.

It was not error to refuse to charge that "The possession of the Bank by Richardson is not such possession by the Bank as to remove the case from under the statute," the refusal of the charge being a refusal to charge otherwise than had been charged.

Stephen, Dig. Law of Ev. Chase's ed. pp. 126, 127; Whart. Ev. § 508 and cases there cited.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought against Harry H. Koch, in his lifetime, as Sheriff of Erie County. He having died after judgment, it was continued against the present defendant as his administratrix.

The cause of action was the taking and conversion by the sheriff of certain personal property which was claimed by the plaintiff by virtue of a chattel mortgage made to it by Lauren C. Woodruff and Alfred B. Benedict, composing the firm of L. C. Woodruff & Co., of the City of Buffalo, to secure certain partnership liabilities of the firm.

The mortgage covered the stock in trade and other chattels of the firm, and was dated the 30th of October, 1884, and duly filed the same day.

The mortgagee took actual possession of the mortgaged property on the 26th of November, 1884, and continued in possession down to the 26th of December, 1884, when it was levied upon and taken from its possession by the sheriff, who justified the taking under two executions issued on the 19th of December, 1884, upon judgments recovered the same day against said firm of L. C. Woodruff & Co., and alleged that the chattel mortgage under which the plaintiff claimed title was not made in good faith, and was in fraud of the creditors of L. C. Woodruff & Co., the mortgagors.

On the trial the question of fraud was submitted to the jury and they found in favor of the plaintiff, who had judgment on the verdict. That judgment was affirmed by the general term, and the defendant now appeals to this court. As no opinion was rendered in the court below we must state our reasons for affirming its judgment.

The first point urged on the part of the appellant is that the trial court erred in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff. The ground upon which a nonsuit was claimed was, in substance, that the uncontroverted evidence established that the mortgage was fraudulent as against creditors. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff showed that at the time the mortgage was given, October 30, 1884, there was a valid indebtedness on the part of the mortgagors as copartners, to the plaintiff, to an amount exceeding the value of the property mortgaged; and the president of the plaintiff testified that the mortgage was given to secure then existing indebtedness and any that might afterwards arise.

The indebtedness in question arose out of dealings of the firm of L. C. Woodruff & Co., with the plaintiff, which had continued for several years before the giving of the mortgage; and it appeared in evidence that in the spring of 1884 the plaintiff had required security from the firm and they had given it a similar mortgage, but that after the giving of that mortgage the firm had continued in possession of the mortgaged property, and had carried on its business, in the course of which it had sold a large part of the mortgaged stock, and had replaced it by new purchases, which were not covered by the mortgage, and that the mortgage of October 30, 1884, was given with the view of covering such after acquired property.

During the running of the first mortgage and before the giving of the second the plaintiff had made an arrangement with Mr. Richardson, the bookkeeper of L. C. Woodruff & Co., for an agreed compensation, to look after the interests of the plaintiff as mortgagee, but no actual possession was taken by or on behalf of the mortgagee until about a month after the giving of the second mortgage, viz: November 26, 1884, when, the mortgage debt having become due, the plaintiff put a deputy sheriff in charge of the property. An arrangement was then made allowing sales of the mortgaged stock, the proceeds to be paid over to the plaintiff as mortgagee and applied on the mortgage, and afterward; and before the levy by the sheriff the plaintiff, as mortgagee, gave public notice of the sale of the property under the mortgage.

It was claimed on the part of the defendant that the mortgage given in the spring of 1884 was not intended as a security to the plaintiff, but for the purpose of protecting the property against the claims of the creditors of the mortgagors and enabling them to continue their business for their own benefit; that it was agreed that the mortgagors might make sales for their own benefit, and that the mortgage of October 30, 1884, was a mere renewal or continuation of the previous mortgage.

All these points were controverted by testimony on the part of the plaintiff, and presented questions of fact for the jury. The only evidence of actual intent to defraud creditors was to the effect that Lauren C. Woodruff, one of the mortgagors, was indebted on some individual transactions of his own; that L. C. Woodruff & Co. were apprehensive that these individual creditors of Woodruff might interfere with the property of the firm, and that one object of giving the mortgage to the plaintiff was to protect the firm property against these individual creditors; and there was some evidence to the effect that the plaintiff was aware of these facts.

But, on the other hand, the evidence was that the mortgage was demanded by the plaintiff by direction of a committee of its directors, because it had ascertained that a portion of the mortgaged property had been sold, and it required a new security for the indebtedness to it. Even if it did know that the property of the firm was liable to be interfered with by individual creditors of Woodruff, it had a right to demand that it should be secured, so as to have a preference over such individual creditors; and securing such a preference was not a fraud.

All these questions were properly submitted to the jury as questions of fact. The court charged the jury that it was for them to say whether the second mortgage was given for the purpose of securing the defendant to the plaintiff and nothing else; that if given with the view of defrauding the creditors of L. C. Woodruff & Co., it was fraudulent as matter of law.

The allegation that permission was given to the mortgagors to sell the mortgaged property was denied on the part of the plaintiff, and neither of the mortgagors testified to any arrangement or understanding allowing such sales. It does not distinctly appear what sales, if any, of mortgaged property were made after October 30, 1884, and before November 26, or that the plaintiff had knowledge of them, for there was property in the store of L. C. Woodruff & Co. not covered by the mortgage. The court left the question to the jury, charging them that if they found that there was an agreement or understanding that the mortgagors might sell the mortgaged property and use the proceeds as they saw fit, it invalidated the mortgage.

We think the court committed no error in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff, and that the question was properly submitted to the jury.

Some exceptions were taken to the charge which are now insisted upon:

First, the court was requested to charge that "The possession of the Bank by Richardson was not such a possession by the Bank as to remove the case from under the statute."

The court refused to charge otherwise than it had already charged. Aside from any criticism of the form of this request, we think the charge asked for, although perhaps correct in substance as an abstract proposition, was quite unnecessary and irrelevant. It does not appear to have been claimed by the plaintiff that by means of the arrangement with Richardson the mortgage was accompanied by an immediate and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the mortgaged property, so as to prevent the application of the statutory presumption of fraud, arising from the want of such change of possession, or to relieve the plaintiff of the onus of establishing affirmatively the bona fides of the mortgage. On the contrary the cause was tried on the theory that the mortgage was not accompanied by an immediate change of possession. The plaintiff assumed the burden of proving its bona fides, and the court charged the jury that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that its debt was a just debt, and that the mortgage was made in good faith, and without any intent to defraud.

This charge gave to the defendant all the benefit which he could have derived from a charge in express terms that no such immediate and actual change of possession had been proved as was required by the statute to relieve the plaintiff from the presumption of fraud, or from the onus of affirmatively proving the good faith of the transaction. The arrangement with Richardson was one of the circumstances of the case which the jury were permitted to consider, not on the question of an actual change of possession, but on this question of good faith. The court had charged on that subject that it was for the jury to say whether the arrangement with Richardson, "if made, was made in good faith, and the intent was a change of possession and control, or on the other hand was a blind as it had been called by counsel."

This charge was not excepted to. The court had in no part of the charge instructed the jury, or even permitted them to find, that the arrangement with Richardson, whatever was its intent, was effectual to bring about the actual change of possession required by the statute, but left it to the jury to determine its intent only as bearing upon the question of good faith, and when requested to charge as an abstract proposition that it was not such a possession by the Bank as to remove the case from under the statute it did not negative that proposition but declined to charge further on the subject than had already been charged. In this refusal we find no error.

Second, the court was requested to charge that if the jury found that the plaintiff had an agent in the store of the mortgagors during the time the chattel mortgage was in existence, who knew the full facts of sales out of the mortgaged property, and that the mortgagors disposed of the proceeds of such sales for their own account, the jury should find for the defendant. The court declined so to charge, on the ground that the testimony did not warrant the statement of assumed facts. In this refusal we think the court was correct, as well for the reason assigned by it as for the further reason that the proposition applied to the first mortgage as well as to the second and no distinction was made.

Even if Richardson knew of sales during the running of the first mortgage and could be presumed to have assented to them, that would not be a conclusive defense to the plaintiff's claim under the second mortgage and thus authorize a charge that the jury must find for the defendant. No authority was shown to Richardson, in either case, to consent to sales by the mortgagors; nor does it clearly appear that he was cognizant of them, or of the application of the proceeds. But at all events even if the Bank, through Richardson, had notice of sales by the mortgagors and of the appropriation of the proceeds, such notice at the most was only evidence from which a previous agreement to permit such sales and appropriation might be inferred. It was not ground for a direction to the jury to find for the defendant. Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 126; Potts v. Hart, 99 N. Y. 168, 173.

Third, the same answer applies to the further request to the court to charge that if the jury found that Richardson was the agent of the plaintiff to look after the mortgaged stock, they must find that the plaintiff agreed to the sales made of the stock during the time.

These are all the exceptions to the charge which are insisted upon in the appellant's points in this court.

There are some exceptions to rulings upon questions of evidence; but we are of opinion that they present no point which requires a reversal of the judgment. Certain questions, relating to the intent or motives of the mortgagors in executing the first and second mortgages, were asked of the officers of the mortgagees and excluded. A party may be examined as to his own intentions and motives when a question of fraudulent intent on his part is in issue, but he cannot be permitted to testify as to the motives or intent of another party.

Exception was also taken, and is now insisted upon, to the exclusion of testimony of Lauren C. Woodruff, offered on his redirect examination, for the purpose of showing that the first mortgage was fraudulent.

Woodruff had been called as a witness by the defendant, and had been examined for the purpose of showing fraud in the second mortgage. He detailed the circumstances and the conversations which led to its execution, and was examined as to his intentions in giving it and as to his individual embarrassments. He was also examined on his direct examination with reference to the first mortgage, and stated that the second mortgage was given as a renewal of the first; that the president of the plaintiff claimed that a great part of the goods covered by the first mortgage had been sold and new goods had come in, and it had ceased to be a security, and requested that a new inventory be taken and a new mortgage executed, and that witness assented to the request.

On his cross examination on the part of the plaintiff the witness was not asked anything about the first mortgage, but only as to the second, and his motives for giving it. Being then recalled on the part of the defendant, Mr. Woodruff was asked whether the first mortgage was ever intended to be enforced. Objection being made to this question the defendant's counsel offered to prove that the first mortgage was fraudulent. The court refused to permit the proof to be made by the witness then on the stand, stating to counsel that that was part of his direct examination. We think this ruling was a proper exercise of the discretion of the court, and further that the question asked the witness was, in itself, improper, as he was not competent to testify to the intention of the plaintiff with respect to enforcing the mortgage. This, if material, must be shown by circumstances or the declarations of the party.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

2. While it may be difficult for a broker to serve, with equal efficiency, two masters, neither of them can complain nor refuse compensation if it was promised when fully informed that his agent held the same relation to the adverse dealer; especially when the principals agreed upon the terms of sale and neither of them was prejudiced by the real character of the broker.
3. That defendant paid full commissions to another broker does not impair the plaintiff's right to compensation for services actually rendered in pursuance of a valid contract.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas of the City and County of New York, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term entered on a verdict for plaintiff in an action to recover broker's commissions. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Frank E. Blackwell, for appellant:

It being uncontradicted that defendant was not the owner of the property in question, and that he disclosed to the plaintiff the true owner for whom he was agent, no right of action accrued against defendant.

Bonynge v. Field, 81 N. Y. 159, 160; Covell v. Hart, 14 Hun, 254; Bonynge v. Waterbury, 12 Hun, 534.

This is a case of a number of agents engaged in disposing of the Red Hook property. An exchange was effected, and the question is: Which broker is entitled to the commission?

The rule is well settled. Says Church, C. J., "A person claiming a commission upon a sale of real estate must show an employment, and that the sale was made by means of his efforts or agency." "An owner may employ several brokers for the sale of the same property, and is, of course, only liable for commissions to the one who effects the sale. And although he employs one or more brokers, he may negotiate and sell the property himself, without liability to anyone for commissions."

Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319, 321; See also Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 378, 383; Briggs v. Rowe, 4 Keyes, 424,

Where negotiations are begun by a broker, but abandoned by him, and a sale is subsequently effected, either by the owner or a second broker to the same party, the original broker is entitled to no compensation.

Mr. Henry Daly, Jr., for respondent:

It is submitted that after a fair and honest trial, where there is much testimony on the questions of fact, and there is no misdirection of the jury by the court, the verdict will not be set aside because the court would have come to a different conclusion from that of the jury, on the force and weight of the evidence.

Polhamus v. Moser, 7 Robt. 491; Williams v. Vanderbilt, 29 Barb. 491; Mackey v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 27 Barb. 528; Fleming v. Smith, 44 Barb. 554.

The verdict was not against the evidence, it was on a disputed question of fact; there was a slight conflict of testimony, but the preponderance must be overwhelming to induce a court to disturb the verdict of a jury.

Morss v. Sherrill, 63 Barb. 21; Culver v. Avery, 7 Wend. 384.

The verdict must be entirely against the weight of evidence to justify the court in setting it aside. The questions of fact were presented to the jury—they have decided, and of these they were the judges.

Morss v. Sherrill, 63 Barb. 21; Culver v. Avery, 7 Wend. 384; Wallace v. Patterson, 29 How. Pr. 170; Clark v. Mechanic's Nat. Bank, 8 Daly, 481; Murphy v. Baker, 3 Robt. 4, 5; Tinson v. Welch, 7 Robt. 392; Hermann v. Kreppel, 8 Week. Dig. 177.

It is the province of the jury to weigh and determine conflicting evidence; and the court should not set aside their verdict which determines on one side or the other.

Respondent was employed by both Schaefer and Streeter, and in bringing them together was a mere middleman; and they having consummated an exchange, he became entitled to recover commissions from both.

Both parties knew that respondent was acting for both; there was no concealment on respondent's part, and appellant does not claim to have been misled or injured by anything respondent said or did.

Rowe v. Stevens, 53 N. Y. 621.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued for commissions earned, as he alleged, upon employment by the defendant to effect a sale or exchange of certain real estate at Red Hook. He recovered judgment. This was affirmed by the general term and the defendant now appeals, making in this court the following points:

First, that he was not the owner of the property referred to, and so informed the plaintiff, at the same time disclosing the name of the owner for whom he was acting.

Second, that the plaintiff was not the procuring cause of the sale or exchange made.

Third, that the plaintiff was at the same time, but without the knowledge of the defendant, acting as agent for the other party to the trade.

Fourth, that one F., also a broker, was employed, and the court erred in excluding (against objection) evidence that he paid F. full commissions.

The defendant moved to dismiss the complaint upon the grounds:

First, that defendant having stated that his wife owned the property, he was a known agent; and a recovery could not be had against him.

Second, that the employment of the plaintiff, by Mr. Streeter, not being disclosed to the defendant, is a fact which precludes plaintiff's recovery.

Third, that the evidence shows that the trade was not consummated by the plaintiff.

The motion was denied, and the trial judge in submitting the case to the jury directed them to inquire:

I. Which of these brokers was the procuring cause of the sale; in other words which of these men brought the sale about,—saying, "There is no doubt of the employment of Jarvis by Schaefer. The question is whether Jarvis brought the sale about. Was he the means by which Streeter and Schaefer came together, and did Mr. Jarvis' action result in the effecting of the sale?"

He also called attention to the defendant's claim that F. was the efficient cause, and instructed the jury in substance that the plaintiff could not recover unless they found that the plaintiff actually produced the purchaser. He was not asked to charge differently, nor to charge upon any other question, and no exception was taken to the charge as made. The verdict answered the question addressed to the jury in the affirmative, and we have only to see whether the trial court erred in refusing to dismiss the complaint.

If it be a fact that the legal title to the property was in the wife of the defendant, it would not follow that the plaintiff could not recover in this action. There is evidence that the defendant represented himself as owner, and as such that he put the property into the plaintiff's hands to sell or exchange, knowing at the time he did so that the plaintiff was a broker and that he "expected a commission;" that the defendant, at the time, responded "That is all right; that he always paid a commission and expected to pay it."

The price was fixed by the defendant at $20,000. The usual commissions were proven to be 2½ per cent, or $500. If the defendant was in fact dealing in behalf of his wife, it does not conclusively appear that he so stated, or that he assumed to act in any other than an individual capacity. But in any view of the evidence, even his own, and although he told the plaintiff that Mrs. Schaefer was the owner, the question would still be as to whom the plaintiff gave credit—to the wife or to the defendant.

In one aspect of the evidence there was no disclosure of his agency, and prima facie the agreement was his own, and he was bound personally. If there was evidence tending to a different conclusion, it should have been submitted to the jury. The defendant did not request it, but by his own motion left it to the trial judge. In either view, whether the defendant's agency was disclosed or not, he became personally bound if he undertook to be so, and this might be inferred from the fact that he contracted with the plaintiff in his own name and without any qualification.

Nor can it be said, as matter of law, that the employment of the plaintiff by the other party was not disclosed to the defendant; and while it may be difficult even for a broker to serve with equal efficiency two masters, neither of them can complain, or refuse compensation if it was promised, when fully informed that his agent held the same relation to the adverse dealer. Nor is there in such a contract as the present much danger that either one will be prejudiced by the dual character of the broker. The principals themselves agreed upon the terms of sale or exchange, and became indebted to him for procuring an actual buyer or vendor, as the case may be. Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319.

The jury found that the plaintiff brought about the sale; that he was employed by the defendant. His own testimony is that he was first employed by the defendant, and afterwards by Streeter; that each was to pay him a commission for negotiating, or selling, or trading this property, and he adds: "I told them this."

The defendant, although present at the trial and examined as a witness, does not deny it, nor does he testify that he was ignorant of the plaintiff's claim that he was acting for Streeter also. The plaintiff's testimony on this point is to be weighed according to the power of the defendant to contradict it if not true; and his silence in view of the assertion of the plaintiff, made it impossible for the trial judge to hold, as matter of law, that the true relation of the plaintiff to the other party was not disclosed to the defendant. No fraud, or even concealment, was practiced by the plaintiff, and the case is not one where the same person acted as agent for both parties without their knowledge.

The appellant relies upon the fact that he put property in Georgia with the Red Hook property. This was a circumstance for the jury to consider in determining whether the plaintiff actually produced the purchaser; and that was the proposition which the defendant asked to have the jury pass upon.

If it were conceded that the defendant paid full commissions to F., the other broker, it could not impair the plaintiff's right to compensation for services actually rendered. It was not error therefore to exclude evidence of such payment. The plaintiff's contract was valid, and, as the jury have found, made upon good consideration and fully performed by him. The verdict was rendered upon conflicting evidence, but the exceptions point to no error.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

All concur.

v.
VILLAGE OF HOLLEY, Appt.

1. It would be unreasonable to hold that every change in the natural surface or condition of land, made in the improvement of a street or highway, which to any extent increases the flow of surface water on adjacent premises, constitutes an actionable injury.
2. Defendant village is not responsible for the manner in which the water flows over the plaintiff's lot, unless it is attributable to some act of defendant.
3. Where excavations made in the street and adjacent lots by the State changed the direction of the drainage, held, that if the village defendant by turnpiking the street and improving the highway did not increase the flow of surface water on the plaintiff's lot beyond what it was prior to the excavations, it committed no wrong to plaintiff.

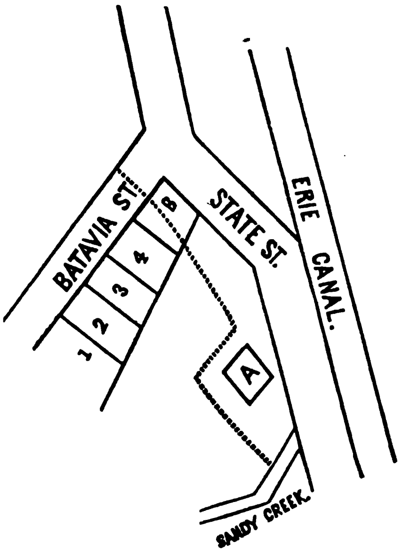
APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, reversing a judgment entered in Orleans County upon report of a referee dismissing the complaint in an action to restrain the discharging of surface water (which collected on a street) upon lands of the plaintiff. Reversed.

State Street in the Village of Holley follows the course of the Erie Canal in a southeasterly direction. From this street Batavia Street extends in a southwesterly direction. Within the southerly angle formed by these streets lay a line of lots extending along Batavia Street and the lands of the plaintiff; the latter are bounded northeasterly by State Street, northwesterly by the said row of lots extending along Batavia Street, and southerly and easterly by Sandy Creek. A lot called the "Cary lot" is on the corner and fronts on both Batavia and State Streets.



A. The tannery building owned by plaintiff.
B. The Cary lot.
1. 2. 3. 4. Lots on Batavia Street.
The broken line shows the position of the sewer across Batavia Street and the course the water took over the surface of plaintiff's lands.

Prior to 1864 the surface water of Batavia Street and lands lying northwesterly thereof passed over the plaintiff's lands along the north side of the building thereon known as the tannery building, and into Sandy Creek.

In 1862 the surface of the land where Batavia Street now is and all west of the plaintiff's lands was removed by the State and used in repairing a break in the embankment of the Erie Canal; at the same time the State permanently appropriated the north end of the tannery building and the lands lying north of it, over which the surface water passed and filled up the same, entirely obstructing the surface water so that it passed around the tannery building to the south.

After Batavia Street was rebuilt by the State there was no way for the waters which collected in the gutter on the northwest side of the street to pass off, except by evaporation and soakage, or by passing over the street at its lowest point, which point was at or near where a sluice had been constructed across said street in 1840, at which point a sewer was constructed in 1864. To more effectually drain the waters from the northwesterly side of the street, the village trustees lowered said sewer in 1879, about six inches; and about the same time, with consent of the owner of the Cary lot, they took up a sewer running across the Cary lot and emptying on the lands of the plaintiff, and lowered that. About the same time they also constructed a covered sewer in the bed of the gutter on the northwest side of the street and connected the same with the sewer running across the street and emptying into the sewer running through the Cary lot.

The referee found that after the sewer across said Batavia Street and the sewer across the Cary lot were filled with water, the same being unobstructed, could and did come upon the plaintiff's premises in such quantities and with such force and volume as to soak into and percolate the walls of his said tannery building and to damage and injure the same and otherwise injure and damage his said premises.

In 1879 in an action by plaintiff against the owners of the Cary lot to restrain and close up the sewer running through the same and emptying on plaintiff's land, an injunction was granted and such sewer was closed so that no water could pass through it.

At the time of lowering the sewer running across Batavia Street, defendant's officers placed a sewer plate or grate at the end of the sewer on the southeasterly side of the street at the place where it emptied into or connected with the sewer running across the Cary lot.

The referee found that since the sewer running across the Cary lot was filled up, whenever the sewer running across the street was filled with water, the water wells up through the sewer plate or grate and makes its way over the surface of the ground of the Cary lot at the lowest part thereof, and is discharged or passes on to the lands of the plaintiff, substantially in a body; and in heavy rains and thaws water flows from this sluice as aforesaid, and passes down and against the walls of the tannery building and percolates the same, and damages and injures it.

This was the condition of things at the time this action was commenced, and has so existed since the filling up of the sewer in pursuance of the decree of the court in 1879.

The plaintiff brought this action to restrain defendant from turning the surface water so collected upon his lands, and for damages. The referee reported in favor of defendant, dismissing the complaint. On appeal from a judgment entered upon his report, the general term reversed the same and defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. John H. White, for appellant:

It is immaterial what changes the defendant made upon the highway, so long as they did not increase the flow or manner of the flow of water which passed on to the plaintiff's land. Mills v. Brooklyn, 32 N. Y. 489-495.

The case of Noonan v. Albany, 79 N. Y. 470, relied upon by plaintiff's counsel, is not in point. There the city, by means of streets and gutters, had collected surface water from a large territory and poured it into a ravine where it did not flow before that time. The act of the defendant being wrongful, it was not excused from the fact that the waters would have passed off without injury to the plaintiff if some other person had not obstructed the flow of the water below the plaintiff's premises, thus causing him injury. If no more water had been poured down this ravine by the improvements made by the city than before such improvements, the defendant would not have been liable and the cases would be nearer parallel. Here the obstruction below was placed there by the State, and the plaintiff has had his pay for it.

The cases of Byrnes v. Cohoes, 67 N. Y. 204; Bastable v. Syracuse, 8 Hun, 587, and Sleight v. Kingston, 11 Hun, 594, cited by the plaintiff below, are all cases of diversion of water in other and different directions from what it had before run, to the injury of the plaintiff. And the same may be said of the case of Seifert v. Brooklyn, 2 Cent. Rep. 135, 101 N. Y. 136.

The trustees in any event did no more than they had the right to do in lowering this sluice. No substantial injury could be done the plaintiff. The improvement was proper and necessary, and they had the right to make it. The following cases illustrate this case, and lay down the correct rule as to the rights and liabilities of highway commissioners and municipal corporations, when acting as such:

Graves v. Otis, 2 Hill, 466; Benedict v. Goit, 3 Barb. 459; Radcliff v. Mayor, 4 N. Y. 203; Wilson v. Mayor, 1 Denio, 595; Waffle v. Porter, 61 Barb. 130; Waffle v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 58 Barb. 413; 53 N. Y. 11; Mills v. Brooklyn, 32 N.Y. 489; Barkley v. Wilcox, 19 Hun, 320.

Mr. John Cunneen, for respondent:

A municipal corporation has no right to collect surface water from its lands or streets into an artificial channel and discharge the same upon the lands of another.

Noonan v. Albany, 79 N.Y. 476; Barkley v. Wilcox, 86 N.Y. 140; Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208. See also Byrnes v. Cohoes, 67 N. Y. 206; Bastable v. Syracuse, 8 Hun, 578; Sleight v. Kingston, 11 Hun, 597; 35 Am. Rep. 431; 37 Am. Rep. 150, 763; Cooley, Torts, 579.

There is no allegation, and there is no finding, that for one moment was the use adverse or under a claim of right, or that a right to use these artificial sluices has accrued to defendant by prescription, dedication, grant or otherwise. Their use merely for forty years would constitute no defense.

Wiseman v. Lucksinger, 84 N.Y. 31.

The rights of the parties after the action of the State in walling up the tannery, are to be determined by the subsequent events.

Hancock v. Wentworth, 5 Met. 446; Missey v. Proprietors Union Wharf, 41 Maine, 34.

The "gully or waterway" being obstructed by the State, the defendant subsequently had no right to gather and discharge this water in the upper end of the sluice, when it knew that the necessary consequence would be and is, as the referee finds, to damage plaintiff's property.

Noonan v. Albany, 79 N.Y. 470, 478.

It is the province of the referee to find the fact instead of reporting the evidence; and judgment cannot be given upon a report of evidence, no matter how strongly it may tend to establish the fact.

Jarvis v. Jarvis, 66 Barb. 331; Avery v. Foley, 4 Hun, 415; Spooner v. Lefevre, 2 Thomp. & C. 666.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The fact is uncontroverted that the natural drainage of the surface water from the northeasterly side of the hill, over which Batavia Street was constructed, was through a depression at the foot of the hill on Batavia Street, which extended over the Cary lots and the lot of the plaintiff, from whose lot, prior to 1862, the water was discharged into a gully or water course at the northwesterly corner of the plaintiff's tannery.

It is also evident that the injury which the plaintiff has sustained to his tannery building, since that date, from the flow of the surface water over his premises, has resulted from the closing up of the outlet by the wall erected by the State, whereby the water was turned from its natural course and thrown against the side of the tannery. But this is not decisive against the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action. It is claimed that the Village, by the grading of Batavia Street in 1863 and the construction of gutters therein, and of the sluice across Batavia Street, has increased and facilitated the collection and discharge of surface water at the lowest point in the street, and that as a consequence a greater amount of water than naturally would have collected there, has been cast upon the Cary lot, and from there upon the premises of the plaintiff.

The finding of the referee, which is not without evidence to support it, negatives this contention. The referee, in his twentieth finding, in substance finds that the water discharged from the sewer plate or grate over the sluice on the east side of Batavia Street passes on to the plaintiff's premises from the Cary lot at about the same place that the water has at all times since 1824, when said street was laid out, passed upon the same; that it is the drainage from substantially the same territory; and that with the same amount of rain fall, "No greater amount or volume of water passes, or is discharged on to plaintiff's premises from this sluice (since said Cary's sewer was closed) than did pass or was discharged on to the same at all times since said streets (Batavia and State Streets) were laid out."

It is not claimed that the course or amount of surface water which found its way to the foot of the hill, before Batavia Street was laid out in 1824, was increased by the original construction of the street. The finding, therefore, is equivalent to a finding that the present discharge from the sluice does not exceed the natural drainage at this point, of the surface water of the adjacent territory. It is insisted, however, that by the construction of the gutter on the north side of Batavia Street, and the sluice across the street, the water is made to flow in an artificial channel, and is collected in a body and cast upon the plaintiff's lot. The gutter and sluice were constructed for the protection and improvement of the road way.

It is not improbable that the turnpiking of the street and the construction of the gutters diminish to some extent the waste by soakage and evaporation, and thereby increase somewhat the quantity of water which collects at the sluice, and which is discharged on to the Cary lot, and ultimately on the plaintiff's lot. But it would be quite unreasonable to hold that every change in the natural surface or condition of land, made in the improvement of a street or highway, which to any extent increases the flow of surface water on adjacent premises, constitutes an actionable injury. The case of Noonan v. Albany, 79 N. Y. 476, and cases of kindred character, establish no such unreasonable and inconvenient doctrine.

But it is said that the water, by the acts of the defendant, is thrown upon the plaintiff's lot in a body, whereas before it was dispersed over the surface and was absorbed doing comparatively little injury. But there is no finding that the manner of discharge has been materially changed by the acts of the defendant, and such a finding would have been in conflict with some of the evidence, although it might have been warranted by other evidence. It is true that it is found that the water passes on to the plaintiff's lot from the Cary lot substantially in a body.

But this finding is made in connection with another finding: that the water now passes over the surface of the Cary lot at the lowest point, before reaching the plaintiff's lot. The defendant is not responsible for the manner in which the water flows over the plaintiff's lot, unless it is attributable to some act of the defendant. This question was controverted on the trial.

The Cary sewer which connected with the sluice was closed in 1879. It is found that since that time no water has passed through it; and the water which now reaches the plaintiff's lot first passes through the sluice across the road to the east side thereof, where it is interrupted by the wall or face of the closed Cary sewer, and escapes by "welling up" through the sewer plate or grate, and thence passes over the surface of the Cary lot and on to the lot of the plaintiff.

The construction of the sluice probably facilitates the passage of the water from the road way; but it was not shown, or at least it was not shown by uncontradicted evidence, that the construction of the sluice, or the manner in which the water was discharged from it, affected materially the flow across the plaintiff's lot, from what it originally was before the sluice was constructed.

It is claimed that the excavations in the street and adjacent lots, made by the State in 1862 for canal purposes, changed to some extent the direction of the drainage, and that the Village had no right afterward, by turnpiking the street, to alter to the prejudice of the plaintiff's lot, the surface of this new earth created by the canal authorities, and that in determining the rights of the parties, this new condition must be regarded in the same way as though it was the original and natural condition of the land. It is a sufficient answer to this claim that there is no satisfactory evidence that the act of the defendant in restoring the highway made any substantial change in the direction or volume of the surface water, unfavorable to the plaintiff. But at all events we are of opinion that if the defendant in improving the highway did not increase the flow of surface water on the plaintiff's lot beyond what it was prior to the excavation, they committed no wrong to the plaintiff.

Our conclusion, after a careful examination of the case, is adverse to the general term. The general term reversed the judgment of the referee, on the ground that the facts found by him showed an actionable injury, within the case of Noonan v. Albany, supra. We differ from the general term on the merits, simply as to the construction of the findings of fact by the referee, which are numerous and complicated.

We think there are no valid exceptions to evidence.

The order of the General Term should, therefore, be reversed, and the judgment on the report of the referee affirmed.

All concur.

v.
Henry CLEWS Appt.

A diamond dealer who had on two former occasions been entrusted with diamonds by plaintiffs, which he had sold and accounted for the proceeds without any fault being found, so far as appears, on account of any lack of authority to sell, obtained from them other diamonds, for which he gave a receipt stating that they were received on approval to show to his customers and that they were to be returned to plaintiffs on demand. He subsequently sold the diamonds to defendant and received the price. Held,

(a) That the receipt, construed in connection with the facts, meant that the dealer had authority to sell the diamonds to a customer if they met his approval, and that if not actually sold before demand made, they should be returned to plaintiffs upon such demand.

(b) That, under the facts, plaintiffs had conferred upon the dealer authority to sell the diamonds and to give a good title, and that defendant, having purchased them from him in good faith, has a right to retain them as against plaintiffs.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit, on a verdict for plaintiffs in an action to recover the possession or value of certain personal property. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Albert A. Abbott, for appellant.

Mr. Chas. H. Woodbury, for respondents.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under the Code to obtain the delivery of personal property alleged to belong to plaintiffs, and to be wrongfully withheld by defendant.

The plaintiffs had a verdict which was affirmed at general term and the defendant has appealed here. The plaintiffs claimed to be the owners of what they called a pair of diamond ear knobs, of the value of $1,400, which came into the possession of the defendant, as shown by the evidence, in the following manner:

Elijah Miers was a dealer in diamonds in New York. His business was to procure diamonds from the larger dealers and sell them to his customers. Before the 18th of January, 1879, he had procured from an authorized agent of the plaintiffs a pair of diamond earrings which on that day he had sold to the defendant for $300, and had received the check of defendant, payable to his order in payment therefor.

Before the 23d day of January, 1879, Miers had procured another pair of earrings from plaintiffs' said agent and sold them on that day to defendant for $450, receiving in payment the first pair of earrings and the check of defendant for the balance of $150.

Miers had paid to plaintiffs' agent the price of these diamonds after the sale to defendant.

The defendant had purchased them in good faith from Miers, assuming him to be the owner. He intended the first pair as a present for his wife, but when shown to her she preferred a more expensive pair; and hence, the second purchase.

These also proved unacceptable, and it was some time after their purchase by defendant before the diamonds in question were presented to him for purchase, he having, in the meantime, kept the second pair; and upon the purchase of the diamonds in question by the same man, Miers, defendant gave back the second pair and paid $650 in addition, thus making up $1,100, the purchase price of these last diamonds.

There is no question of the bona fides of this series of purchases by the defendant.

The evidence is uncontradicted as to the manner in which Miers obtained the last diamonds from the plaintiffs. They had delivered them to Plumb, the diamond broker who had delivered the other diamonds to Miers. One of the plaintiffs was asked how it happened that he delivered these diamonds to Plumb, and he testified that he could not say whether it was at Miers' request or not, but that Miers had called on him before he delivered them to Plumb and had said to him that he had a customer for a pair of diamond ear knobs; and although the plaintiff could not say that he told Miers that he would send him the diamonds through Plumb, yet he says he stated to Plumb that he would do so, and he did do so, and he authorized Plumb to deliver the diamonds to Miers, and that that is the way Miers got them. The witness also said that he knew Miers had the diamonds in his possession immediately, that they were taken from the plaintiffs' office and delivered to Miers by Plumb; they were delivered to Plumb on the 12th of April, and by him to Miers on that day. When Plumb delivered them to Miers he took from him a receipt in this form:

"New York, April 12, 1879.

Received from Alfred H. Smith & Co., by their representative, B. W. Plumb, a pair of single stem, diamond earrings, 10½ carats, of the value of $1,400, on approval to show to my customers; said knobs to be returned to said A. H. Smith & Co., on demand.

E. Miers."

Having thus become possessed of the diamonds, Miers, as has been stated, sold them to defendant, and the question is, Did he get a good title as against the plaintiffs?

Taking the undisputed evidence and reading this receipt in the light thereof, we cannot resist the conclusion that the plaintiffs conferred upon Miers the power to sell these diamonds, and of course to give a good title; and therefore the court should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiffs were dealers in diamonds, and they knew Miers and that he was engaged in the business of a diamond dealer, a seller of the stones to whomsoever he chose.

They had on two former occasions entrusted, through their agent, diamonds to Miers, who had sold them and accounted for the proceeds of the sale without any fault being found, so far as appears, on account of any lack of authority to sell.

They were informed by Miers on this particular occasion, that he had a customer for a pair of diamond earrings, and these diamonds were then entrusted to Miers by the plaintiffs, through their agent, Plumb. Upon taking them Miers gives the receipt spoken of.

Now, upon these facts, what other meaning can be attached to that receipt than that Miers had power to take these diamonds, show them to his customer and, if approved of by the customer, sell them to him? The fact that Miers agreed to return them to plaintiffs, on demand, must be construed with reference to the obvious purpose for which the diamonds were entrusted to him, viz.: that of a sale; and so construed, the plain meaning is that if not already sold, the plaintiffs had a right to demand a return of the diamonds at any time and Miers would then be bound to return them.

The information given to plaintiffs by Miers that he (Miers) had a customer for a pair of diamond ear knobs, is susceptible of no other interpretation than that he had a customer who wanted to buy a pair. Under such circumstances what could a dealer in diamonds mean by entrusting them to another dealer, who had a customer who wanted to buy them and who came to this dealer for the purpose of being supplied by him with diamonds of a kind which his customer wanted to buy?

Enlightened by these facts the interpretation of the receipt signed by Miers is an easy matter. It can mean nothing else than an authority to sell the stones to the customer if they met his approval; and if not actually sold before demand made, they should be returned to the plaintiffs upon such demand.

This conclusion as to what was the actual authority given to Miers, does not, in the least, affect the propriety of the decisions cited by the counsel for the respondents, and in the opinion of the court at general term, to the effect that one entrusted simply with the possession of personal property with no power to sell or pass title cannot give title to the property, even to a bona fide purchaser for value.

The question here is simply, What was the authority with which the man Miers was clothed? And upon the undisputed evidence in the case we hold that it was an authority to sell.

The judgment of the General Term and of the Circuit should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, costs to abide event.

All concur.

Re Application of Mary R. HYNES, General Guardian, etc.

1. A general guardian of infants has, under the statute (1 R. S. p. 718, § 5) giving such guardian the rights and powers of a guardian in socage, the right to employ an attorney to obtain possession of the ward's lands, and to make an agreement to pay such attorney a certain specified portion of the value of the property recovered.
2. A general guardian of infants (who was also their mother) agreed, individually and as such guardian, to pay an attorney at law, in consideration of his services in attempting to recover possession of real estate which had belonged to her deceased husband, the father of said infants, at the time of his death, a sum equal to one third of the value of all such property as might be recovered. Held, on the facts of the case, that a judgment to the effect that such agreement was valid and proper should be affirmed.
3. Held also, that the fee of counsel who had been employed by a third person to assist such attorney in litigation to recover said real estate, should not be deducted from the amount to be paid to said attorney under said agreement.
4. Held also, that, under said agreement, the attorney was entitled to his stipulated share in funds arising from the sale of lands of the deceased father of the infants in another State, for which notes were given.

(Decided May 13, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, modifying an order of the Special Term confirming the report of a referee directing the sale of infants' real estate to pay claims against such estate. Reversed.

March 7, 1884, Mary E. Hynes, mother of the infants, William R. and Andrew Hynes, presented a petition to the supreme court for leave to sell certain property of the infants to pay an indebtedness of $16,000 to one Charles Todd, for necessaries furnished said infants, and an indebtedness to one John L. Brower, their attorney and counsel, of about $40,000. Thereupon, the court appointed the Farmers Loan & Trust Company special guardian for the infants, and an order of reference was made to Philo T. Ruggles, Esq., to inquire into the merits of the application; to examine into the truth of the allegation of the petition; to hear the allegations and proofs of all persons interested in the property or otherwise interested in the application and report his opinion thereon, particularly as to alleged indebtedness of said infants, together with the testimony.

The referee made his report June 24, 1884, whereby he found that all the material facts set forth in the petition were proven; that William R. Hynes, father of said infants, died in England, June 27, 1874, intestate; that upon his death, his sisters, claiming to be his only heirs and next of kin, entered into possession of his real estate, one of them becoming administratrix, etc., and seized all his personal estate; that said infants and said mother were in poor and needy condition, and had no means to commence or carry on proceedings to recover their said property; that the petitioner, Mary E. Hynes, mother of said infants and general guardian appointed by the surrogate of New York County, November 24, 1875, made the following agreement in writing with John L. Brower, an attorney at law:

"This agreement, made the 24th day of November, 1875, between Mary Eliza Hynes, individually, and as general guardian of William R. Hynes and Andrew Hynes, party of the first part, and John L. Brower, of the City of New York, party of the second part;

Whereas, The said party of the first part and her two children, William R. Hynes and Andrew Hynes, are in poor and needy condition; and,

Whereas, A large amount of real and personal property belonging to William R. Hynes, the late husband of the party of the first part, is unlawfully withheld from said party of the first part and her said children; and,

Whereas, Said party of the first part, individually and as guardian aforesaid, had and has no means wherewith to commence and continue proceedings for the recovery of said property; and,

Whereas, The said party of the second part, at the special request of the said party of the first part, has commenced proceedings to recover said property;

Now, this agreement witnesseth: That the said party of the first part, individually and as said guardian, for and in consideration of the assistance and service of the said party of the second part attempting to recover the property aforesaid, agrees to pay to the said party of the second part a sum of money equal to one third of the value of all the said property recovered and restored to her and her said children.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

M. E. Hynes, [L. S.]
M. E. Hynes, as guardian, [L. S.]

Sealed and delivered in presence of Richard C. H. Finch."

That said Brower, relying upon said agreement, did finally recover and restore to said petitioner and said infants the entire estate, real and personal, of William R. Hynes, deceased, the total net value of which was $141,660.28 of which said Brower was entitled to one third, to wit: $47,220.09, less cash recoveries and costs awarded to him, amounting to $6,638.12; that under said agreement said Brower commenced and carried on said proceedings at his own risk, without any compensation or right to any, except in case of success; that said general guardian had lawful power and authority to make said agreement; that such services, under the circumstances under which they were rendered, were well and reasonably worth one third of the net amount recovered thereby.

Referee also reported that the indebtedness of the infants and their mother to Charles Todd was $19,836.56, for moneys advanced by him, individually, for their separate education and maintenance and for moneys paid by him to Joseph H. Choate, Esq., as counsel on behalf of said infants.

The court at special term confirmed the report of the referee, except as to the claim of Brower, refusing to sanction the agreement made by the mother of the infants with him and referred the matter back to the same referee for further proof as to the reasonableness of the agreement. Thereupon, an order was entered confirming the report as to the indebtedness to Todd and directing a sale of sufficient property to pay the same, and referring the matter back to the referee to take further proof as to the reasonableness of the agreement with Brower.

Included in Todd's claim was the sum of $2,250, paid to Joseph H. Choate, Esq., as counsel for the infants. The testimony taken before the referee shows that Mr. Choate acted as counsel in the ejectment suit brought by Brower under the agreement with Mrs. Hynes, from the time of the commencement of the first trial in the circuit court, through the several appeals taken therein, in the second trial at the circuit and again upon appeals, ending with the last hearing in the court of appeals. Mr. Choate testified that his claim against the estate amounted to $10,000, less the sum of $2,250, paid to him by Todd, and $500 paid to him out of damages recovered. The claim of Mr. Choate is not included in the amount claimed by said Brower.

Upon the second hearing before the referee, evidence was taken as to the reasonableness of the agreement in question; and the referee made his second report in which he found that the agreement in question was in all respects a just, fair, reasonable and proper agreement under the circumstances under which the same was made and was advantageous to said infants; that said infants were each indebted to said Brower, to the extent of the value of one third of the estate, real and personal, recovered by him for them.

This report was confirmed at the special term and the special guardian appealed to the general term, which court modified the order confirming the report so as to provide that the money which had been paid and should thereafter be found due to Mr. Choate should be paid out of the one third allowed to said Brower and as modified confirmed the same.

From this affirmance the special guardian appealed to this court. John L. Brower also appealed from that part of the order modifying the special term order.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. David McClure, for The Farmers Loan & Trust Co., special guardian:

The agreement is void as against the infants.

Mrs. Hynes had no power to bind the property of her children. There is no authority in the State for any such contract.

A guardian can contract for services, and that they shall be paid for at their value, and where services are rendered, a party can recover for their value without an agreement. The court will not strain the law to sustain an agreement such as this, where the party who has rendered services has another and an easy remedy to obtain payment therefor.

Mr. Truman H. Baldwin, for John L. Brower:

The supreme court has power to direct the sale of real estate belonging to infants for the purpose of paying the infants' debts.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2348.

Mrs. Hynes, as a general guardian of her infant children, had the power to enter into the agreement with Mr. Brower and to bind them thereby.

The agreement in question was in every respect just, fair and reasonable, and was beneficial to the infants.

The agreement was duly executed by Mrs. Hynes as general guardian of the infants, with full knowledge that it provided for compensation to Mr. Brower of one third of the recovery.

No part of the counsel fee paid to Mr. Choate, or to which he may be entitled, can lawfully be deducted from Mr. Brower's compensation. Mr. Choate was not retained nor employed by Mr. Brower. The general term erred in holding that the agreement imposed upon Mr. Brower the obligation to render or pay for all services by whomsoever or howsoever rendered.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There can be no doubt of the authority of a guardian in socage to make a contract such as this.

By our Revised Statutes, under the facts in this case, the mother became a general guardian with the rights, powers and duties of a guardian in socage. 1 R. S. 718, § 5.

Such a guardian had the right to the possession of the ward's lands and to the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and could maintain ejectment to recover possession of such lands. Jackson v. De Walts, 7 Johns. 157; Beecher v. Crouse, 19 Wend. 306; Byrne v. Van Hoesen, 5 Johns. 66; Sylvester v. Ralston, 31 Barb. 286; Emerson v. Spicer, 46 N. Y. 594;

Schouler, Dom. Rel. §§ 286-290; 2 Kent, Com. marg. p. 222.

The right to the possession of the real estate of the ward carries with it a corresponding duty to obtain such possession; and, if wrongfully withheld, the guardian should sue for it.

In imposing this duty upon the guardian the law necessarily gives to him the right to employ counsel, and of course to make a contract for his compensation. Taylor v. Bemiss, 110 U. S. 42 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 64].

The attorney for Mrs. Hynes and also all the other parties seem to have regarded this proceeding as practically a suit to enforce a specific performance of the contract made between the attorney and Mrs. Hynes as general guardian for her infant children; and with that view he proved the facts surrounding the making of the agreement, and gave evidence as to the value of the property to be recovered, the pecuniary situation of the infants and their guardian, the labor involved in the prosecution of the various legal proceedings and the success attending such prosecution; and he also called some of the most reputable and eminent members of the New York Bar upon the question of the reasonableness of such agreement; and their opinions were unanimous, and were all favorable to its propriety and fairness. The questions involved in the litigation in the actions of ejectment were argued upon appeal before this court and have been reported. See 82 N. Y. 41, and 91 N. Y. 451.

That they were complicated and grave cannot be doubted.

The question of the propriety of the agreement was before the special term of the supreme court; and although there was then no affirmative evidence against it, yet the learned and careful judge therein presiding referred it back to the referee, to take further evidence on that subject and to report thereon to the court. It was upon the proceeding on the second reference that the opinions of the members of the bar were procured under oath, and upon a fair statement of all the facts as shown in the record now before us. The referee in his second report said upon this subject:

"I have carefully considered the situation of the infants after the death of their father, as disclosed by the testimony taken herein, in that the estate, both real and personal, of their father had been taken possession of by relatives of the father residing in this country, claiming to be his only heirs at law and next of kin, they insisting that the marriage of the father of said infants with their mother, the petitioner, was illegal and void, and said infants illegitimate; and in that the marriage claimed had taken place in a foreign country without the performance of any marriage ceremony; and that said relatives were possessed of large means and said infants were without any means to prosecute legal proceedings to establish their claim to legitimacy and to their father's property, and their mother was also without any means, and the infants were dependent upon the charity of the friends of their late father for support and were of tender years."

The referee finds as a fact that the agreement with Mrs. Hynes individually and as general guardian of the infants was in all respects just, fair, reasonable and proper. The special term again examined this report, and in an opinion the learned justice holding that court said: "I have most carefully examined the testimony taken before the learned referee, both at the original and supplemental hearings; and I have reached the conclusion that the judgment twice pronounced by him, after hearing and seeing the witnesses, is correct, and that his report should therefore be confirmed."

The general term, with an exception to be noticed, agreed with this view of the case and, after a modification, affirmed the order of the special term. Upon this testimony this court would not be justified in reversing the conclusion of the lower courts upon the fact as to the character of the agreement in point of fairness and propriety.

It appears, however, that just as the attorney and one whom he had associated with him were about to enter upon the first trial of the action of ejectment, another counsel appeared for the plaintiff therein, and with their assent took the leading part in the trial of the action, which lasted five days, and such counsel also argued the various appeals thereafter and took the same part in the second trial and the subsequent appeals from the judgment then obtained. The services of the counsel were most meritorious and valuable, but they were not rendered upon the retainer or request of the attorney making the agreement with Mrs. Hynes, and so far as appears were wholly separate and distinct from his contract with her. The general term held that whatever sums were or should be paid this counsel must be deducted from the amount claimed by the attorney, and modified the order of the special term to that extent.

We are unable to see the force of the reasoning which led to this result. Undoubtedly the attorney would have to pay out of his share all expenses of counsel retained by him in the conduct of the cause. He could not make the infants or the mother liable for that expense. It seems equally true that neither the mother nor anyone for her, or as a mere stranger, could retain counsel and charge the expense of his payment to the attorney, without his assent to such arrangement. There is no proof of any such assent, and we think none is implied from the fact that counsel was employed by a third person; and thereafter the attorney consulted with such counsel and permitted him under such retainer to take the leading part in the trial and argument of the action.

As the evidence shows, what took place in court, while of course of the most vital importance, was but a small part of the actual labor performed in the case. And if the attorney were responsible for the payment of counsel out of his share, when such counsel was not retained by him, and when he was ready and willing to go on without him, the amount of his possible compensation might be very seriously diminished, if not entirely wiped out, without his consent. Treating with counsel retained by a third person, and permitting him to aid in the trial of and to argue the case is very far indeed from any assent that his services shall be paid for by the attorney instead of the person who retained him.

One other objection is made. There was a sale of vacant lots in Tennessee; and the proceeds of the sale are in the hands of the clerk of the chancery court of the State. Counsel for appellants claims that the attorney is not entitled to his proportion of that fund. We think otherwise. The title of the infants to the property of their late father has been established by these actions, and Tennessee funds have come or are coming to them by reason of that title. Notes were given for the amount of the sale, less 10 per cent paid in cash. The sale took place December 29, 1883, and the last notes became due fourteen months thereafter, or in March, 1885. The notes were secured by mortgage on the lands sold. It is to be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the notes were worth their face and that they had been paid; for if not, it would have been proved, as the referee did not make his report until September, 1885.

The counsel for the infants also claims that the attorney should only be allowed to recover upon filing a waiver by his associate of all claims upon the infants or the widow. In his brief before this court the counsel for the attorney says that he (such attorney) had himself selected counsel who had actually commenced the opening address to the jury when the counsel retained by others appeared. As has been already said, counsel employed by the attorney would have to look to him for compensation, and would have no claim against the estate of the infants or the widow; but we do not think it proper in this proceeding to add the condition asked for.

The order of the General Term should be reversed, and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Ruger, Ch. J., and Earl, J., dissenting; Finch, J., not voting.

MOTION to amend remittitur. Denied.

Hannibal S. Selheimer and Dwight S. Beckwith doing business as Selheimer & Beckwith, in Carlton, Orleans County, N. Y., on December 15, 1884, made a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors, in which there were preferences to the amount of over $38,000. On January 6, 1885, thereafter they confessed judgment in favor of plaintiff, Truman Symson, to the amount of $3,433.01, represented in part by three notes and in part by an open account between the parties for produce sold, etc.

After the entry of plaintiff's judgment numerous other judgments were obtained against Selheimer & Beckwith, by confession or by action; and on February 13, 1885, a receiver was appointed in proceedings supplementary to execution on one of such latter judgments and subsequently the receivership was extended to some of the other judgments obtained against the partnership but not to the judgment confessed in favor of Symson, the latter not having instituted supplementary proceedings. Thereafter such receiver commenced an action to set aside the general assignment of Selheimer & Beckwith as fraudulent and void, in which action all judgment creditors, including the plaintiff Symson, were, on order of the court, made parties defendant.

The receiver obtained a judgment in such action declaring the assignment void, because not properly acknowledged, and fraudulent in fact and in law.

August 15, 1885, certain real estate of the partnership was sold upon foreclosure of a mortgage given prior to Symson's judgment and purchased by Symson at a price which created a surplus of nearly $2,000. Symson filed a claim to the surplus and, about September 15, 1885, was informed for the first time that an informality existed in his judgment, and that its validity was to be questioned, because the statement for confession did not contain a statement of the facts out of which the debt arose.

Upon an affidavit of Symson, alleging that the failure to insert such statement of facts was due solely to the inadvertence or ignorance of the attorney who prepared the papers, a motion was made at special term upon which the court, October 5, 1885, granted an order to show cause why the statement made by defendants for confession of judgment and upon which the judgment was entered be not amended in the particular mentioned and why plaintiff should not have such other or further relief in the premises, etc.

This order was directed to and served upon all the judgment creditors of Selheimer & Beckwith, whose judgments were subsequent to that of plaintiff. At the hearing upon the return day of the order to show cause on affidavits pro and con, the court directed the judgment to be amended and corrected by adding the concise statement of facts out of which the debt arose, nunc pro tunc, as of the time said judgment was entered.

From this order an appeal was taken to the general term by the defendants and several others, judgment creditors, and by the receiver in the supplementary proceedings. The general term modified the order of the special term by adding thereto the following clause:

"It is further ordered that the lien of said judgment, in favor of said Truman Symson, be and the same is hereby deferred to that of the judgment creditors of said defendants, Selheimer & Beckwith, existing on October 5, 1885, as to all the real estate of said judgment debtors which is embraced in the general assignment dated on the 15th day of December, 1884."

From the order of the general term plaintiff appealed to this court where the same was, March 1, 1887, modified in the following order, no opinion being delivered:

"Order of general term modified by providing that plaintiff's motion to amend is granted, upon his consenting to postpone the lien of his judgment to those existing on the 5th of October, 1885, as to all real estate embraced in the assignment of the judgment debtors, dated December 15, 1884; otherwise denied; no costs to either party on this appeal." (See ante, 339.)

Thereafter on affidavits alleging the invalidity of certain of the judgments existing on October 5, 1885, the plaintiff moved this court to amend the remittitur, so as to postpone the lien of plaintiff's judgment to all valid judgments existing October 5, 1885, the plaintiffs in which had by the receiver joined in the action to set aside the general assignment.

Mr. Nathaniel Foote, for appellant.

Mr. John H. White, for respondents.

Per Curiam:

The motion made by plaintiff at special term to obtain permission of the court to amend the statement of the confession of judgment was addressed to the discretion of the supreme court. It was not an amendment which he had the legal right to demand, but was one which the court might in its discretion refuse, or grant upon such terms as to it might seem to be just. Mitchell v. Van Buren, 27 N. Y. 300.

The special term granted the motion to amend unconditionally. Upon appeal the general term, while affirming that part of the order of the special term granting leave to amend, coupled it with a provision absolutely postponing the lien of the plaintiff's judgment as stated in such order. The effect was that upon a motion for leave to amend his judgment, the plaintiff found that his motion had been granted and the lien of his judgment absolutely postponed, instead of which, as he was asking for a favor, the order should have been in the form of granting the favor upon condition of his assenting to the postponement of his lien, thus giving the option to him of taking his favor upon the condition imposed, or of not taking it, and leaving his judgment in its original state.

This court thought that the plaintiff had a right to have this option granted him. We, therefore, modified the order of the general term in the manner set forth in the remittitur.

The present motion to amend the remittitur by putting in some other condition than that imposed by the supreme court is to appeal from the discretion exercised by that court and to ask us to exercise our own, which we have no power to do. We think, however, that the order as modified by this court, in case plaintiff accepts the conditions, cannot be construed to postpone the plaintiff's judgment to the lien of a judgment docketed in form, but which is, as matter of law, void. Where is the lien of a void judgment or how can it be said to be a judgment at all?

The motion to amend the remittitur must be denied, without costs.

All concur.

The judge's certificate does not comply with the Act of Congress in that it certifies to the exemplification. It should certify to the attestation. The attestation is the clerk's work; the exemplification is the whole, and consists of the clerk's attestation, the judge's certificate and the seal. A proper judge's certificate is absolutely indispensable.

There is no attestation of the clerk in the exemplification. The so-called attestation of the clerk, preceding the certificate by the judge, is not properly sealed. The seal should have been impressed upon wax or other adhesive substance.

II. The court erred in allowing interest at 10 per cent on the amount of the alleged judgment.

In the recent and carefully considered case of O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, it is held that "A judgment is an obligation of record; and interest thereon is given, not on the principle of implied contract, but as damages for delay in performing the obligation, the measure of which is the statutory rate."

In an action on a judgment rendered in another State interest is to be allowed according to the rate in this State by way of damages. "This is not interest, but damages; and the rule of damages is that of the court where the action is brought."

Mr. Wm. Bro. Smith, for respondent:

I. The District Court of the Third Judicial District of the Territory of Utah is a court created and organized, and its jurisdiction prescribed, by and under Acts of Congress of the United States.

R. S. U. S. pp. 331, 337, § 338; Supplement, U. S. R. S. 1874, § 3, p. 107.

The attention of the trial court was called to these statutes. The court was bound to take judicial notice of these statutes, and of the organization and existence of this court.

U. S. Const. art. 6, § 2; Jack v. Martin, 12 Wend. 311; Hatcher v. Rocheleau, 18 N. Y. 87, 90, 91.

The record of the judgment recovered in the territorial district court was properly admitted in evidence. The attestation of the clerk, the seal of the court annexed thereto, and the certificate of the judge conform to the requirements of the Acts of Congress.

U. S. R. S. § 905, p. 190, § 6, p. 2.

The introductory clause in the exemplification, taken together with the paragraph at the end of the record, is an attestation by the clerk within the meaning of the Act of Congress, and the certificate by the judge that the exemplification is in due form of law, is a certificate within the same Act that the attestation by the clerk which forms a part of the exemplification is in due form.

Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. 1; Thrasher v. Adams, 32 Ala. 645; Blair v. Caldwell, 3 Mo. 249; Freeman, Judgments, 2d ed. § 412.

There is but one judge for each district court in Utah, and he is assigned to one particular court.

U. S. R. S. §§ 1716, 1907.

The record is as good as an exemplification at common law. An exemplification at common law may be under the great seal or the seal of the court; the great seal in cases of records from foreign courts, and the seal of the court in records from courts of the same common government.

Hatcher v. Rocheleau, 18 N. Y. p. 87; Starkie, Ev. 10th ed. 257, 258, 259; Greenl. Ev. §§ 501, 503; Abb. Trial Ev. p. 536; Code Civ. Proc. § 962.

The judicial record so certified and admitted in evidence was at least prima facie evidence of a legal judgment.

Hatcher v. Rocheleau, 18 N. Y. 87; Bosworth v. Vandewalker, 53 N. Y. 597.

II. The respondent was entitled to recover interest on the judgment in suit, from the recovery thereof in the territorial court until the verdict in this action, at the rate of 10 per cent per annum.

The judgment in the case at bar required the payment of a given sum with interest at a specified rate for a specified time; and the interest at the rate specified is a part of the obligation to be discharged.

O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 433.

This court cannot separate the judgment and give to one part and refuse to the other the full faith and credit required by the Constitution. It is a judgment which it must be presumed the territorial court had the power and jurisdiction to render.

The law of Utah allows interest at 10 per cent per annum.

The judgment in the case at bar is within the saving clause of chapter 538, Laws of 1879 of this State.

The case of Clark v. Childs, The Reporter, Vol. 17, p. 368, cited below by the appellant, and which the general term declined to follow, ought not to be followed by this court.

The cases of Barringer v. King and Hopkins v. Shepard, cited in Clark v. Childs, do not sustain that decision. In neither of these cases did the judgment, so far as the reports show, make the payment of a specified rate of interest for a specified time a part of the judgment as in Clark v. Childs and the case at bar.

The court in Clark v. Childs might with equal justice have inquired into the original recovery in the California judgment, on which its decision was based; and if it found that the recovery therein was based upon a rate of interest exceeding that allowed in Massachusetts, it might have reduced the recovery in Massachusetts in that particular also.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are two questions in this case: first, whether the paper purporting to be a copy of a judgment roll of the District Court of the Third Judicial District of the Territory of Utah, was properly exemplified, and if so then, second, whether the plaintiff was entitled in this action to recover interest at the rate of 10 per cent upon the sum adjudged thereby to be due.

First. The Act of Congress (U. S. R. S. § 905) requires that "The records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any State or Territory shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate that the said attestation is in due form."

These forms seem to have been strictly complied with. After the exemplification of the record under the seal of the court, comes first, the attestation of a judge described as "Judge of the District Court of the Third Judicial District, Territory of Utah," that the exemplification referred to is in due form of law; that O. J. Averell, whose name is subscribed thereto, was at its date clerk of that court; and that the signature of his name is genuine. After that is the certificate of Averell described as clerk of the court referred to, that its records are in his custody as such officer, that the foregoing is a copy of so much of said records as constitutes the judgment record in said cause, that he has compared the same with the original, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and the whole of such original. To this is affixed, as he certifies, his official seal. We have, therefore, a copy of the entire record, the attestation of the clerk, the seal of the court and the certificate of an officer described as "judge" of the court in which the judgment disclosed by the record appears to have been rendered.

The appellant's objection at this point is that the certificate does not show that the person making it was either "sole judge, chief justice or presiding magistrate of the court;" nor that "at the time of making it the court from which it purports to come was composed of one judge only, and that the person making the certificate was that judge."

If this objection had been presented to the trial court and there insisted upon, it would be necessary to consider whether in view of the decisions of other courts, cited by the learned counsel for the appellant, it would not be ground of error. But it was not there pointed out. The objections to the admission of the copy of the judgment were of a different character. It was assumed by the defendant that the provisions of the Laws of the United States applied to the case; but it was said: 1, that no evidence had been offered of the organization of the court "which rendered it" as a territorial court of Utah and that the judgment does not prove the organization of that court; 2, that the certificate of the clerk does not certify that the judge whose signature is attached to the certificate, was a judge of the District Court of Utah, and that the exemplification is not a proper one."

In Burnell v. Weld, 76 N. Y. 103, to which the appellant calls our attention, it appeared that the copy of the record offered in evidence was objected to upon the trial upon the ground that "It was not properly exemplified as required by the Act of Congress, in that there was no certificate of the chief justice," and we were constrained to sustain an appeal from the ruling of the court below, because the defect was specifically pointed out at the time its admission was objected to. It was not so in the case at bar. Had it been, other evidence might have been offered, An objection which could be obviated, if made in time, cannot prevail when taken for the first time in an appellate court.

The same remarks apply to the point now made, also for the first time, that the seal to the attestation clause was put directly upon the paper, whereas it is urged it should have been impressed upon wax or other adhesive substance. Without reference, however, to the Laws of the United States (supra), we think the record was properly certified under the provisions of the Laws of this State and so admissible in evidence.

Second. But we think the court erred in allowing interest upon the cause of action at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. The judgment sued upon was entered in October, 1877, upon a verdict of $7,462.33, and the record recites that "By virtue of the law and the premises aforesaid," the proceedings in the action, "it is ordered and adjudged that said plaintiff have and recover from said defendants the sum of $7,462.33, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent per annum from the date hereof till paid."

Upon the trial the plaintiff's counsel proved, against objection and exception by the defendant, that under the Laws of Utah relating to the subject it was lawful to take 10 per cent interest per annum, when the amount of interest has not been specified or agreed upon, and computed interest upon the recovery from its date at 10 per cent per annum, making at that rate the sum due upon the judgment of principal and interest, $12,063.88. This sum the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover; and the defendant, by proper exceptions to this ruling, and exceptions to the refusal of the court to charge otherwise, has fairly raised the proposition upon which he asks a modification of the judgment which followed this ruling. We think his contention must prevail under the rule already declared by this court that interest is given upon a judgment, not on the principle of implied contract, but as damages for delay in performing the obligation.

In Taylor v. Wing, 84 N. Y 471, the mortgage in terms called for interest at 7 per cent until paid, and by the judgment interest at the same rate was directed to be paid on the amount found due from the date of the decision. Upon appeal this was held to be wrong, and that after judgment the mortgage was merged therein, and thereafter plaintiff was entitled to interest, not by virtue of the mortgage, but of the judgment, and that the interest should have been at the lawful rate, i. e., 6 per cent.

In Prouty v. Lake Shore etc. R. Co. 95 N.Y. 667, the judgment before the court was by its terms payable with interest.

In O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, that provision was lacking; but each judgment was recovered when the statutory rate of interest was 7 per cent; and as to each it was held that the amount of interest to be collected on execution must be governed by statute, and that the rate changed when the general law reduced that rate to 6 per cent. Laws 1879, chap. 538.

The fact that one judgment specifically provided for the payment of interest was not supposed to create any distinction in the application of the law regulating that question. The law of the State made every judgment interest bearing; and the obligation for its payment was not increased or varied by inserting a direction to that effect in the record.

The provision in the judgment of Utah, therefore, in regard to interest, is of no more force in regulating the rate of interest upon suit brought in this State than is the statute of that Territory which justified its court in allowing it. As the increase is allowed, not as interest, but as damages, its measure must be that of the State where the action for its recovery is brought. The lex fori governs. This is the necessary result of the decisions in this court already referred to, and the same doctrine as to similar cases prevails in the courts of Massachusetts. Clark v. Child, 136 Mass. 344.

The respondent relies, as against this position, upon an expression in one of the opinions in the O' Brien Case (supra), to the effect that when a judgment required a specified rate of interest to be paid, the rate specified becomes a part of the obligation to be discharged. That was said in reviewing Prouty v. Lake Shore etc. R. R. Co. supra, a decision in equity which provided for a specific performance of a contract between parties in respect to certain dividends in arrear, directed to be paid, "with interest thereon from the entry of judgment until the same shall have been fully paid and satisfied." The clause was held to be insufficient to justify the collection of interest at 7 per cent after the Act of 1879, although the judgment was recovered before that time, and the remark quoted was by way of argument merely, not essential to a disposition of any question upon which the case finally turned, nor to the conclusion that interest upon a judgment was allowable by way of penalty or damages for default. Concerning it neither the law of Utah nor the judgment can have extraterritorial force.

It seems to me, therefore, that the interest to be allowed as damages in this case should be governed by the law in force in this State at the time of the trial (Laws 1879, chap. 538), viz.: 6 per cent; but a majority of the court are of opinion that the plaintiff may properly recover 7 per cent interest from the time of the rendition of the judgment in Utah until the Act of 1879 (supra) took effect, and from that time at the rate of 6 per cent.

The judgment should, therefore, be modified by deducting the difference between these rates for the times specified, and interest at 10 per cent, and as so modified, affirmed, without costs in this court.

All concur except Earl and Finch, JJ., who vote for general affirmance.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment entered in Erie County on report of a referee in favor of plaintiff on the third trial of an action to recover penalties under chapter 163, Laws of 1870. Reversed.

This action was commenced in 1878, to recover penalties incurred by taking illegal discounts in the discounting of commercial paper. It was first tried before a referee, who dismissed the complaint. On appeal to the general term this judgment was affirmed; but on appeal to this court it was reversed and a new trial granted.

See 68 N. Y. 396.

On the second trial the referee found for the plaintiff. On appeal, the general term reversed his decision and ordered a new trial. On the third trial, the referee again found for the plaintiff. Judgment entered on such finding was affirmed by the general term (see 37 Hun, 57), and defendant appealed to this court.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

*An Act to amend chapter 163 of the Laws of 1870, entitled "An Act to Amend the Act entitled 'An Act to Authorize the Business of Banking,' passed April 18, 1838."

Passed June 4, 1880.

Section 1. Section 1 of chapter 163 of the Laws of 1870, entitled "An Act to Amend the Act Entitled 'An Act to Authorize the Business of Banking,' passed April 18, 1838," is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

Sec. 1. Every banking association organized and doing business under and by virtue of the Act entitled "An Act to Authorize the Business of Banking," passed April 18, 1838, and the various Acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and every private or individual banker or bankers doing business in this State, are hereby authorized to take, receive, reserve and charge on every loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill or other evidence of debt has to run. The knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon; and, in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same; Provided, That such action is commenced within two years from the time the said excess of interest is taken. But the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, note or other evidence of debt, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, or a reasonable charge for collecting the same, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest than 6 per cent per annum.

Sec. 2. Section 2 of said chapter 163 of the Laws of 1870 is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

Sec. 2. It is hereby declared that the true intent and meaning of this Act is to place and continue the banking associations organized and doing business as aforesaid on an equality, in the particulars in this Act referred to, with the national banks organized under the Act of Congress, entitled "An Act to Provide a National Currency, Secured by a Pledge of United States Bonds, and to Provide for the Circulation and Redemption Thereof," approved June 3, 1864. And all Acts and parts of Acts inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. This Act shall take effect immediately.

†An Act to Amend the Act entitled "An Act to Authorize the Business of Banking," passed April 18, 1838.

Passed April 9, 1870.

Sec. 1. Every banking association organized and doing business under and by virtue of the Act entitled "An Act to Authorize the Business of Banking," passed April 18, 1838, and the various Acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, is hereby authorized to take, receive, reserve and charge on every loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt has to run. The knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon: and, in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same; Provided, That such action is commenced within two years from the time the said excess of interest is taken. But the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, note or other evidence of debt, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, or a reasonable charge for collecting the same, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest than 7 per cent per annum.

Sec. 2. It is hereby declared that the true intent and meaning of this Act is to place the banking associations organized and doing business as aforesaid, on an equality, in the particulars in this Act referred to, with the national banks organized under the Act of Congress entitled, "An Act to Provide a National Currency, Secured by a Pledge of United States Bonds, and to Provide for the Circulation and Redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864. And all Acts and parts of Acts inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Sec. 3. This Act shall take effect immediately.

‡An Act to repeal certain Acts and parts of Acts. Passed December 10, 1828.

Sec. 5. The repeal of any statutory provision by this Act, shall not affect any act done, or right accrued or established, or any proceeding, suit or prosecution had or commenced in any civil case, previous to the time when such repeal shall take effect; but every such act, right and proceeding shall remain as valid and effectual as if the provision so repealed had remained in force.

Mr. Sherman S. Rogers, for appellant:

The Act of 1880 repealed the Statute of 1870, by declaring that it should thenceforth read in a way which defined a different offense and provided for its punishment a different penalty. By the amendment the penalty for which the plaintiff sues was repealed.

Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 95–97; Knox v. Baldwin, 80 N. Y. 610, 613; Moore v. Mausert, 49 N. Y. 332.

A penal statute must speak not only in its prohibition from the time the offense was committed, but in its penalty, at the time the infliction of the penalty is demanded; and we have the right to call upon the respondent to show an existing statute which denounces a penalty of twice the excess above 7 per cent.

It may be that a casus omissus is here presented. The Legislature may have thought the statute, after its amendment, would reach offenses theretofore committed. But their error cannot be corrected by judicial construction.

Commonwealth v. Kimball, 21 Pick. 376.

The re-enactment of a statute, with amendments, repeals the original statute, so far as prospective action thereunder or the future enforcement of penalties for past offenses is concerned, unless the penalty under the amended statute is for doing something which would have been an offense under the original statute, and unless, also, the penalty for its commission is the same in kind under the amended statute as it was under the original, and not greater in amount or degree.

The repeal of a criminal or penal statute ends all prosecutions under it, and will even arrest a judgment in such an action.

Rex v. Justices of the Peace of London, 3 Burr. 1456; Miller's Case, 1 W. Bl. 451; Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 324; Maryland v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 3 How. 534 (44 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 714); Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 95; Knox v. Baldwin, 80 N. Y. 610; Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 429 (54 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 210); Commonwealth v. Marshall, 11 Pick. 350.

That the statute in question is penal in its character cannot be doubted. The penalty is twice the excess of interest. The case is, therefore, not at all like those in which vested rights acquired under civil remedies provided by the Legislature have been held to be unaffected by a repeal of the statute under which these rights have been obtained.

People v. Supervisors, 4 Barb. 64; Knox v. Baldwin, 80 N. Y. 610.

If the statute were not penal, the Legislature could not devest the right to the action and recovery; but it has been repeatedly decided and is settled law that the Legislature has full control over the usury laws of the State.

Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 153, 154.

Mr. Joel L. Walker, for respondent:

The Statute of 1870 was a statute of indemnity; the right of action was given to enable the one who paid the illegal interest to enforce restitution of what the bank had wrongfully taken from him; and in this view the Legislature had not the power to repeal it. The right to the money claimed was vested in the plaintiff by law, from the moment the illegal interest was paid.

The statute gives the right of action not to some public officer for the use of the public, nor to an informer, but to him who was wronged by the extortion. It emphasizes the purpose to make his estate good in case of his death, by giving the right of action to his legal representatives. The words of the statute, in saying it may be "recovered back," look only to indemnity.

The action is penal in its nature and involves the purpose not only to redress an injury but also to punish a wrong; and the penalty is given only to the party who suffered loss by the wrong, by way of reparation.

See 1 R. S. part 2, chap. 4, title 3, §§ 3, 4, p. 772.

The entire Act is confined to the single purpose of regulating the rights as against each other of the parties to the paper discounted.

Per Curiam:

We are of opinion that the effect of the Act of 1880, chap. 567, was to repeal the penalties imposed by chapter 163, of the Laws of 1870, and that consequently this action, which was brought under the Act of 1870, could no longer be maintained, the Act of 1880 containing no provision saving pending actions or existing rights of action.

The provisions of the General Repealing Act of 1828, §§ 6 and 7, related only to the Acts repealed by that statute, and had no effect on subsequent legislation. Mongeon v. People, 55 N. Y. 613.

If the Act of 1870 was repealed by the Act of 1880, the subsequent legislation cannot affect this case, for it could not revive an extinguished cause of action.

The judgment must be reversed and complaint dismissed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. A. P. Bates, for appellants:

The assessment and water sales were void. The assessment was void, therefore the sale was also. The assessment was levied April 12, 1867, and was levied in the namé of George A. Powers as owner. He never was the owner. The owners from 1831 to 1882 were the executors of Thomas Poole, deceased.

The fee was in them in trust. This is the third of the express trusts created by statute.

2 R. S. p. 1106, § 55, 6th ed.

During the trust the fee is in the trustees and the survivors of them.

2 R. S. p. 1109, § 73.

The assessment should have been against them, naming them as trustees and executors of estate of Thomas Poole, deceased; otherwise it was void.

Trowbridge v. Horan, 78 N. Y. 439; 2 R. S. 989, §§ 1, 2, 3, 7th ed.; Chapman v. Brooklyn, 40 N. Y. 372; Crooke v. Andrews, 40 N. Y. 547; *Nat. The lands sold were vacant property; the assessment could then only be against the owner as owner.

When assessed against the occupant, it must name him as occupant.

DuBois v. Webster, 7 Hun, 371.

None of the water Acts provide for a notice. The rates are all unconstitutional, and may be attacked collaterally.

No notice can be implied.

It does not follow, from the assessments being void, that plaintiffs or even Lynch made a voluntary payment and cannot recover. There can be no voluntary payment, if the assessment or tax be regular on its face. It then has the force of a judgment, the payment is coerced by law.

Bank of Commonwealth v. Mayor, 43 N. Y. 188, 189; Peyser v. Mayor, 70 N.Y. 497; Bruecher v. Portchester, 2 Cent. Rep. 90, 101 N. Y. 240.

A voluntary payment cannot be made without the freedom of exercising the will.

Even Lynch was not by the order of the court justified in paying this money, because the assessments being void were no liens or clouds on the property.

In the case at bar the money was deposited also under a contract of sale in order to get the sale through, for plaintiffs to make payment of liens held by the City against their other property, under section 8, chapter 114, Laws 1883.

When there is no jurisdiction of the assessing officers who impose a tax or assessment, money paid on same may be recovered back.

The office of registrar of arrears is an office of record (Laws 1873, § 3, p. 1374); and these assessments, water rates and sales stood there, presumptively a lien on these lands.

The statute under which the payment in question was made is the last portion of section 8, p. 1320, Laws of 1873.

As the findings state it the amount paid was paid to redeem. The statute provides that "Such redemption discharged the land" from the lien of the assessment or water rate.

So, according to the findings, prepared by both plaintiffs and defendant, and by the bill of complaint itself, the payment was made to obtain the discharge of this land.

The discharge desired was from the claim of Wheeler; the City had no claim; it had sold its claim to Wheeler; it received this money for Wheeler; it had no right to receive it for anyone else.

The money having been paid to the City for Wheeler, and its payment having had the effect of at once discharging his liens, the money now clearly belongs to him.

The payment having been made by Lynch, and he being now the owner of the land, he is the only party that can bring an action to cancel the lien and reclaim the money.

Atlantic Dock Co. v. Mayor of N. Y. 53 N. Y. 64.

The plaintiffs could not have maintained an action to cancel these sales.

Marsh v. Brooklyn, 59 N. Y. 280.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to restrain the City of Brooklyn from paying over to the defendant, Wheeler, the sum of $1,986.05, and to compel it to pay the same to plaintiffs as the owner thereof.

The facts as alleged in the complaint and found by the trial judge are substantially as follows:

The plaintiffs, four of whom are infants, were the owners of a tract of land in the City of Brooklyn which had been incumbered by taxes, assessments, water rates and certificates of tax sales to a large amount. In 1883 proceedings were instituted in the supreme court in behalf of the infant plaintiffs, for the sale of a portion of the land in order to obtain money to pay, under section 8, chapter 114 of the Laws of 1883, such taxes and assessments as could be paid thereunder to the City of Brooklyn on the balance of the land; and the result of such proceedings was a sale, in which the adult plaintiffs joined, to one Lynch in September, 1883.

The order confirming the sale, and directing the deeds to be given, directed the special guardian of the infant plaintiffs and the adult owners to receive the consideration money payable by Lynch as stipulated in his contract with them "excepting thereout such sum or sums as said Lynch shall pay in the discharge of taxes, water rates and assessments and sales for each of the same, in order to free said premises or any portion thereof from the liens of the same or the clouds thereon."

Lynch, thereafter, among other payments, paid to the registrar of arrears of the City of Brooklyn, to redeem a portion of the land purchased by him from a sale thereof under assessments for flagging sidewalks, the sum of $1,171.20; and he also paid the sum of $814.85, to redeem land purchased by him from sales thereof for the water rates assessed thereon from the years 1864 to 1870 both inclusive.

These payments by Lynch to the registrar of arrears were deducted out of the consideration money which by his contract he was to pay the plaintiffs for the land deeded to him. The assessments for the water rates were all levied against vacant land, and no notice was given to the owners of the fee at any stage of the levying of such assessments. The sums so paid to the City of Brooklyn are now held by it; but it claims no ownership of the same or any part thereof, or any lien thereon. The defendant Wheeler claimed to hold the certificates of the tax sales and to be entitled to the money thus paid to the City of Brooklyn.

The plaintiffs claim that all the assessments were illegal and the sales invalid; and the defendant Wheeler claims that the various taxes, assessments and water rates and the tax sales were legal and valid, and that he was the owner and holder of the certificates and liens for assessments and water rates, and that the money paid to the City on account thereof was a voluntary payment, and that the title to such money was in him.

The City interposed no answer and made no defense to the action. The trial judge defeated the plaintiffs on the ground that the money was voluntarily paid to the City for the use and benefit of Wheeler and that the plaintiffs had no ownership of the money nor right to obtain or have the same. And upon the same ground substantially the judgment of the special term was affirmed by the general term, as appears by the opinion there pronounced.

If these assessments for flagging and water rates were legally imposed, and the sales under them valid, then the plaintiffs have no standing to maintain this action.

We agree with Judge Finch, for the reasons stated in his opinion, that it does not appear in this record that the assessments for sidewalk flagging were invalid; but we are of opinion that the assessments for water rates were invalid and that the sales under the same were wholly unauthorized and illegal.

In the City of Brooklyn there was a system of water works and a board of water commissioners; and section 24, chapter 396, of the Laws of 1859, provides as follows: "The said water board shall, in every year, by resolution, fix the price which shall be assessed * * * upon every vacant lot situated upon any street, lane, alley, or court through or into which distributing pipes shall have been laid, until the bonds issued for the construction of the said works, with the interest thereon, shall have been paid, and thereafter they shall be adjusted so as to, with other provisions of this Act for income from said works, meet the expense of repairs, maintenance and extension of the works. * * * Such sums so assessed, together with percentages for defaults * * * shall be a lien upon the said premises respectively, and the same may be collected and enforced in the same manner as taxes are collected and enforced against land in said City."

The lots of the plaintiffs were vacant, and hence were assessed and assessable for water rates under this section. As no use of the water could be made upon vacant lots, it must have been intended that whatever assessment was made upon them under this section was to be apportioned according to the value of the lots, or the benefits to them, or the cost of bringing the water to them respectively. It cannot be supposed that it was the legislative intent or the practical operation of the section that a vacant lot worth $1,000 should be assessed for water rates as much as one worth $100,000.

Unless this section requires the assessment for water rates upon vacant lots to be imposed and apportioned according to values, benefits or costs, it could not be justified as a scheme of taxation, and would be obnoxious to constitutional objections. Therefore, in reference to the imposition of these assessments, as in reference to the imposition of other assessments and taxes, the lot owners were entitled at some stage of the proceeding to a notice and an opportunity to be heard; and unless the law gave them the right to notice and an opportunity to be heard before the board which was authorized to impose the assessments, it was unconstitutional and void for the reason stated in Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183.

Our attention has been called to no statute which required the water board to give the lot owners any notice of the levying of these assessments or any opportunity to be heard in reference to them. No notice was in fact given; and the assessments were therefore wholly illegal and void, and they did not become a lien upon the lots or a cloud upon their title. While it may be unfortunate for the City of Brooklyn to have its system for the imposition of assessments for water rates upon vacant lots thus condemned, it is better that it should be done now before greater complications and more mischief may come from such illegal assessments and void sales made for their enforcement. The rules laid down in Stuart v. Palmer are salutary and important, and, for the protection of personal rights and private property, must be enforced in all cases to which they are applicable.

It is claimed, however, on the part of the defendant Wheeler, that, notwithstanding his tax certificates may be illegal and void, he is still entitled to receive this money from the City. He contends that the money paid to discharge the assessments for water rates did not belong to these plaintiffs but belonged to Lynch; that they have no concern with it, and that their remedy is against Lynch for the unpaid balance of the purchase money. But the record shows that the money was paid by Lynch for them. They consented that the requisite sum should be deducted from the consideration money payable to them, and applied upon these assessments, and after the payment was made they allowed it and received the balance.

By bringing this action they have ratified the payment so far as concerns Lynch, and upon the facts as they now appear they would certainly fail in an action against him to recover the same amount of money as unpaid purchase money. So even if Lynch under the terms of the order made by the court which is above set out was not strictly authorized to make the payment, yet they allowed him to make it out of their money and subsequently ratified his action. Wheeler cannot therefore dispute that this money was the money of the plaintiffs and was in effect paid by them.

The further point is made that this money to discharge the assessment was voluntarily paid to the City for the use and benefit of Wheeler, and that therefore the plaintiffs cannot claim it. But the money has not reached the hands of Wheeler. It is in the possession of the City, which is a mere depositary, and this action is brought to prevent its payment to Wheeler. Until the money reaches his hands and thus becomes his it could not be deemed a voluntary payment to him. The City may be deemed to be the agent of both parties in reference to the money. It has reached its treasury through some mistake either on the part of the plaintiffs or of Lynch; and until the payment has become effctual by delivery to Wheeler, we do not think the doctrine of voluntary payment is applicable on his behalf, and the plaintiffs can reclaim it. The City does not set up voluntary payment to it; nor does it claim the money.

If it is deemed important that Lynch should be made a party to this action to protect his rights or to conclude him by any judgment which may be rendered therein, he can be made a party before the new trial which we are constrained to grant.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

Finch, J., dissenting:

The plaintiffs, some of whom were infants, became the owners of a number of Brooklyn lots which were heavily incumbered by taxes, assessments, water rates and certificates of sale. The enactment of the Law of 1883 permitted a redemption at very reduced expense and the plaintiffs desiring to avail themselves of the opportunity determined to sell a portion of the lots to obtain the means of saving the remainder. Of course it was to be expected that any possible purchaser would stipulate to reserve from the purchase price whatever sums would be necessary to clear and perfect his title beyond all doubt and question and without peril of litigation over any apparent incumbrance.

Such a purchaser the plaintiffs found in James D. Lynch, who agreed to pay for the property a certain sum "Excepting thereout such sum or sums as said Lynch shall pay in discharge of taxes, water rates and assessments and sales for each of the same, in order to free said premises or any portion thereof from the liens thereof or from clouds thereon."

The adult plaintiffs agreed to this stipulation, and the proposed contract (having been reported to the court in proceedings for the sale of the infants' interest) was deemed just and best for their welfare, and a guardian appointed to transfer their title upon the terms of the contract. Code Civ. Proc. § 2358.

That contract signified the vendors' consent that Lynch might use so much of the purchase money as was needed to pay off not only liens but clouds; not merely valid taxes, but apparent liens, not void on their face, but in truth invalid. To that extent his payments bound them exactly as if they had made them themselves; and if they were voluntary payments as to him they were equally so as to them. The lands had been sold to one Andrew S. Wheeler on the 9th of March, 1869, for $366.38, on an assessment levied for the expense of "flagging sidewalks on the west side of Fifth Avenue."

The case contains no evidence of any kind, and the findings do not tell us under what law the assessment was made, or whether the flagging charged for was wholly in front of plaintiffs' premises or an estimated part of a general expense. We are told only that the taxes were "levied against George A. Powers as owner." The case does not show when the assessment was levied, nor that at that date George A. Powers was not the owner of some freehold estate or interest therein. The findings show that one Thomas Poole was seised in fee of the property in 1831, and died in that year, leaving a will by which he devised the premises to his executors in trust to permit his daughter Eliza to occupy them during her life, or in trust to rent the lands during the same period and pay the rents to her; and at her death the will gave the fee to her issue who might then be living.

Eliza died in 1882, after all the assessments complained of were made, and either had a life estate which she could have transferred to George A. Powers, or the executors had one which they could have conveyed to him. In either event he would have been liable to assessment as owner; and so we cannot say that the assessment was invalid for that reason, which is the only objection made. There may be others but it is not our duty to search for them. The appellants have rested their case as to the alleged invalidity of this assessment upon the sole ground that it was made against one who was not at the time the owner. They have failed to prove the fact upon which the error claimed rests and we need go no further in the inquiry, and especially not when no adequate basis for such inquiry is furnished.

The plaintiffs, therefore, made no case in any view of the subject as to the assessment for flagging. It may have been shown on the trial that George A. Powers had a lease for the life of Eliza and so an estate of inheritance or some conveyance of the remainder. The briefs indicate that some lease to him was proved and was made the subject of comment at general term. The complaint charged that all the sales were illegal because "levied or charged to a person or persons as owner or owners of said premises who were not the owner or owners thereof nor the occupant thereof." There is not only no finding that George A. Powers was not owner, but none that he was not occupant, and the original charter of Brooklyn (Laws 1854, p. 864, § 30) provides that land occupied by a person other than the owner may be assessed in the name of the occupant.

The finding that the water rates were levied against vacant property is a finding as to the form of the assessment but is not a finding that the lots were actually vacant, and especially not that they were so when the flagging assessments were levied, the date of which is not shown. We think their invalidity was not established, and the plaintiffs' action must fail as to them.

We come now to the water rates which are found to have been levied against vacant property and against George A. Powers as owner, against unknown owners, and against one Sammis as owner. We are referred in the appellants' brief to the Brooklyn Water Act as the only authority for these assessments. Laws 1859, chap. 396.

We are aware of no other. Three forms of water rates seem to be contemplated and may be described as "regular rents," "special rates" and assessments against vacant property. §§ 18, 24.

The first two are to be fixed by ordinance of the common council, but the third by the water commissioners.

We must assume from the findings that the rates here assailed were levied against the property as vacant and therefore by the water commissioners. Section 24 (supra) authorizes them to "fix the price which shall be assessed" "upon every vacant lot situated upon any street, lane, alley, or court through or into which distributing pipes shall have been laid," and makes the "sums so assessed" and the "percentages for default" a lien upon the lands and to be enforced like other assessments.

No notice to anyone and no opportunity to be heard is given by the Act; and it is wholly immaterial whether the water is used or not; and the plaintiffs contend that for such defect the Act is unconstitutional and the water rates absolutely void. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N.Y. 183.

These water rates, at least as to vacant property, are called assessments and are in their nature such; and it is difficult, if not impossible, to see how they can be sustained. But the question is a very important one and need not here be decided, since if we concede the appellants' claim in that respect, it does not save their action. If the Act under which the water rates were assessed is unconstitutional, they were void on their face, and did not even constitute a cloud. Under his contract, therefore, Lynch had no authority to pay them out of the purchase price; and when he did so, simply paid his own money to the City for purposes of his own with which the plaintiffs have no concern.

Lynch remains liable on his contract for the balance unpaid and may be sued for it by the plaintiffs, but the money he needlessly paid was his own which he could use in that manner if he pleased. It was not plaintiffs' money in any sense, or withheld under the contract. If, therefore, appellants are right as to the constitutional question, it still does not enable them to maintain this action. They sue to recover money which is not theirs and to remove a cloud which is not such. They are not helped by the finding that they have settled with Lynch and adopted and ratified his payments if that is what the finding means. The adult plaintiffs could bind themselves by such an agreement, but when they did Lynch's payment to the City became theirs; the payment was voluntary and without the shadow of compulsion and cannot be recovered back.

The infants if they are not bound have not lost their money. It remains in the hands of their vendee, who is bound under his contract to pay it to them as an unpaid part of the purchase price.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment and order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Circuit in favor of plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action for the conversion of corn. Affirmed.

The facts material to the questions decided appear from the opinion.

Mr. Edward S. Hatch, for appellants.

Mr. H. Morrison, for respondent.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, being the owner of certain corn, alleged and proved that the defendants had converted it to their own use, to his damage $2,829.60. The defendants at the time of the conversion were warehousemen and bankers. They proved in substance that they received the corn from the firm of Littell & Co., commission merchants, advanced money to them on account of it, and insisted that they were entitled to hold the corn until this advance was repaid.

It appeared that the plaintiff had consigned the corn to Littell & Co. for sale. They therefore had possession and were the apparent owners; and the trial judge charged the jury that the defendants could keep the corn as security for the money so advanced, provided they did not at the time know that the plaintiff was the owner of the corn; on the other hand if they knew that Littell & Co. were using the plaintiff's property to raise money for themselves, then the defendants could not hold the corn, and stood in Littell & Co.'s place. To this part of the charge the defendants excepted.

It presents the only point in the case, and to sustain it the appellants rely upon the Factors' Act, Laws 1830, chap. 179.

That Act was to protect persons dealing in good faith with the apparent owners of property, and has no possible application to a case where protection would secure to a wrong doer the fruits of fraud.

Many other propositions have been argued for the appellants, but they are raised by no exception and are not warranted by any evidence to be found in the appeal book.

The trial judge in denying a new trial, and the general term in affirming the judgment, properly disposed of the case.

The judgment and order appealed from should, therefore, be affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit on a verdict for plaintiffs in an action to recover a balance due for lumber belonging to plaintiffs, sold by defendants. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Esek Cowen, with Mr. Joseph W. Howe, for appellants:

In order to entitle plaintiffs to recover they were bound to prove not only that Hall & Co. sold the lumber to the defendants as the agents of McLachlin Brothers, but at the time of the sale the defendants knew or had sufficient information to fairly infer the existence of an actual agency, or that the circumstances were such as fairly to put the defendants on inquiry.

All the lumber was bought prior to the knowledge on defendants' part that plaintiffs were the real owners.

The court, in charging the jury and in ruling upon the proposition of the defense, relied upon the case of Wright v. Cabot, 89 N. Y. 574, which was in part twice quoted to the jury. In that case the sellers had, during four months of negotiation prior to the sale to the defendants, disclosed their agency; and the case was not an authority for the position it was cited to support.

The contract, deal or transaction in this case was complete when, first, the defendants entered into a binding contract with Hall & Co. to take from them 900,000 feet of lumber; and, second, when Hall & Co., without the knowledge or consent of the defendants, elected to fill that order with the plaintiffs' lumber. The contract was then made and the liabilities of the several parties fixed. As the undisclosed principals of Hall & Co. the plaintiffs were parties to the contract of sale, and could enforce it against the defendants.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts in the case are substantially undisputed. For some years previous to 1875 the defendants had been in the habit of purchasing lumber in Canada of Hall & Co., dealing with that firm as owners and in their own name. In the process a large indebtedness had accrued in favor of the defendants, which the parties expected would be reduced by the sale of a quantity of shooks consigned by Hall & Co. to the defendants to be sold by them on commission. While the shooks remained unsold, and the indebtedness referred to stood unbalanced or unaffected by their proceeds, and on or about September 23, 1875, the defendants made a contract with Hall & Co. for the sale and delivery to them of 600,000 feet of specified lumber upon a credit of three months. The order was very soon increased to 900,000 feet which, at the agreed price, would have amounted to more than the outstanding debt, irrespective of the proceeds of the unsold shooks.

This contract of purchase and sale was made binding by telegrams and letters which sufficiently manifested the terms of the agreement. The agreement was of course executory and remained to be performed, the respective parties having only the right to compel performance or recover damages for a breach. Before any of the lumber arrived at New York, and before title to any of it had vested in the defendants, the latter were in substance informed that the lumber shipped and on the way was not the property of Hall & Co., but was owned by other parties for whom Hall & Co. were acting as agents. While some criticism is expended upon the manner and tenor of this notification, we deem it quite sufficient to charge defendants with a knowledge that Hall & Co. were not the owners of the lumber with which they were proposing to fulfil their contract. The defendants accepted the lumber with this knowledge. It turns out that the insolvency of Hall & Co., and a seriously diminished return from the sale of the shooks, have left a portion of the debt due from Hall & Co. unpaid, which balance the defendants claim to offset in this action brought by the real owners of the lumber; and whether that offset should be allowed or rejected, as the courts below have determined, is the principal question presented by this appeal.

The reasoning of the learned counsel for the appellants is founded substantially upon the validity and binding force of the executory contract of purchase and sale at its date. He answers the authorities which deny the right of offset when notice of an agency and different ownership is given "before the contract is completed;" Moore v. Clementson, 2 Camp. N. P. 22; "before they are delivered or paid for;" Barbour, Set-off, pp. 135–6; "before the factor delivers goods in his own name;" Rabone v. Williams, 7 Term Rep. 360, note; "by something which transpired before the contract was completed;" Hogan v. Shorb, 24 Wend. 463; by insisting that they relate to cases in which the sale and delivery are concurrent acts and there is no contract without the delivery: and he claims that in the present case the rights of the parties were fixed when the contract itself was made; that the right of set-off at once accrued and when the principal sued and took the benefit of his agent's contract he was liable also for its burdens.

We think the error of this reasoning lies in the assumption that the defendants obtained a right of set-off at the moment the contract was made. We are unable to admit that proposition. The contract was executory. While it remained such it created no debt due to Hall & Co., against which there could be a set-off. Out of that contract a debt due from the defendants might or might not arise; and until it did there was nothing upon which a counter demand could be applied. The defendants were not at once liable for the purchase price of the lumber. Until its delivery or tender, in accordance with the contract terms, the vendees were not bound to pay or give their note, and until those conditions performed created a debt there was none so existing as even to raise the question of offset.

If the vendors did not perform the vendees would owe them nothing for the lumber, but on the contrary would merely have a further claim for breach of contract. At the date of the contract the added fact must be noted that the real claim of the defendants was unknown and unliquidated, and could not be finally ascertained until the proceeds of the shooks were determined by a sale. The debt was only liquidated in part. It was subject to reduction by the property already received from Hall & Co., but the proceeds of which were unknown. The right of off-set, therefore, did not and could not arise at the date of the contract, and sprang up, if at all, at the date of delivery. But, before that, notice of another ownership intervened. When the lumber came, and the vendee saw that the vendor, on a contract made with him as owner, was seeking to perform as agent, and instead of fulfilling his own obligation was substituting performance by another, such vendee could refuse the substituted performance in any case where his rights or interests would be injuriously affected by the change.

Brett & Co. had been long dealing with Hall & Co. as owners, and in the process mutual accounts had been steadily debited and credited and applied one upon the other. When the purchase was made, the balance, so far as ascertained, was largely against the vendors and may have been made either as to quantity or price for that very reason. In such a case the vendees undoubtedly had a right to refuse to come under obligations to the new creditor and did not break their contract with Hall & Co. if they stand upon such refusal. But, being at liberty to refuse, and to demand performance by Hall & Co., under the existing circumstances and relations, in strict accord with their contract, they were also at liberty to accept the lumber with the necessary consequence that the whole purchase price should become due to the real and disclosed owner, and none of it to Hall & Co. except as agents for that owner.

And so it follows that the authorities stand upon just principles when they assert that the set-off is lost if the principal is disclosed before the goods are delivered or the payment made. The vendee is not then acting in the dark, and has his liberty of action remaining, at least, where his interests may be affected by the change of creditors, and so can have no equity to use the goods of one man to pay the debt of another. If he refuses, as he may, his contract relation with his vendor remains, and all his rights and remedies under it. But if he accepts, he cannot complain that his rights are changed and harmed, since the acceptance is his free and voluntary act, made with full knowledge and without being misled.

Certain questions of evidence remain to be briefly considered. One of the defendants was asked whether he ever knew, or supposed, or suspected that Hall & Co. were not the principals in the transaction. The question was certainly too broad. It could not have been truthfully answered in the negative, for the witness admits that he heard of plaintiffs' claim directly from them in April, 1876. Indeed, he was permitted to answer that he knew of no such agency before February of that year, which covered the material portion of the time.

He was also asked who he understood to be the owner of the lumber at the time of the sale and delivery. The facts as to the notice given were proved. His understanding or misunderstanding of them could not alter what they disclosed. The letter of February 10, 1876, was not objected to because written by Cooper. When offered it was shown to the witness and he was asked "Is that the signature of Brett, Son & Co. by Cooper?" and answered, "It is." The objection was immaterial and incompetent, and as being subsequent to this lumber transaction. There was no suggestion that the letter was not that of the firm, or was written without their knowledge or authority, which appears to be the present ground of complaint.

Other questions we have examined, but need not discuss.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

v.

Joseph LEERET et al., Appts.

Plaintiff was employed by defendants, in making wooden boxes, on the second floor of their manufactory. The lumber used was planed on the floor below, and passed up to the second floor through a trap door made for the purpose, over which plaintiff had to pass in getting the lumber. The employees of defendants on the lower floor had been instructed by the foreman not to push the trap door open from below, but to wait until it was opened from above. The door was, however, on a certain occasion pushed open from below by one of such employees, and the plaintiff, who was at the moment passing over the door, fell through the opening and was injured. The plaintiff was well acquainted with the location and use of the door. Held, on the facts, that the negligence of plaintiff's coemployee was the proximate cause of the injury, and that the employers were not liable therefor, the plaintiff having assumed the hazard of the situation by continuing in the employment with knowledge thereof.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga Circuit on a verdict for plaintiff of $5,000 damages in an action to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. T. K. Fuller, for appellants:

The immediate and sole cause of the plaintiff's injuries was the careless, unauthorized and negligent act of a coservant, engaged in the same general employment; and the plaintiff cannot recover.

The servant is bound to see patent and obvious defects in machinery or other instrumentalities of the business, and when he goes into the service of a person or continues therein, knowing that the instrumentalities employed are unsafe or dangerous, he takes the risk of their use upon himself, and cannot hold the master responsible for injuries resulting therefrom.

The rule that a master is bound to furnish suitable and safe machinery for his servants is clear; but it is also settled by authority that the master may, as against his servant, choose his own appliances, and that if the risk be apparent to ordinary observation or as obvious to the servant as to the master, the servant assumes it.

As showing that this case should be disposed of upon the ground of the risk being assumed by plaintiff, attention is respectfully called to the striking analogy which it bears in its facts and circumstances to the following cases, which were disposed of upon that ground:

Karl v. Maillard, 3 Bosw. 591; Gibson v. Erie R. Co., DeForest v. Jewett, and Sweeney v. Berlin & Jones Envelope Co. supra; Kennedy v. Manhattan R. Co. 33 Hun, 457.

Messrs. Waters & McLennan, for respondent:

The fact that the defendants constructed a way for their employees to travel in, and required them to use that way, the way being solely for defendants' own use and convenience, and maintained in the area beneath it a pit, would seem to bring the case within the principle of Congreve v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 79, requiring the defendants to keep the way over the pit absolutely safe, and hence render them liable for any neglect to keep the way absolutely safe.

The rule that an employee takes the natural risks of his employment has no application if the employer omits to provide a safe working place, so that the injury is not entirely caused by the negligence of the fellow servant, but, in part, at least, is the result of that omission of duty. In such a case the negligence of the coservant will not exonerate the employer from the consequences of his own default.

Ellis v. New York etc. R. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 546, 552.

The defendants owed to the plaintiff the duty of furnishing him with a safe and proper place in which to prosecute his work, and safe and secure appliances, and skillful and competent workmen to assist him.

Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. 99 N. Y. 368; Stringham v. Stewart, 1 Cent. Rep. 779, 100 N. Y. 516; Plank v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 60 N. Y. 607.

No one of these duties can be delegated by the master to any servant so as to exonerate the master from responsibility to another servant who has been injured by its nonperformance.

Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. 99 N. Y. 368.

Neither is the master excused from such liability by the fact that the negligence of a fellow servant of the plaintiff may have contributed to the injury.

Stringham v. Stewart, supra.

The degree of care and vigilance which the defendants owed to the plaintiff is expressed by the phrase, "the highest degree of care and prudence; the utmost human skill and foresight."

Coddington v. Brooklyn C. R. R. Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 913, 102 N. Y. 66; Kelsey v. Barney, 12 N. Y. 425.

The duty of keeping the pit covered while plaintiff was necessarily using the way as a way and as a working place, and until notice that it was about to be changed into a hauling place, was a duty of the master which could not be delegated; the defective construction made this duty imperative.

Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 46.

The rule that the servant assumes all the perils which belong to the work itself does not and should not apply to accidents or injuries resulting from extrinsic causes, and circumstances which cannot be foreseen by him, and which, by the exercise of ordinary care and caution, he could not anticipate and prevent.

Ryan v. Fowler, 24 N. Y. 410.

The rule which excuses a master from liability to a servant for injuries caused by the negligence of a coservant presupposes that the master has performed the duties which the law imposes upon him, and that no negligence in this respect contributed to the injury.

Stringham v. Stewart, supra.

The negligence of Schmidt was defendants' negligence and the acts of the servant were defendants' acts, whether he failed from lack of ability or lack of vigilance.

Mott v. Consumers Ice Co. 73 N. Y. 543.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff by the lamentable accident which is the subject of this action, has sustained a most severe and probably permanent injury. The question which we are to determine respects the liability of the defendants on whose premises it happened and between whom and the plaintiff existed at the time the relation of master and servant. The basis of the claim to charge the defendants with the consequences of the accident is negligence. The jury have found upon this issue in favor of the plaintiff. We are called upon to determine whether the evidence supports a recovery and justifies the judgment rendered.

The defendants were engaged in the manufacture of boxes and other articles from wood, and for the purposes of their business occupied a building of two stories, in which the various processes of dressing rough lumber, cutting it into suitable lengths and forms, and manufacturing the same into boxes and other articles, were conducted. The planing machines were on the first floor and the men employed in this department were in charge of a foreman. The saws and cutting machines were on the second floor over the planers, and the lumber after it had been planed in the room below was passed up by men employed in that room to the upper room through a trap door in the floor of the second story, and there piled on either side the space between the trap door and the north and south walls of the building, leaving a space or alley way between the ends of the piles.

The cutting machines were near the north wall, and the planed lumber was taken from the piles to the cutting machines and cut into the lengths and forms required. The west side of the second story was used as the nailing room, in which workmen were employed in putting together pieces obtained from the cutting room and making them into boxes. Each nailer procured the pieces he needed for his particular work by passing from the nailing room through a door in the partition dividing the nailing room from the cutting room, and thence through the passage way made by the two piles of lumber to the cutting machine, where they selected an armful of pieces and took them by the same passage way to the nailing room.

The trap door was in the passage way. It was constructed of two thicknesses of boards with cleats, was quite heavy, weighing, as stated by one witness, fifty pounds, and swung to the north, and in this door on the top was a staple and ring for raising it from above. The opening in the floor was about three feet square. The trap door was firm and solid, and it is not claimed that it was out of repair or was in any way defective.

The plaintiff was a nailer in the box room and had been engaged in this business in this place for twenty-two months prior to the accident. On the occasion of the injury he was returning from the cutting room through the passage way to the nailing room, carrying in arms a large load of pieces, and was in the act of stepping upon the trap door when it was suddenly and without notice thrown open from below, and he fell with his load to the lower floor, sustaining the injuries complained of.

The trap door was placed in the floor seven or eight years before the accident. It was conveniently located for the purpose designed, and was placed there to avoid the necessity of carrying the planed lumber to the second story by the stairways on the outside of the building. It was shown that about two years prior to the accident in question a boy fell through the opening, but fortunately he was not injured. It does not appear how the door came to be open on that occasion. This incident, however, led to instructions being given to the workmen that the door should never be opened from below. Before this the men in the planing room would sometimes open the door by pushing against it from the under side with a board, although it was difficult to do this by reason of the height of the floor and the weight of the door. But after the boy fell through, the men employed in the planing mill were instructed not to open the door from below, but to rap on the door when they desired to have it opened and wait until someone opened it from above, or to send a person from below to open it. The general uniformity of the practice thus enjoined is apparent from the plaintiff's own statement that during the whole twenty-two months of his employment he had never known the door to be opened from below except on the very occasion of the accident in question. On this occasion the door was thrust open by one Schmidt, a workman in the planing room, who four or five days before had entered the service of the defendants and had been set to work in the planing department. He testifies that he had been instructed by the foreman when he desired to have the door opened "to shake the door and wait until somebody came to open it;" that on this occasion he wanted to send lumber upstairs and rattled the door and then stopped; and, the witness continues: "I don't know how long, and then I pushed it up because they did not come quick enough upstairs; I did not like to wait so long; it was not an easy matter to push it open; it would take a man to throw that door open; it was a heavy door. I took a piece of board and put the end of it against the door and then I gave two or three raps with the board and waited a little while and there didn't anyone come; then I gave a little hitch, and then another, and then over it went."

The evidence is undisputed that the plaintiff was fully informed as to the location and use of the trap door and the manner of its construction. He testifies that he had passed over it hundreds of times. In respect to the care taken by himself he says, "I used to think about the trap door a good deal. I dont think I thought any more about it than I had for a long time; I was always pretty careful about the trap door and always watched it."

As bearing upon the knowledge of the defendants, of the dangerous location of the trap door, it was shown that when it was constructed they were warned against placing it in the passage way, and that they knew of the incident of the boy falling through the opening at the time it happened.

Upon the facts disclosed in the evidence, of which the foregoing statement is a summary, we are unable to perceive any ground upon which the defendants can be held liable. The immediate cause of the injury was the negligence of a coservant. If Schmidt had obeyed the instructions of the foreman, the accident would not have happened. He was a person of mature years, and it is not claimed that he was deficient in capacity or intelligence, or that he did not comprehend the situation and understand the instructions given him. His own account of his conduct shows that he violated his instructions from his impatience, because there was not a prompt response by persons above to his signal for opening the door. His disregard of instructions designed for the safety of persons using the passage way was the fault which immediately caused the accident.

The general rule that a master is not liable to a servant for an injury occasioned by the negligence of a coservant, is admitted by the learned counsel for the plaintiff; and indeed the general doctrine upon the subject is so well settled that it admits of no argument. But it is claimed that the negligence of the defendants co-operated with that of Schmidt, in producing the injury. If this claim is well founded, the plaintiff is entitled to recover; because for a wrong or injury occasioned by the joint or co-operative agency of two or more persons, all the tort feasors are separately or jointly liable, and there is no implied contract growing out of the contract of service that the servant shall take the risk of the master's negligence, or that the latter shall be exempt from responsibility to the servant for his own personal wrongs. The negligence of the defendants, if any exists, must be found either: 1, in the location of the trap door in the passage way; or 2, in failing adequately to protect or guard it.

It is a complete answer to the claim of negligence in these respects that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the situation and of the arrangements for the protection of persons using the passage way, and that by continuing in the employment he assumed the risks and hazards incident to the situation, and especially such hazards as might result from the nonobservance by coemployees of directions designed for the protection of persons using the passage way. The dangers to which the plaintiff was exposed were known and obvious. It is not the case where an inexperienced or uninstructed employee may know the facts, but may be incapable of drawing the proper inferences, or appreciating the dangers. The plaintiff was as fully competent to understand risks from the location of the trap door and its use, and from negligent conduct of persons employed in the planing room, as were the defendants. The location of the trap door in the passage way was not per se a wrongful act. The defendants had a right to arrange their own premises in any way which suited their convenience, and were not bound to change the arrangement to secure greater safety to the employees. If the trap door was not open to observation, or its existence was not known to those whose duty required them to use the passage way, or if the defendants had omitted to give proper instructions to those employed in the planing room, a different question would be presented. The general rule that the servant takes the risk of obvious dangers connected with his employment, has been so fully considered in recent cases that further discussion is unnecessary. Gibson v. Erie Railway Co. 63 N. Y. 449; De-Forest v. Jewett, 88 N.Y. 264; Sweeney v. Berlin & Jones Envelope Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 457, 101 N. Y. 520. We are of opinion that the application of settled principles to the circumstances of this case requires a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment reversed and a new trial granted.

All concur.

BROOKLYN CITY & NEWTOWN R. R. CO., Appt.

In an action for damages for a personal injury caused by negligence, evidence of a simple declaration of the plaintiff (not an expression or manifestation of pain), made sometime after the injury, that she was then suffering pain, or that the injured part of her body (showing it) pained her very much—is hearsay and is not admissible as in any degree corroborative of her testimony as to the extent of her pain.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Circuit on a verdict for plaintiff in an action to recover for injuries received through alleged negligence of defendant. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Samuel D. Morris, for appellant.

Mr. George W. Roderick, for respondent.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case arises upon the admission of the testimony of a third party that the plaintiff, some days after the happening of the accident which caused her injury, complained that she was suffering pain in her injured arm. The witness did not testify that on these occasions the plaintiff screamed or groaned or gave other manifestations of a seemingly involuntary nature, and indicative of bodily suffering; but he proved simple statements or declarations made by plaintiff, that she was at the time of making them suffering pain in her arm. The plaintiff was herself sworn and proved the injury and the pain. The condition of the arm the night of the accident was also proved—that it was very much swollen and black all around it, and subsequently red and inflamed, and continued swollen and inflamed more or less for a long time.

The defendant challenges the evidence of complaints of pain thus made, upon the ground that it was incompetent; and the argument made was that the evidence as to the injury and its extent could not be thus corroborated by mere hearsay.

Prior to the time when parties were allowed to be witnesses the rule in this class of cases permitted evidence of this nature. Caldwell v. Murphy, 11 N. Y. 416; Werely v. Persons, 28 N. Y. 344.

These cases show that the evidence was not confined to the time of the injury, or to mere exclamations of pain. The admissibility of the evidence was put, in the opinion of Judge Denio, in 11 N. Y. supra, upon the necessity of the case, as being the only means by which the condition of the sufferer as to enduring pain could in many instances be proved.

Substantially the same class of evidence was admitted in England and for the same reason. See cases cited in 11 N. Y.

In Massachusetts, too, the same rule was applied. Bacon v. Charlton, 7 Cush. 581, cited and approved in Roosa v. Boston Loan Co. 132 Mass. 439.

After the adoption of the amendment to the Code permitting parties to be witnesses, the question under discussion was somewhat mooted in Reed v. New York Cent. R. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 574, by Allen J., in the course of his opinion, although the precise point was not before the court. The question there under discussion was as to the correctness of permitting the plaintiff to prove his declarations, made at the time when he was doing some work, to a third person, as to the state of his health. That is not exactly like the case of complaints made, not as to a state of health, but as to a then present existing pain at the very spot alleged to have sustained injury and proved so by other evidence; still, the remarks of Judge Allen on this kind of evidence in general, bear strictly upon the matter herein discussed. He reviewed in his opinion some of the above cases and others, and claimed that the courts had admitted the evidence from the necessity of the case, as being the only method by which the condition of the party could be shown fully and completely, not only as to appearances but also as to suffering. But there was no agreement by the court upon that branch of the case, the judgment going upon another ground.

The case of Hagenlocher v. Coney Island etc. R. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 136, decides that even since the Code, evidence of exclamations indicative of pain made by the party injured is admissible. The case does not confine proof of these exclamations to the time of the injury.

The question was asked of the plaintiff's mother "How long after injury was your daughter confined in the bed?" Ans. "She was for about four weeks." Q. "What expressions did she make or what manifestations showing that she suffered pain?" This shows there was no confinement of the evidence to the time of injury. The evidence given, however, was of screams when the plaintiff's foot was touched, and of her exclamations of pain when even the sheet was permitted to touch the foot. The evidence was permitted upon the ground that it was of a nature which substantially corroborated the plaintiff, as to her condition.

Having thus admitted evidence of this kind, since the adoption of the Code amendment permitting parties to be witnesses, the question is whether there is such a clear distinction between it and evidence of simple declarations of a party that he was then suffering pain, but giving no other indications thereof, as to call for the adoption of a different rule. It seems to us that there is.

Evidence of exclamations, groans and screams, is now permitted, more upon the ground that it is a better and clearer and more vigorous description of the then existing physical condition of the party by an eye witness than could be given in any other way. It characterizes and explains such conditions. Thus, in the very last case cited, it was shown that the foot was very much swollen and so sore that the sheet could not touch it. How was the condition of soreness to be shown better than by the statement that when so light an article as a sheet touched the foot the patient screamed with pain? It was an involuntary and natural exhibition and proof of the existence of intense soreness and pain therefrom. True it might be simulated, but this possibility is not strong enough to outweigh the propriety of permitting such evidence as fair, natural and original corroborative evidence of the plaintiff as to her then physical condition. Its weight and propriety are, therefore, now sustained upon the old idea of the necessity of the case.

But evidence of simple declarations of a party made sometime after the injury, and not to a physician, for the purpose of being attended to professionally, and simply making the statement that he or she is then suffering pain, is evidence of a totally different nature, is easily stated, liable to gross exaggeration and of a most dangerous tendency, while the former necessity for its admission has wholly ceased.

As is said by Judge Allen in Reed v. Railroad, (supra), the necessity for giving such declarations in evidence where the party is living and can be sworn no longer existing, and that being the reason for its admission, the reason of the rule ceasing, the rule itself, adopted with reluctance and followed cautiously, should also cease.

With the rule as herein announced there can be no fear of a dearth of evidence as to the extent of the injury and the suffering caused thereby. The party can himself be a witness if living; and if dead the suffering is of no moment, as it cannot be compensated for in an action by the personal representative under the statute; and the exclamations of pain, the groans, the sighs, the screams can still be admitted. But we are quite clear that the bald statement, made long after the injury, by the party that he suffers from pain ought not to be admitted as in any degree corroborative of his testimony as to the extent of his pain.

For these reasons the evidence of Mr. McElroy, as to the plaintiff's declarations of existing pain, when they were walking in the street together, long after the accident, should not have been received.

It was error also to permit the same witness to prove declarations of the plaintiff that her arm pained her very much, even though at the same time she showed her arm and it was swollen and red. The appearance of the arm he could describe, but her declaration that it pained her very badly is mere hearsay and should not have been permitted.

The judgments of the General Term and Circuit should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

All concur except Danforth, J., dissenting.

(Decided April 26, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, reversing an order of the Monroe Special Term amending a judgment against plaintiff personally for costs so as to make it apply to him only in his representative capacity as administrator. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. George H. Humphrey, for appellant:

The order appealed from is reviewable by this court.

1. It effected a substantial right charging plaintiff not as administrator, in which capacity alone he was a party to the suit, but as an individual, with the payment of $166.77 costs.

2. It was a final order against one not a party to the action.

3. It recognized the validity of the judgment as between the parties, in favor of defendant and against the plaintiff as administrator, and was therefore made in a summary application in the action after judgment.

Code Civ. Proc. § 190, subdv. 3; Sturgis v. Spofford, 58 N. Y. 103; Hobart v. Hobart, 86 N. Y. 636; Crosby v. Stephan, 97 N. Y. 608; Giles v. Halbert, 12 N. Y. 32.

The intention of section 1814 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unequivocally declared to forbid a suit by an administrator in his own name where the estate is the real party in interest. Had the general term the right to nullify that intention?

The general term says that the plaintiff is in no better position than Matilda Buckland would have been. This statement will not bear a moment's scrutiny. Had an action been commenced by Matilda, who in her own right and as an individual owned the property, it must of course have been commenced in her own name. Every dollar of the proceeds of a recovery by her would have been for her sole and exclusive benefit. Here it was in nowise for the use of plaintiff, but only on account of the estate. In the one case the individual would have been the sole party in interest, putting the avails in her own pocket; in the other, the estate was the real party in interest and the administrator accountable to the surrogate for every dollar recovered. It is exactly this distinction which brings us within the terms of the statute.

Spencer v. Strait, 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 458.

The general term is in error in assuming that the cause of action accrued wholly after the death of the testator. The cause of action accrued by virtue of the will. By the tenor of the will the contract sought to be enforced was made by the testator with the plaintiff, for the benefit of the legatees, that out of any property remaining after the death of Matilda Buckland they should have $1,000. It was to enforce that contract that plaintiff demanded of the defendant enough to pay those legacies. The demand to be sure was necessary to complete this cause of action; but the gist of it was the provision of the will giving to the legatees that sum. Here, upon a contract made by the testator, the cause of action became perfect after his death. Plaintiff claimed no right to any property, save as it was derived from the will.

The decision of this court, therefore, in Thompson v. Whitmarsh, 1 Cent. Rep. 4; S. C. 100 N. Y. 35, cited by the general term, instead of being against us is directly in our favor.

Here the right to sue did not grow out of any action of the administrator, but out of an obligation imposed by the will and created by the testator when he executed that instrument. Had the action been trover upon the executor's own possession, the general term would be right. But here it was founded upon the title of the testator to goods once owned and possessed by him, and out of whose proceeds he bequeathed the sum of $1,000.

Ketchum v. Ketchum, 4 Cow. 87.

If, as we have shown, the action was necessarily prosecuted by plaintiff, as administrator, he is not, as he should not be, chargeable with costs.

Ketchum v. Ketchum, 4 Cow. 87; Tilton v. Williams, 11 Johns. 403; Bedell v. Barnes, 29 Hun, 589; Code Civ. Proc. § 3246.

Messrs. J. & Q. Van Voorhis, for respondent:

When an executor brings a suit at law upon a cause of action, which does not belong to him in his representative capacity, and is defeated, the defendant in the suit becomes entitled, as a matter of right, to a judgment for costs, against the executor personally; and the latter is not relieved from personal liability by the fact that he brought the suit in his representative character.

Holdrige v. Scott, 1 Lans. 303; Bedell v. Barnes, 29 Hun, 589; Fox v. Fox, 5 Hun, 54; Bostwick v. Brown, 15 Hun, 308; Feig v. Wray, 64 How. Pr. 391; Lyon v. Marshall, 11 Barb. 242; Ferrin v. Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315; Brockett v. Bush, 18 Abb. Pr. 337; Smith v. Patten, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 205.

The cause of action set forth in the complaint did not belong to the plaintiff in his representative capacity, and the defendant was, therefore, rightfully entitled to the judgment for costs.

Causes of action which arise out of the transactions of a decedent pass to his legal representative, and thus come to belong to him in his representative capacity; whereas, those which arise in connection with the estate after the death of the testator or intestate are not regarded as belonging to the representative in that capacity.

Holdrige v. Scott, 1 Lans. 303; Mercein v. Smith, 2 Hill, 213; Merritt v. Seaman, 6 N. Y. 168; Thompson v. Whitmarsh, 1 Cent. Rep. 4, 100 N. Y. 35; Cary v. Gregory, 38 N. Y. 127.

The complaint should be construed most favorably to the defendant.

Clark v. Dillon, 97 N. Y. 370.

In bringing this action plaintiff stands upon the same footing that his predecessor would have held if the action had been brought by her.

McMahon v. Allen, 4 E. D. Smith, 521; Conklin v. Egerton, 21 Wend. 433; Bain v. Pine, 1 Hill, 615.

It is conceded that defendant's position would have been correct before the present Code: but it is claimed that section 1814 of the Code has made a radical change in the law in respect to the liability of an executor for costs.

It makes no change in regard to what claims shall be considered as belonging to an executor in his individual capacity.

Thompson v. Whitmarsh, 1 Cent. Rep. 4, 100 N. Y. 35; Ferris v. Disbrow, 22 Week. Dig. 330; Bingham v. Marine Nat. Bank, 41 Hun, 378.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff describing himself both in the title and body of the complaint as "administrator, etc. of Warren Buckland, deceased," demanded judgment against the defendant for the sum of $2,000 and costs of the action. The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and, upon trial before a referee, had judgment dismissing the complaint, with costs against the plaintiff in his individual capacity. Upon the plaintiff's application the special term ordered an amendment so that the judgment should direct the costs of the action "to be paid out of any assets in his hands as administrator." Upon appeal to the general term this order was reversed; and from the order of reversal the plaintiff appeals to this court.

The special term regarded the question as controlled by section 1814 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that an action by an executor or administrator "upon a cause of action belonging to him in his representative capacity—must be brought by him in his representative capacity;" while the general term, looking at the cause of action as one arising out of a transaction which occurred after the testator's death, held that it did not belong to the plaintiff in his representative capacity within the meaning of that section.

This difference of opinion necessarily leads to an inquiry whether the cause of action upon which the plaintiff sues is, within the meaning of the Code, one "belonging to him in his representative capacity." That capacity was created by statute, to carry into effect the wishes of the decedent, and by virtue of it an executor takes as of the time of the death of the testator, and as it were from his hand, his personal property, so that there is no interval of time when it is not the subject of ownership by the testator up to the time of his death; and from that moment by the person named, not as an individual, but as a representative.

The statute characterizes the property received as assets, requires it to be inventoried, and for those assets so inventoried and for any increase, the executor is to account. It includes among other things, debts secured by mortgage, bonds, notes and things in action. He and his sureties are liable for the full value of all such property of the deceased, received by the executor and not duly administered; and if the cause of action accrued in the lifetime of the testator, any suit respecting it must be in the name of the executor as such. He then sues in the right of the testator, and can bring such actions only as the testator himself might have maintained.

On the other hand, if an injury to the property, or its conversion, happens after the death of the decedent, although before letters are actually issued, or if a contract is made with an executor or an administrator personally, in regard to the effects or money belonging to the decedent, received by a third person after the death, the administrator might sue in his own name, and if in any of these cases he may also sue in his representative character he is not required to do so. Valentine v. Jackson, 9 Wend. 302; Merritt v. Seaman, 6 N. Y. 168; Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574; Lyon v. Marshall, 11 Barb. 242.

When he sues in the right of the testator he pays no costs, because the law does not presume him to be sufficiently cognizant of the nature and foundation of the claims he has to assert, and in all these cases it is necessary for him to sue in his representative character, and expressly to name himself executor. Toller, Exrs. 438.

But if he may bring the action in his private capacity, then if he fails he is liable for costs.

As the statute stood (2 R. S. 615, § 17) before the Code, costs were not as of course given in favor of a successful defendant against executors or administrators, necessarily prosecuting in the right of their testator or intestate; but it was held that an executor suing upon a cause of action which accrued after the death of his testator, and failing, was personally liable for costs. Burhans v. Blanchard, 1 Denio, 626.

In that case the distinction is said to be well settled between cases in which an executor must sue in that character, and those in which he may prosecute in his own right, whether the action be in tort or on contract. The final test is whether it accrued before or after the death of the testator. In that case, and in cases there cited, and in many later ones, it is shown, as well upon principle as authority, that only such causes of action as accrued during the lifetime of the decedent or upon contract made by him were of necessity to be prosecuted by his executors or administrators in their representative capacity.

In Patchen v. Wilson, 4 Hill, 57, the contract sued on was by the intestate in his lifetime; and the action was necessarily brought in a representative capacity, and although it failed, the plaintiff was not charged with costs. The same case shows that an action for the conversion of property after the testator's death may be brought in the executor's own name, and that the letters testamentary may be used as part of his chain of title.

The same rule applies here. The distinction is between a cause of action accruing on a contract made with the representative, as distinguished from one devolving on him in that capacity by the creation of the trust or representative relation. The Code works no change in these respects. On the contrary, the provisions of section 1814 imply that a person while executor may have causes of action of more than one kind; for it declares that those which belong to him in "a representative capacity," shall be prosecuted in that capacity. They are thus contrasted with all others, and as clearly distinguished as if one class devolved on A and the other on B. So, in construing the section, it has been held that the phrase "representative capacity" includes only those causes of action which accrued during the lifetime of the decedent. Bingham v. Marine Nat. Bank, 41 Hun, 377.

The demand there in suit arose upon a certificate for moneys belonging to the estate and deposited with the defendant by administrators. The court held that the action could be maintained by the bailors as individuals or as administrators, upon the ground that the section did not include a demand accruing to the personal representatives through a disposition of the funds or property of the estate after the decease of the testator or intestate; citing in support of this view, Thompson v. Whitmarsh, 1 Cent. Rep. 4, 100 N. Y. 35.

In that case it appeared that Thompson, as executor, having received property of the estate, sold it to the defendant, and afterwards in his own name, as an individual, sued for the price; and the court held the action to be well brought, and that the defendant could not successfully set up against the demand a debt due to him from the testator. The defendant relied upon section 1814 of the Code; but it was held that the phrase "representative capacity," as there used, related to debts which belonged to the testator and came to the executor through his representation of the deceased, rather than as the result of his own action, and therefore required an action for their enforcement to be in his representative name.

In each of those cases, Thompson v. Whitmarsh and Bingham v. Marine Nat. Bank, the cause of action never existed in favor of the decedent, but grew out of the contract or dealing of the executor; and it was held that the suit was properly brought in the name of the individual.

The inquiry then is as to which of these two classes the cause of action in the present case belongs. As already stated the action is to recover a sum certain. The right to such or any judgment depended upon the following facts: William Buckland died in 1873, leaving real estate worth about $4,000, and a small amount of personal property, all of which he gave by will to his wife, Matilda, and appointed her his executrix. She received letters, reduced the estate to possession, paid the testator's debts, sold the real estate, taking in payment one bond and mortgage of $1,000 and one of $4,437.50. The $1,000 bond and mortgage she delivered to the defendant about the time it was executed, "in order that he might collect the interest for her, and for safe keeping." She sold the other bond and mortgage, and of its proceeds loaned the firm of William Gallup & Co. $2,600, taking the note of that firm therefor.

At the time of Matilda's death the note was in the possession of her sister, and she subsequently delivered it to the defendant, Gallup, the brother of Matilda. The bonds, mortgages and note were payable by their terms to Matilda Buckland personally and individually. The defendant had no other property in his hands belonging to Matilda, and no property in which the estate of Warren Buckland ever had any interest unless it was said note and bond and mortgage. These were the plaintiff's facts. He alleged, however, that the property belonged to the estate of Warren Buckland; that the legacies remain unpaid; that after the death of Matilda he was appointed administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Warren Buckland, and demanded the above property of the defendant, who refused to deliver it.

The referee held and decided that the note and bond and mortgage belonged to the estate of Matilda Buckland and not to the estate of Warren Buckland. If there is disclosed a cause of action belonging to the plaintiff in his representative capacity, then the order below is wrong, for the conditions do not exist which make him chargeable for mismanagement or bad faith. Code, § 3246.

But on the other hand merely describing himself as executor, either in the summons or complaint or both, or saying that he sues in that capacity, will not relieve him from costs incident to an unsuccessful litigation. If, on the facts stated in support of the motion, there was anything for him to do in his official capacity, it was because his predecessor Matilda left some part of the estate of Warren Buckland unadministered. He succeeded to her power and duties only. The course of administration was merely interrupted by her death; and upon his appointment, while he became the legal representative of Warren Buckland, he could only take the estate in the condition in which the executrix left it. So far as any of the goods or effects of the testator remained in specie, he, as administrator de bonis non, could take them, but this rule applies to such only as are distinguishable. He was bound by her contracts; and if he sues for the proceeds or upon any promise made to her, he could occupy no different position. She sold the property and loaned a portion of the proceeds; and as to another part she put it in the hands of the defendant as her agent, in each case, upon the plaintiff's construction of the will, necessarily remaining liable to the estate she represented and liable to account for the whole. I am unable to see that the case differs at all from the one cited, Thompson v. Whitmarsh, supra.

The learned counsel concedes that had an action been commenced by Matilda, "it must of course have been commenced in her own name," but he puts this admission upon the fact that she "in her own right and as an individual owned the property." If she did, and such is indeed the plain reading of the will, as well as the judgment of the court, obviously the plaintiff could have no right of action in any capacity. It is only on the supposition that it was part of the estate of Warren Buckland that he has any standing in the litigation. But, confessedly, the property, as it came from Buckland's estate, was changed in form, converted into money and transferred by the act and agreement of his then executrix, the plaintiff's predecessor. She converted the assets and had become (if any liability at all was created) personally liable for them. She stood exactly in Thompson's position in the case referred to, and reached that position by the same method of business. In no view can the cause of action then created, or as it is stated in the complaint, be said to be one belonging to the plaintiff in his representative capacity. It did not come to him by devolution from the testator.

As the plaintiff, therefore, need not have sued in his representative character, and has failed, he is personally liable to pay costs.

The order appealed from is to that effect and should be affirmed.

All concur, except Rapallo & Earl, JJ., dissenting.

SYRACUSE SAVINGS BANK, Respt., v. Erastus F. HOLDEN et al., Appts., and Annie G. Burton et al., Infants, etc. Respts.

Held, that a deed between Emily Howland of the first part and "Cornelia H. Burton, wife of Henry B. Burton of Syracuse, N. Y., in trust for Annie G. Burton, Grace Burton and Burr Burton, with power to sell and convey or mortgage without the appointment of a guardian, of the second part" (said Annie G., Grace and Burr Burton being infants); and granting the land, etc., to the party of the second part and "to their heirs and assigns forever," etc., created a valid general trust power under the statute, intended to be executed wholly for the benefit of the infants; that the land passed to and vested in the infants, subject to the execution of the power; and, hence, that mortgages thereon given by Cornelia H. Burton to third parties to secure debts of her husband were not a valid execution of the power and were void.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of the Onondaga Special Term adjudging a mortgage valid on an issue between defendants, under section 521 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as to the surplus, in an action to foreclose a prior mortgage. Affirmed.

Reported below, 36 Hun, 168.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Louis Marshall, for appellants:

The instrument in question does not create a valid express trust under the Statute of Uses and Trusts. This proposition is conceded by all parties interested in the case.

Syracuse Savings Bank v. Porter, 36 Hun, 168.

The instrument created a passive trust; and therefore, under the provisions of sections 47 and 49 of the statute, as the trust intended to be created became nugatory and failed, the deed is to be considered as though it were made directly to the person in whom the right to the possession and profits was intended to be vested. These persons were the children who took the property, subject to such conditions as were imposed by the deed.

Syracuse Savings Bank v. Porter, 36 Hun, 168.

The distinction is recognized in the authorities between a power to sell and a trust to sell. The former can be coupled with a passive trust. The latter can be created in connection with a trust for other purposes. This instrument must therefore be treated as though it had created a passive trust, to which a power is annexed. The authorities recognize such instruments, and distinguish them from trusts, naked powers, and mixed trusts and powers.

Perry, Trusts, §§ 18, 20; Warville, Abstracts, p. 257; Lewin, Trusts, p. 19.

The Revised Statutes do not permit a conveyance of property to one in trust for another without further specifications or directions. They prohibit trusts of this character, and provide that if a conveyance is made to one or more persons, to the use of or in trust for another, no estate or interest, legal or equitable, shall vest in the trustees.

1 R. S. 727, §§ 45, 49, 55.

As the trust is invalid, the intent of the grantor in creating it must fail; but as her design to give the possession, rents and profits to the children was valid, the statute carries it into effect by vesting the legal estate in them.

Rawson v. Lampman, 5 N. Y. 456; Wright v. Douglass, 7 N. Y. 568, 570; Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 366, 379, 380; N. Y. Dry Dock Co. v. Stillman, 30 N. Y. 174, 193, 194.

If the title passed to the children of Cornelia H. Burton, then it is physically and logically impossible that this instrument created a power in trust; for then, according to all the authorities and the provisions of the statute, the title would have been in Mrs. Howland, the grantor. This could not be the case if the title was in the children.

1 R. S. 729, §§ 58, 59.

The trust attempted to be created being a passive trust the title went directly to the children who were named as cestuis que trust, and it therefore did not remain in Mrs. Howland.

Downing v. Marshall, and N. Y. Dry Dock. Co. v. Stillman, supra.

It having been determined that this instrument did not create a power in trust, and that the title to the land in question was vested in the children subject to the execution of the power to sell and mortgage, created by the deed, that power must be treated as a power beneficial to the donee, and Mrs. Burton, the donee of the power, was therefore empowered to execute the mortgage in question.

1 R. S. 732, §§ 73, 79; Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 230.

The power in question being a beneficial one to the donee, she had the right to execute the mortgage, whether the consideration went for the benefit of Mrs. Howland, the children, herself, or any other person; and it was executed in proper form, even if it should be considered a power in trust.

White v Hicks, 33 N. Y. 383, 392; Warner v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 357 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 962).

Even if it should be assumed that the instrument in question created a power in trust, the appellants are entitled to enforce their mortgage against the property upon which they are liens, since the coal delivered subsequent to the execution of the mortgage was parted with in good faith.

R. S. title Uses and Trusts, § 66; Id. title Powers, § 102.

Messrs. Hancock & Munro, for respondents Burton et al.:

Under the Revised Statutes express trusts may be created only for four purposes: 1, to sell lands for the benefit of creditors; 2, to sell mortgages or lease lands for the benefit of legatees, or for the purpose of satisfying any charge thereon; 3, to receive the rents and profits of lands and apply them to the use of any person, during the life of such person, or for any shorter term, subject to the rules prescribed in the first article of this title; 4, to receive the rents and profits of lands, and to accumulate the same for the purposes and within the limits prescribed in article 1, title II, 3 R. S. 7th ed. 2181, § 55.

Evidently the intention of the grantor was to impose upon the trustee the duties and obligations authorized by the second and third subdivisions above cited. But as she failed to define and specify the purposes of the trust as required by the statute, the deed is void, in so far as it was intended to create an express trust under the Revised Statutes.

The deed creates a valid power in trust in Cornelia H. Burton, to manage, sell, convey, mortgage or rent the property in question for the benefit of the cestuis que trust.

3 R. S. 7th ed. 2182, § 58; Smith v. Bowen, 35 N. Y. 83; Clark v. Jacobs, 56 How. Pr. 519; De Peyster v. Clendening, 8 Paige, 295; Irving v. De Kay, 9 Paige, 521; affd. 5 Denio, 646; Hotchkiss v. Elting, 36 Barb. 38; Hagerty v. Hagerty, 9 Hun, 175.

As this deed creates a general power in trust, the title to the lands in question, subject to the execution of the power, remains in the grantor, Mrs. Howland.

"In every case where the trust shall be valid as a power, the lands to which the trust relates shall remain in or descend to the persons otherwise entitled, subject to the execution of the trust as a power."

Under the statute the trustee under such a conveyance as this takes no title or estate whatever in the lands.

3 R. S. 7th ed. 2182, § 58.

A power in trust must be executed in accordance with the intention of the grantor; otherwise, a conveyance by the trustee carries with it no title; and any person interested in the trust estate may dispute the validity of such a conveyance.

Smith v. Bowen, 35 N. Y. 83; Clark v. Jacobs, 56 How. Pr. 519; Clark v. Crego, 47 Barb. 599, 614; Russell v. Russell, 36 N. Y. 581; Wetmore v. Porter, 92 N. Y. 76, 83–85.

The mortgagees must claim under Mrs. Burton's title, and are chargeable with notice of the contents of her deed, and of the equities existing in favor of Mrs. Howland and the infant defendants.

The deed in question does not create a "beneficial power."

"A general or special power is beneficial when no person other than the grantee has, by the terms of its creation, any interest in its execution."

3 Rev. Stat. 7th ed. 2189, § 79.

Again; the statutes of powers, as construed by the courts, provide that a general beneficial power vests the absolute ownership in the donee of the power.

Freeborn v. Wagner, 49 Barb. 43, 54, 55.

Is there anything in the deed to indicate that the grantor intended the conveyance for the benefit of Mrs. Burton or such third person as her whim or caprice might lead her to favor? If not, the limitation of her estate by the words "in trust for Annie G. Burton," etc., must control; and she can sell, convey or mortgage only for the benefit of the infants.

Dominick v. Michael, 4 Sandf. 374–396.

Nor can the power be exercised or not wholly in her discretion. It imposes an obligation upon her; an active duty which, when opportunity offers or necessity requires, the statute compels her to perform, and the performance of which the beneficiaries can enforce.

3 R. S. 7th ed. 2191, § 96; Clark v. Crego, 47 Barb. 599; Van Boskerck v. Herrick, 65 Barb. 250.

In Hotchkiss v. Elting the terms in which the trust and power of sale were created (with the exception of certain reservations to the grantor) were almost precisely the same as in the deed under consideration. It was held that the trust considered by itself was a "passive trust;" and had it stood alone, the title would have passed to the beneficiary; but that the fact that the trust was coupled with a power altered the construction of the deed and that the conveyance was thereby changed to a "power in trust," and that the title remained in the grantor.

36 Barb. 38.

In Smith v. Bowen the legal effect of the language used was the same as in the present case. The instrument was held to constitute a valid power in trust.

35 N. Y. 83.

The only test applied by the courts to determine whether a trust is a passive or an active one is whether a power is conferred upon the trustee by the deed. If so, and if the trust is not within the provisions of the Revised Statutes with regard to express trusts, it is construed as a power in trust, if of such a nature that the statute (3 R. S. 7th ed. 2182, § 58) can be applied. The title remains in the grantor.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to March 14, 1867, Henry B. Burton owned certain land in the City of Syracuse, and on that day, through the medium of a third person, he conveyed it to his wife Cornelia H. Burton. On the 8th day of July, 1876, she, without any consideration, conveyed the land to Emily Howland, her mother; and on the 15th day of the same month Mrs. Howland, without any consideration, conveyed the land by a deed which we are now called upon to construe.

The deed purports to be an instrument between Emily Howland of the first part, and "Cornelia H. Burton, wife of Henry B. Burton, of Syracuse, N. Y. in trust for Annie G. Burton, Grace Burton and Burr Burton, with power to sell and convey or mortgage without the appointment of a guardian, of the second part;" and it grants the land with all the rents, issues and profits thereof to the party of the second part and "to their heirs and assigns forever," to have and to hold the same to the party of the second part, "their heirs and assigns," to the sole and only proper benefit and behoof of the party of the second part, "their heirs and assigns forever."

There is no other reference to a trust or power, except that contained in the first clause of the deed above set out.

In the construction of this deed we are enjoined by statute "to carry into effect the intent of the parties, so far as such intent can be collected from the whole instrument, and is consistent with the rules of law." 1 R. S. 748, § 2.

Both parties agree that no valid trust was created, as no trust purpose was specified which is mentioned in the statute authorizing the creation of express trusts. 1 R. S. 729, § 55.

A mere formal, passive trust was attempted to be created which the statute executes by vesting the title in the beneficiaries. Secs. 47, 49.

They also agree that a valid general power was created under the statute defining and regulating powers (1 R. S. 732, §§ 74, 77), and we will proceed upon that assumption. They differ, however, as to the nature of the power. The appellants claim that no one but the grantee of the power was interested in the execution thereof, and that, therefore, it was a beneficial power under section 79.

While the deed is quite informal and imperfect in the expression of the intent of the parties, yet we think sufficient appears to show that it was not their intention that Mrs. Burton should execute the power for her own benefit. The conveyance was made in trust for the three persons named, who were the children of Mrs. Burton. They were the real beneficiaries of the grant, and the power to sell and convey or mortgage was probably given because they were infants; and the object was to authorize a conveyance of the land, when desired, without the appointment of a guardian for the infants, and thus to avoid the expense and delay which would ensue if the land were required to be sold or mortgaged only by a compliance with the statutes regulating the sale and mortgaging of the lands of infants.

The case of Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 230, is not an authority for the contention of the appellants. In that case there was no indication whatever in the will that the power to sell was to be executed for the benefit of any other person than the grantee of the power, and that distinguishes that case from this. Here we find a satisfactory indication that the power was to be executed wholly for the benefit of the infants; and it is therefore, as claimed on their behalf, a general trust power under section 94 of the statutes; and the land passed to and vested in the infants, subject to the execution of the power. Secs. 47, 49, 58, 59.

Therefore the mortgages given by Mrs. Burton to the appellants, to secure the debts of her husband, were not a valid execution of the power, and were void.

The judgment of the General Term should be affirmed with costs.

All concur, except Andrews, J., taking no part.

(Decided May 3, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming an order of reference made at Special Term, in an action to recover damages for breach of an agreement to erect a dwelling house. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Philip L. Wilson, for appellant:

On a motion for a reference the pleadings will control, as to the character of the action.

Welch v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590; Coleman v. Burr, 93 N. Y. 31.

The trial of the issues raised by the complaint and answer do not involve the examination of a long account, within meaning of section 1013 of the Code.

Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433; VanRensselaer v. Jewett, 6 Hill, 371; McDonnell v. Stevens, 9 Hun, 28.

Nor can a case be referred, even though the trial should require an examination of a long account, if that account is not the immediate object of the suit.

Kain v. Delano, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 29; Read v. Lozin, 31 Hun, 286; Brink v. Republic Fire Ins. Co. 2 Thomp. & C. 550; Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433.

Nor can a case be referred, if the trial involve difficult questions of law.

If this counterclaim and reply raises an issue as to value of the work at all, the main issues are certainly the contract, the breach.

These being determined under the authority of Brink v. Republic Fire Ins. Co., Read v. Lozin, above cited, and Evans v. Kalbfleisch, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 13, there might be a reference under section 1015 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but not to try the issues under section 1013.

The building of this house is one single transaction, and a reference cannot be ordered merely because the details which make up this transaction are numerous.

The value can be proven in gross, and must be so proven and by expert testimony; the materials cease to have a distinct value, except as embodied in the building.

The case, if it came down to proof of value of the work, is within the rule laid down in Farrell Foundry & Machine Co. v. Anvil Horseshoe etc. Co. 11 N. Y. Week. Dig. 350; Felt v. Tiffany, 11 Hun, 62; Martin v. Windsor Hotel Co. 70 N. Y. 101.

Mr. Samuel Untermyer, for respondents:

The statement in the moving affidavit "that the trial of the issues will necessarily involve a long account" being undisputed, the order is not appealable.

Welsh v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590; Continental Note Co. v. Industrial Exhibition Co. 1 Hun, 118; Hossack v. Heyerdahl, 60 N. Y. 684.

The contention is that the action is not upon the account but upon the contract, and therefore section 1013 is not applicable.

The only object of the action is to recover damages, and the proof of such damages in this case necessarily and directly involves the examination of long accounts. If the defendant's contention be correct, no common-law action for damages for breach of contract can ever be referred, because the proof of damages will always be claimed to be incidentally and not directly involved.

The account on the plaintiffs' part consists here of particular items of damage, all of which are sought to be recovered, and those items of damage are directly the subject and the sole subject of the plaintiffs' claim.

In Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433, cited by the appellant, the action was not to recover any portion of the moneys shown by the account, but to recover the value of certain shares of stock; and in order to ascertain the value of those shares of stock it became necessary incidentally to take an account of the assets of the corporation.

In the case at bar the immediate and only object of the plaintiffs is to recover the damages set forth in their account, and the immediate and only object of the defendant is to recover as damages, the amount of his counter claim.

Section 1013 does not restrict the right to refer to actions of account, in which the account and its correctness is the sole subject of contest. On the contrary the right to refer is expressly extended to all actions on contract in which an examination of an account is directly involved.

If the defense shall be sustained, the contract sued upon will be declared abrogated and rescinded; and in that event the claims of both the plaintiffs and of the defendant would necessarily be directly upon the accounts themselves to recover the reasonable value of the work and materials furnished.

The trial of the issues in this action necessarily involves the examination of long accounts on both sides and a reference was properly ordered on that account.

Place v. Cheesebrough, 63 N. Y. 315; Welsh v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590; Schermerhorn v. Wood, 4 Daly, 158; Kennedy v. Kenna, 49 How. Pr. 308.

None of the facts alleged in the answer of the defendant, by which it is sought to avoid the written contract, will rob the court of its right to order a reference.

The nature of the action is determined by the complaint and not by the answer. If the complaint sets out, as it does in this case, an action on contract, not even allegations of fraud would change the nature of the action.

Welsh v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590; Eldridge v. N. Y. etc. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 631; Patterson v. Stettauer, 7 Jones & S. 413; Williams v. Allen, 48 How. Pr. 357; S. C. 2 Hun, 377.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought against a builder to recover damages for the breach of a contract to erect for the plaintiffs a dwelling house in the City of New York, within a stipulated time. The contract price of the work was $25,500, payable in installments. The contract was dated October 21, 1884, and by its terms the defendant agreed that he would fully inclose the building so as to protect it against the weather, on or before the 20th of December, 1884, and would complete it for occupancy on or before the 30th of April, 1885; that he would commence the construction of the building immediately upon the execution of the contract, and would at no time, between the commencement of the work and its completion, cease to work thereon with a sufficient force, etc.

The breach alleged in the complaint is that the defendant, after having commenced the erection of the building under this contract, ceased work thereon and abandoned the work, before its completion, whereby the plaintiffs were deprived of the use of the building and were compelled to employ other persons to complete the contract, at a cost exceeding the contract price, and sustained damages to the amount of $7,000.

The defendant, by his answer, denies the alleged breach; sets up that the agreement was unconscionable, and was executed by mistake and under duress; that it was prepared by the plaintiffs, who are lawyers, and did not fairly embody a previous verbal agreement under which the defendant had undertaken the job and commenced the performance of the work, and that he was coerced into its execution after having made and contracted for large expenditures on the building; that the plaintiffs themselves violated the contract, and also that the plaintiffs are indebted to him for a balance due for work and labor on the building, which he sets up as a counterclaim; and he demands judgment that the contract be declared void and deemed to have been executed under duress of property, and also for his counterclaim.

The plaintiffs moved for a reference of the action; and the court at special term made an order referring all the issues therein to a referee for hearing and determination. On appeal to the general term that order was affirmed, and the defendant now appeals.

The case presented by the complaint is clearly one in which both parties are entitled, under the Constitution, to a trial by jury; and consequently it was beyond the power of the court to make an order of reference against the objection of either party. It was simply an action for unliquidated damages for the breach of a contract, and in no sense involved any amount.

A bill of particulars was furnished by the plaintiffs, under an order of the court; and by this bill the plaintiffs specified eight items of damage which consisted of loss of interest on the value of his property, loss of occupancy of the building, damage to the building, occasioned by the defendant's failure to inclose it; and increased cost of completing it. These items of damage did not constitute an account. It has repeatedly been held that when there is no account between the parties, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, the cause cannot be referred, although there may be many items of damage. Camp v. Ingersoll, 86 N. Y. 433.

This rule has been applied in actions on policies of insurance where there are many items of loss. It is contended that the counterclaim set up in the answer, of which a bill of particulars was also ordered and furnished, will require the examination of a long account. Even if this should be assumed, it would not make the action referable.

"The character of the action is determined by the complaint. The answer cannot change it. If the action is a referable one the answer cannot make it nonreferable;" Per Church, Ch. J., in Welsh v. Darragh, 52 N. Y. 590; and on the same principle, if the action is nonreferable a counterclaim set up in the answer cannot make it so, as was held by this court in Townsend v. Hendricks, 40 How. Pr. 143.

The defendant has a constitutional right to trial by jury on the issues presented by the complaint and answer, and he does not waive that right by setting up, in addition to his defenses, a counterclaim. If the plaintiffs prevail in the action, it may never become necessary to try the counterclaim. Should the counterclaim ever require examination a reference can be ordered as to it after trial of the issues. Townsend v. Hendricks, supra, p. 164.

The plaintiffs rely upon the fact that the motion for a reference was made upon an affidavit of one of the plaintiffs' attorneys, which states that the trial of the issues will necessarily involve a long account, and that there was no opposing affidavit. But the motion was also founded upon the pleadings and the several bills of particulars, and they are all now before the court. From an examination of them the court can judge as well as the attorney whether any account will be involved in the trial of the issues; and no opposing affidavit is necessary to enlighten us on that point.

The order should be reversed and motion denied, with costs in both courts.

All concur.

Henry BOSTWICK et al., Respts.

An action by a stockholder of a bank in behalf of all others similarly situated, against directors of the bank, to call them to account as trustees, held to be an equitable action to enforce a common-law, as distinguished from a statutory, liability, and hence triable by the court, or if issues properly framed are tried by a jury, they are to be reviewed by the court as in equitable actions, although the ground of the liability of the defendants is negligence and fraud.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, reversing an order of the Dutchess Circuit granting plaintiffs' motion to strike the cause from the circuit calendar, to be tried as an equity action by the court without a jury. Reversed.

Reported below, 43 Hun, 458.

This action was commenced January 10, 1880, by Theodore Brinckerhoff, one of the stockholders of the National Bank of Fishkill, in behalf of himself and the other stockholders, against the trustees of the bank, to call them to account as trustees. The bank and its receiver, who was also one of the trustees, having neglected and refused to prosecute the trustees, were also joined as defendants.

A demurrer to the complaint interposed by defendants was sustained at special term and the judgment of the special term was affirmed on appeal to the general term; see 23 Hun, 237; but on appeal to this court such judgments were reversed and the demurrer overruled.

See 88 N. Y. 52.

The defendants by writ of error, then removed the action into the United States Supreme Court, which court dismissed the writ and remanded the cause.

See 106 U. S. 3 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 73).

The cause came on for trial March 24, 1884, when the plaintiffs were nonsuited and the complaint dismissed upon the ground that the cause of action was barred by the three years' limitation of the Code, § 394.

From the judgment of dismissal the plaintiffs appealed to the general term, where the same was affirmed.

See 34 Hun, 352.

Plaintiffs then appealed to this court, where the decisions of the courts below were reversed and a new trial directed, the court holding the cause of action governed by the ten years' limitation of the Code, § 388.

See 99 N. Y. 85.

On the cause being remitted to the supreme court, plaintiffs moved for an order appointing a referee. The special term denied the motion, and the plaintiffs appealed to the general term, where the order of the special term was affirmed. Defendants then placed the cause on the Dutchess Circuit Calender for the December Term, 1885, and on the same being moved for trial, plaintiffs objected and moved that the cause be stricken from the calendar to be tried as an equity action by the court without a jury. This motion was granted, with leave to defendants to apply for an order framing issues as to the alleged misconduct, to be tried by a jury. From the order granting the motion, defendants appealed to this court at general term, where the order was reversed and plaintiffs appealed to this court.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. O. D. M. Baker, for appellants:

The legal relation between the directors and stockholders of the bank is that of trustees and beneficiaries.

It was so adjudicated in this action, when here before.

Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 88 N. Y. 52; 99 N. Y. 185.

The directors of a corporation are liable to the stockholders for losses resulting from their negligence or misconduct.

1 Potter, Corp. § 324.

The action is equitable in form and was brought against the directors of the bank, in their character as trustees for the stockholders, to obtain from them an account of their dealings with and disposition of the corporate funds and property intrusted to their management, and to compel them to make good the losses resulting from their alleged negligence and breaches of trust.

The burden of the case is and will be with the defendants, until they have accounted and given evidence tending to excuse the conceded losses resulting from their management.

Marvin v. Brooks, 94 N. Y. 71.

No constitutional or other right to a trial by jury exists in this case.

I. Before the Code this cause would have stood upon the equity side of the court, and would have been heard and disposed of according to the practice of the court of chancery.

The established procedure against directors, managers or trustees of corporations to compel them to make good the losses resulting to the corporation and stockholders from their negligence or fraud, was by an accounting in the court of chancery in England down to 1777, when New York ceased to be a Colony.

Perry, Trusts, § 17 and cases cited.

A court of chancery was established in the Colony prior to 1693, and locally exercised all the authority of the mother court.

"The Governour and Councill are a Court of Chancery and have the powers of the Chancery in England."

4 N. Y. Colonial MSS. 28.

The first Constitution of the State, adopted April 20, 1777, did not create or declare any judicial system, but recognized and continued, with other courts, the court of chancery and its jurisdiction as existing April 19, 1775.

See §§ XXIV, XXV, XXVII, XXXII.

The right to trial by jury in such cases as this plainly did not exist when the first Constitution went into effect, and the provision therein, "XLI. That trial by jury in all cases in which it hath heretofore been used in the Colony of New York shall be established and remain inviolate forever," had no application.

From March, 1814, cases of this character have always been prosecuted on the equity side.

Brumly v. Westchester Co. Mfg. Soc. 1 Johns. Ch. 366; Atty-Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371; Ogden v. Kip, 6 Johns. Ch. 160.

Article VII, § 2 of the Constitution of 1822 provided:

"The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used, shall be inviolate forever."

Under chapter 325, Laws of 1825, "To prevent fraudulent bankruptcies by incorporated companies, to facilitate proceedings against them, and for other purposes," it was held that the jurisdiction of the court of chancery had thereby been so extended as to enable that court to entertain a bill against a corporation for a misuse of its franchise.

Atty-Gen v. Bank of Chemung, 1 Hopkins, Ch. 673; Atty-Gen. v. Bank of Columbia, 1 Paige, 511; Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 2 Paige, 438, 451.

In 1832 came the revision of the statutes, with this provision in article second, title four, chapter eight, part three, viz.:

Sec. 38. "The chancellor shall have jurisdiction over directors, managers and other trustees and officers of corporations:

1. "To compel them to account for their official conduct, in the management and disposition of the funds and property committed to their charge;

2. "To decree and compel payment by them to the corporation whom they represent and to its creditors, of all sums of money, and of the value of all property which they may have acquired to themselves or transferred to others, or may have lost or wasted, by any violation of their duties as such directors."

Robinson v. Smith, 3 Paige, 222; Cunningham v. Pell, 5 Paige, 607.

This procedure and these provisions of the statutes were in force when the Constitution of 1848 was adopted.

This is not one of the cases in which trial by jury had then "been heretofore used."

Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 427; Re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y. 199-210; Sands v. Kimbark, 39 Barb. 108-120; S. C. 27 N.Y. 147; Sheppard v. Steele, 43 N.Y. 53-57; VanMarter v. Hotchkiss, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 485.

The powers of the chancellor in respect to officers of corporations, specified in subdivision 2, section 33 of the Revised Statutes, became vested and remain in the supreme court under the Constitution of 1848, and the Judiciary Act, chapter 280, Laws 1847, § 16.

II. By the Code the method of trial is made to depend upon the character of the demand for judgment, and the right to trial by jury, aside from specific cases of which this is not one, is expressly limited to "An action where the complaint demands judgment for a sum of money only."

§ 968.

Here the complaint does not demand judgment for a sum of money only. The demand is that the damages sustained by the bank and stockholders, by reason of the acts and omissions of the directors, be ascertained and determined, which can only be done through an accounting by them.

Farwell v. Importers etc. Nat. Bank, 90 N.Y. 491.

Code, §§ 969 and 1013, declare the action triable by the court.

III. If the action be considered as one at law the directors must also account and there is no right to trial by jury.

Mr. Milton A. Fowler, for respondents:

There is but one question before the court: Is this an action on contract or in tort?

If in tort the defendants claim that they have a right to a trial by a jury.

This is simply an action to recover damages from the defendants on account of their alleged fraud, negligence, deceit and dishonesty, while holding office as directors of the Fishkill National Bank. To maintain the action the plaintiffs must first prove such fraud, negligence, deceit and dishonesty.

If the plaintiffs recover judgment, the surviving directors who are made defendants herein are liable to arrest under the execution. And this right to arrest exists without the necessity of obtaining an order of arrest pendente lite, for the reason that it is an action "to recover damages for * * * misconduct or neglect in office."

Code, § 549, subd. 2.

This therefore is clearly an action for tort.

In whatever court the action must be brought, the liability, if any exists, is a common-law liability; and the rules relating to common-law actions apply to the trial of this action.

When this case was first before the court of appeals it was held by the court that the jurisdiction of courts of equity, in cases like the one at bar, exists independently of any statutes, and that the statutory enactments relating to such cases, are merely declaratory of a jurisdiction long previously conceded to exist.

When this case was before the court the second time the court in its opinion says:

"It is not claimed that the liability which the plaintiff seeks to enforce in this action against the directors is one created by any statute; but as we held when the case was here before, it is a common-law liability, springing out of their relations to the bank and the manner in which they discharged, or omitted to discharge, their obligations and duties as directors thereof."

99 N. Y. 185.

In an action for damages for tort, like the present, the defendants have a constitutional right to trial by jury.

N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 2; McMaster v. Booth, 4 How. Pr. 427, 429; Townsend v. Hendricks, 40 How. Pr. 143.

The court of chancery never had the right to try, without a jury, an action for damages on the ground of fraud.

Bradley v. Aldrich, 40 N. Y. 504, 510, 511; Barlow v. Scott, 24 N. Y. 40–46; Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 65; McMaster v. Booth, 4 How. Pr. 427; 19 Wend. 108; 3 Denio, 380.

Counsel for plaintiffs confused the terms "an action for an accounting" and "an action against directors or trustees to call them to account;" and in some of the cases cited by him, the court has failed to discriminate between the two kinds of action, for the reason that such discrimination was not essential in determining the issues presented.

The gravamen of the action is damages for negligence or malfeasance; and the distribution of the damages resulting from the wrongful acts is only an incident. In such case the trial by jury cannot be denied.

Bradley v. Aldrich, 40 N.Y. 504–510; Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 65–79; Wheelock v. Lee, 74 N. Y. 495, 500; Davison v. Associates of the Jersey Co. 71 N. Y. 333.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action has already been held by this court to be an equitable one. It is brought by plaintiff Brinckerhoff in his own behalf, as stockholder of the bank and in behalf of all others similarly situated, against defendants, who were directors of the bank, to call them to account as trustees for the manner in which they have discharged their trust. Of such actions courts of equity have always had jurisdiction. Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 99 N. Y. 185.

Nothing in the opinion in this case when last here, and reported supra, gives color to the idea that the case was regarded otherwise than as an equitable one. The judge it is true, in delivering the opinion, said that defendants' liability was not created by statute but was a common-law liability, springing out of defendants' relation to the bank, and the manner in which they discharged their obligations and duties as directors thereof. The expression "common-law liability" was obviously used in contradistinction to that of a liability imposed by statute, and had no reference whatever to a liability enforceable at common law, in distinction from one cognizable in equity.

Since the first decision of this case by this court (88 N. Y. 52), other stockholders upon their petition have been added as plaintiffs, and the judgment demanded against the defendants is that they may be adjudged to pay the damages sustained by the plaintiffs, and that the receiver may recover, collect and receive the same for the benefit of the creditors and stockholders of the bank, or else that plaintiffs may recover, etc.

Under the allegations of the complaint and upon the very numerous bases of liability respecting the several defendants, it is hard to see exactly what kind of a verdict could be directed as to form, in case the action were to be regarded as a common-law one, and the jury were to give a verdict for the plaintiffs which should cover the whole case and upon which judgment should be entered. The verdict might be for different sums against different defendants, and founded upon distinct liabilities growing out of different acts as to each; and yet the foundation of the verdict in regard to the facts found against each defendant would be problematical in the extreme.

The sums for which defendants might be liable may not only be different, but the total liability of all might exceed the total damage proved, and thus there would be a verdict for different sums against the different defendants and an excess of total liability over the damage proved, and provision would have to be made for such a state of facts in the judgment to be entered, which ought to be based upon a special application, on notice, to the court, and upon its directions then given. All this shows how entirely impracticable would be a reference to a jury of the whole issue as in a common-law action, with a general verdict and a judgment to be entered thereon without any further application to the court.

In Hun v. Cary, 82 N.Y. 65, there was but one negligent or improper act alleged, that being the purchase of the lot and erection of the building on it under the circumstances proved. The damage was plain; it was of the same amount against all who were liable at all, and a general verdict in damages could properly be given which could be entered without any further application to the court and would be final in regard to the rights of all parties. The court said that under such circumstances it was not error to try the issue there involved by a jury, and that there were no equitable rights to be adjusted and no occasion to appeal to an equitable forum. The difference between the cases is wide and material. The cases cited by defendants' counsel as to the right of trial by jury in cases of fraud, etc., do not apply here.

The case of Bradley v. Aldrich, 40 N. Y. 504, merely holds that an allegation of grounds in plaintiffs' complaint for equitable relief and nothing else, where proof of such grounds fail, does not permit the court to try an action for fraud without a jury. The former practice of the court of chancery was to dismiss the bill when all ground for equitable interposition failed, even though a cause of action at law appeared to arise out of the transaction. When a party alleges a cause of action of an equitable nature he must prove one, so far as the question of a trial by jury is concerned; and he cannot escape such tribunal by alleging an equitable cause of action and, while wholly failing to prove it, obtain a trial by the court of a common-law action arising out of the transaction. To show that there is an issue of fraud in a case does not necessarily make the case one for a jury, or give a defendant a legal right to such a trial as if it were a common-law action.

An action with an issue of fraud in it could and can now certainly be tried by the court (unless issues were properly framed for trial by jury), even against the desire of defendants, as in an action to set aside a deed or other instrument on the ground of fraud. This action is an equitable one, and the issues to be tried by a jury are to be reviewed by the court in the same manner as in equitable actions; and the plaintiff does not fail to show the equitable nature of this action by proving the allegations of his complaint, even though the ground of the liability of the trustees whom he is seeking to call to account is their negligence and fraud. A court of equity still has jurisdiction of such an action.

The case of Davison v. Associates of the Jersey Company, 71 N. Y. 333, 340, is of the same general nature as Bradley v. Aldrich, supra. The case was brought to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land and had been once tried. On the second trial the plaintiff demanded a jury trial on the ground that it appeared on the former trial that defendants had conveyed the lots before the commencement of the action, and that the evidence would now show a cause of action at common law for damages only. The court denied the motion and the denial was upheld in this court, upon the ground that the plaintiff, by bringing his action for a specific performance of the contract to convey, had elected his forum and waived his right to a jury trial, but that the rule was different in the case of a defendant, who could not be deprived of a jury trial in a proper case, because plaintiff demanded equitable instead of legal relief. In other words, if defendants had asked for a trial by jury of the issue as to damages (the equitable relief of a specific performance having passed away by the conveyance of the land by the defendants to other parties), such request would have been granted, and it would have been no answer to such application to show that the action was originally for equitable relief. This case is nothing of the sort.

But without doubt there are issues which ought to be tried by a jury, and the order of the special term very wisely provided for framing issues for such a trial.

The order of the General Term should be reversed and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in both courts.

1. No authority was conferred upon a District Court of the City of New York, by chapter 344 of Laws of 1854, or chapter 484 of Laws of 1862, to order an action for claim and delivery to be transferred from that court into the court of common pleas. Hence, an undertaking given on the removal of such an action, not being made under any statutory authority, is void and cannot be enforced, and, being without consideration, cannot be supported as a common-law bond.
2. The undertaking was conditioned to pay any judgment that the court of common pleas should render against defendant. Held, that by this was intended a valid judgment, and that as the common pleas acquired no jurisdiction by the unauthorized removal and none by subsequent proceedings, the judgment rendered by it was void and not covered by the undertaking, even if the undertaking could be maintained in any view.
3. Held, also, that the sureties were not estopped by any recital in the undertaking from availing themselves of the invalidity of the instrument when sued thereon.

(Decided April 26, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas of the City and County of New York, affirming a judgment of the General Term of the Marine Court, which affirmed a judgment of a trial term in favor of defendant, in an action against a surety for damages for breach of an undertaking given on removal of an action. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr.* Christopher Fine, for appellant:

The defendant did not plead the supposed or assumed invalidity or irregularity of the agreement or undertaking, or by plea or otherwise make any pretense that he was induced to make and execute the agreement in question, by coercion, fraud, or even mistake; and he cannot now be heard to make such claim.

But even if the supposed illegality of the agreement or undertaking had been pleaded, the defendant would be estopped from denying the recitals therein contained, or the legality of the obligations voluntarily assumed by the obligors.

Sureties will not be permitted to deny that the surrogate had jurisdiction of the case, or to take the bond and issue the letters of administration.

The defendant who voluntarily becomes surety for a substituted trustee, is precluded in an action on such undertaking from denying his liability as surety, though the proceedings were irregular and erroneous, and upon a direct proceeding (for that purpose) might have been set aside or reversed.

But the undertaking or agreement in question is a valid instrument and binding upon the obligors.

The recital of the pecuniary or valuable consideration moving to the defendant could not, as matter of law, be contradicted for the purpose of defeating the agreement; nor in fact was any such denial or attempt made.

The agreement or undertaking in question is a valid contract on the part of the defendant, based upon a sufficient and valuable consideration, and should be enforced.

Methodist Ch. v. Barker, 18 N. Y. 463, 466; Brown v. Sprague, 5 Denio, 545, 552, 553.

The undertaking in question would be valid and of binding force and effect, by virtue of the statute providing for removals of causes from the district courts to the common pleas for trial, where the amount involved over $100, even if such undertaking did not contain a valid consideration.

Mr.* Jacob L. Hanes, for respondent:

The original judgment of the marine court, and the several affirmances thereof were right and should stand, because the alleged undertaking upon which the action was brought being to Jacob A. Mittnacht personally and only, and not having been assigned by him to the plaintiff, she had no right to maintain an action thereupon.

The so-called undertaking upon which this action is brought (not being under seal, and being without consideration) could have no legal force or validity, unless it was prescribed by statute.

Post v. Doremus, 60 N. Y. 371.

It has, however, never been pretended that said alleged undertaking had any statutory prescription or authorization, otherwise than by the New York District Court Act (chap. 344, Laws of 1857), section 3, subdivision 3. But, as section 3 of that Act first prescribes the instances in which said district courts could have jurisdiction, without including therein actions of replevin, and the other authorizes removal, with prescription of undertaking thereon, only in those actions commenced in pursuance of that section, in which the claim or demand should exceed $100, it is clear that no power or jurisdiction of removal of an action of replevin was thereby given; and any supposed order of removal, or undertaking for removal, in such case must be void.

Curtis v. Besson, 6 Daly, 432.

The justice of the district court who received the alleged undertaking, being wholly without jurisdiction so to do, or to make any order of removal thereupon, the respondent is not estopped from his defense that his supposed undertaking was invalid and void.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1876, one Jacob Mittnacht commenced an action of claim and delivery for the recovery of personal property in a District Court of the City of New York against John B. Gschwind. Issue was joined in the action, and immediately thereupon the defendant commenced proceedings to remove the case into the Court of Common Pleas of the City of New York. For that purpose he procured to be executed and filed in the said district court an undertaking, signed by himself as principal, and John Kellermann and Frederick Dieterle, as sureties, which undertaking, after reciting the commencement of the action under chapter 344, of the Laws of 1857, the joinder of issue therein, that a trial thereof had not been had, and the application of the defendant to remove the case into the court of common pleas under the provisions of said Act, continues: that now, therefore, we, John B. Gschwind, John Kellermann and Frederick Dieterle, "have and hereby do in consideration of the premises aforesaid, and of one dollar to us in hand paid, jointly and severally promise and agree that we will pay to the plaintiff the amount of any judgment that may be awarded against the defendants by the said court of common pleas in this action."

The district court thereupon assumed to make an order removing the case into the court of common pleas, upon the ex parte application of the defendant therein. Thereupon the plaintiff caused said action to be placed upon the calendar of the court of common pleas at a trial term thereof; and when the case was reached, in the regular course of proceedings, moved the same for trial, and, the defendant not appearing, took his default and entered judgment, upon an inquest, for the return of the property described, and, in case that could not be had, for the amount of $250, its assessed value.

No appearance in the action was in any way made in the court of common pleas by the defendant, after its attempted removal there; and it does not appear that he ever took any steps in the original action after obtaining the order of removal.

This action is brought to recover the damages arising out of an alleged breach of the undertaking given on the attempted removal. The grounds upon which liability is contested are that the undertaking was without consideration; that the district court had no authority to order a removal of an action for claim and delivery from that court into the court of common pleas, and that the latter court acquired no jurisdiction of the case by reason of the proceedings to remove it, and has rendered no valid judgment in such action.

It seems to us quite clear that the district court had no authority to order an action for claim and delivery to be transferred from that court into the court of common pleas. By chapter 344 of the Laws of 1857, being an Act to consolidate the several Acts relating to district courts in the City of New York, it is provided by section 3, that such courts have jurisdiction in the following actions:

1. In actions similar to those provided by sections 53 and 54 of the Code of Procedure where the sum named shall not exceed $250.

2. In an action upon the charter, ordinances or by-laws of the Corporation of the City of New York, or a statute of this State where the penalty shall exceed $250.

It is then provided by subdivision 3 of that section that "In any action commenced in pursuance of this section where the claim or demand shall exceed the sum of $100 upon the application of the defendant, the justice shall make an order removing the same, at any time after issue joined, and before the trial of the same, into the Court of Common Pleas, in and for the City and County of New York, upon the defendant executing to the plaintiff an undertaking with one or more sufficient sureties, to be approved of by the justice of the court in which such action is commenced, to pay to the plaintiff the amount of any judgment that may be awarded against the defendant by the said court of common pleas."

It will be observed that this Act conferred no jurisdiction upon the district courts to entertain any actions except those calling for the relief to be obtained by money judgments. It is not claimed that they thereby obtained any jurisdiction of an action for claim and delivery.

By section 17 of chapter 484 of the Laws of 1862, jurisdiction was conferred upon district courts to hear and determine actions for claim and delivery, where the value of the property claimed did not exceed $250. The question whether such an action was removable into the court of common pleas, under section 3 of the Act of 1857, arose in that court in 1876, in the case of Curtis v. Besson, 6 Daly, 432, where it was held that it was not, the court saying that the Act of 1862 made no provision for such removal, and that the terms of the provisions of section 3 of the Act of 1857, were inconsistent with the theory that such power of removal was intended to be conferred.

They say: "By that section conferring jurisdiction solely of actions for the recovery of money the power of removal is only in such actions (referred to in subdivisions 1 and 2) and the obligation of the undertaking required in such a proceeding is to pay 'the amount of any (money) judgment;' while in a proceeding for the removal of the action for the recovery of the possession of personal property, any such an obligation would be unadapted to the case and would not furnish the plaintiff with the security for the performance of such terms, as the judgment in such an action in favor of the plaintiff would award."

Great weight must be given to the opinions of that court, upon questions affecting its own practice and jurisdiction; and we should be reluctant to overrule its disposition of such cases, especially when they had been long acquiesced in, even if we were not entirely satisfied with the reasons given therefor.

But we are also of the opinion that the decision of that case was a correct exposition of the meaning and intent of the statute referred to.

It follows from these views that the order of the district court removing the original case to the court of common pleas was without jurisdiction, and did not effect such removal; that the court of common pleas acquired no jurisdiction of that action by force of the order of removal, and that all subsequent proceedings in that court were void and of no effect. It also follows, from these views, that the execution of the undertaking in question was not made under any statutory authority; and it cannot be supported upon the theory that it was executed according to any requirement of law.

Although it may be open to some question whether the security in question comes within the provisions of the statute against bonds taken colore officii (Decker v. Judson, 16 N. Y. 439), it yet derives no support from the statute, and must be sustained, if sustainable at all, upon some other theory. The general rule that bonds taken by public officers purporting to be taken under statutory authority, but which are not actually authorized by the statute, or do not conform in all material respect with its provisions, are void, is too well established by authority to be questioned or disputed. Post v. Doremus, 60 N. Y. 371; People v. Meighan, 1 Hill, 299; Homan v. Brinckerhoff, 1 Denio, 184.

Some claim has been made by the appellant that it may be upheld as a valid instrument at common law; but such an instrument, like other contracts made between parties, requires a consideration to support it. This contract has none. It was a unilateral undertaking, executed by defendant in an action, acting in hostility to the plaintiff, and by which he sought to obtain an advantageous position in the litigation against the will of his adversary. If it had force, it was not by any agreement or consent of the parties, but was the act of one party attempted to be imposed upon the other as a compliance with an assumed statutory authority. It was not claimed that it had any other efficacy than such as the statute gave it.

The admission of the receipt of one dollar does not state who received it or from whom it came. Ordinarily such an acknowledgment would import that it came from the obligee; but such an inference cannot legally be indulged when the situation of the parties forbids it. It cannot be presumed that a hostile party in a law suit has advanced money to his adversary to enable a proceeding to be taken which he did not know of and would naturally desire to defeat. This bond was not given as the condition of any favor extended by the court or as the price of any consideration to be granted by the plaintiff, but was an ex parte proceeding to compel a removal of the case under the claim of a legal right. The defendant did not ask any favor of the plaintiff, and proceeded regardless of his assent or dissent to the proceeding.

We, therefore, think the bond was invalid, as being wholly without consideration.

Assuming, however, that the bond was given upon a sufficient consideration, we are of the opinion that no breach of its conditions has been shown, and that the court of common pleas has never rendered judgment in the action against the defendant.

Admitting that the court of common pleas had jurisdiction of actions for claim and delivery, it does not appear that they ever acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. No process of that court was ever served upon him, and he never, in any manner, appeared in the action after its attempted removal to that court. The bond was conditioned to pay any judgment that the court of common pleas should render against the defendant. This clearly implies that it should be a valid judgment of that court, and not the expression of an ineffectual opinion. A decision of that court, which it had no authority to make, lacks all of the essential qualities of a judgment. As we have heretofore seen, the court of common pleas acquired no jurisdiction from the order of the district court, and it acquired none by any subsequent proceedings. That court could not, therefore, render a judgment in that action.

The appellant also claims that the defendant should be precluded from raising the questions as to the invalidity of this bond because they have not been raised by answer.

It will be observed that the questions raised all appear on the face of the complaint and lie at the foundation of the action. In any view that we can take of the case no cause of action was stated in the complaint.

The subsequent appearance of the plaintiff in the action in the court of common pleas adds nothing to the force of the bond, for the obligation executed by the sureties was either legal when the contemplated action had been taken upon it, or it was then void. The parties to the action could not, by their voluntary action or agreement, create a consideration for an undertaking which had no existence at the time of its execution.

While it may be assumed that the parties intended to execute an instrument which should be effectual to remove the case to the court of common pleas, we have no authority to say they intended thereby to leave it optional with the plaintiff to remove it or not as he should afterwards elect.

Finally, it is claimed that the defendant is estopped from disputing the jurisdiction of the court of .common pleas by the recitals in the undertaking, and that he thereby admits that it did or would acquire jurisdiction by the order of removal. We do not see what recitals there are in this instrument which affirms such a fact or estops the sureties from availing themselves of the insufficiency or invalidity of the instrument.

It may be inferred from the language of the bond that the defendant intended to claim that by filing such a paper and moving the court to transfer the case, he had, under the Act of 1857, the right to have the case removed into the court of common pleas; but there is no recital therein which he now controverts, and none which directly affirms either as fact or opinion. At the strongest, what was then said amounted only to an inference as to what was the defendant's opinion; and this, honestly entertained and expressed, cannot be the basis of an estoppel or a contract.

The authorities cited by the counsel for the appellant, to the effect that parties to an undertaking are bound by the recitals therein contained, are quite inapplicable to this case, for there are no recitals in this instrument which it is now necessary for him to controvert.

The judgment should, therefore, be affirmed.

All concur.

John LOUGHLIN, Appt.

In an action by a stranger to a contract made by defendant with a certain firm for the doing of work by such firm upon a building under the direction of an architect, to recover for work necessary for the completion of the building, claimed by plaintiff to have been done by him by direction of the architect and for the defendant's benefit, but which the defendant denied having ordered or authorized, held, that there was enough evidence on the plaintiff's side to make out a case, and that therefore the court of appeals was without jurisdiction to weigh the evidence.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment entered in Kings County upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action for work, labor and materials. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Roger A. Pryor, for appellant:

The only authority communicated to Keeley was to see that the contract between defendant and Fickett & Co. was carried out by Fickett & Co. Authority to make another contract and with another party is repugnant equally to the object and to the terms of the instrument.

Niles v. Smith, 2 Code Rep. 31.

The implied assumpsit arises upon the dealings between the parties to the action, and cannot arise upon the dealings between the defendant and the original contractor.

Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28.

Neither plaintiff's misconstruction of the contract nor common talk and general belief suffices to fix defendant with responsibility for Keeley's acts. It results, therefore, to demonstration that Keeley had no authority under the contract between defendant and Fickett & Co. to employ Mooney.

Craighead v. Peterson, 72 N. Y. 279; Zottman v. San Francisco, 81 Am. Dec. 99.

The judgment is erroneous unless appellant be estopped to deny Keeley's authority or has ratified his employment of Mooney, with such effect as to imply a legal obligation to pay for the work.

Keeley's own declarations are insufficient to establish an estoppel.

Marvin v. Wilber, 52 N. Y. 270; Scott v. Stevenson, 3 Hun, 352; Howard v. Norton, 65 Barb. 161; Harker v. Dement, 9 Gill, 7.

It requires some act of the principal to estop him from disputing the power of an assumed agent.

Town of Springport v. Teutonia Sav. Bank, 75 N. Y. 397, 407.

But plaintiff admits that Keeley never said he was agent for defendant other than under the contract.

It is indispensable to the binding efficacy of an estoppel that the party urging it should have been ignorant of the actual authority; Bigelow, Estop. 484, 520; Booth v. Farmers etc. Nat. Bank, 4 Lans. 306; Veeder v. Mudgett, 95 N.Y. 310; and should have acted upon the fact or representation alleged as an estoppel.

Winegar v. Fowler, 82 N. Y. 315; Waring v. Somborn, 82 N. Y. 604; Van Deusen v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 378.

A principal is bound by an act of his agent, in excess or abuse of his authority, only as to third persons who believe and have a right to believe that the agent was acting within and not exceeding his authority, and who would sustain loss if the act was not considered that of the principal.

Walsh v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 10.

Apparent authority operates only by way of estoppel.

People v. Bank of North America, 75 N.Y. 548.

Defendant never ratified the employment of plaintiff by Keely.

Ratification is when "the principal, with full knowledge of what has been done by the agent (Rowan v. Hyatt, 45 N. Y. 138; Nixon v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. 398; Ritch v. Smith, 82 N. Y. 627; Brass v. Worth, 40 Barb. 654; Smith v. Tracy, 36 N. Y. 84; Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 225; Murray v. Bininger, 3 Keyes, 109), consents to be bound by it, and unequivocally manifests such intent to the other party."

Keeler v. Salisbury, 33 N.Y. 648; Benninghoff v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 93 N.Y. 495.

Again; ratification from silence does not arise unless the person claiming the ratification has been misled to act by such silence, or has been induced thereby to forego some advantage which he would have otherwise enjoyed.

Guimbillot v. Abat, 6 Rob. (La.) 284; Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co. 78 N.Y. 159.

Here it is not apparent defendant was aware that the claim was for extra work; Bigelow, Estop. 569; nor that he agreed to be bound by Keely's act, for he refused to pay the claim or to acknowledge its obligation. True, when plaintiff alleged that Keeley had ordered the work, he did not deny Keeley's authority; but first, there is no evidence that he knew the work was outside Keeley's written authority; and this plaintiff was bound to prove; Nixon v. Palmer, 8 N.Y. 401; Bigelow, Estop. 598; and second, defendant's silence did not mislead plaintiff to his detriment.

Defendant's overture to arbitrate the claim, so far from being a concession of it, is a challenge of it; and his offer to pay one tenth of the bill in satisfaction of the whole was a mere proposition to buy peace, made in the same breath in which he disputed the validity of the demand.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 192; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1090; Williams v. Thorp, 8 Cow. 202.

Acquiescence in the usurpation of authority by Keeley cannot be inferred from omission of defendant to repudiate the unauthorized act; for the obligation to repudiate arises only upon knowledge of the usurpation—and here is no evidence that defendant knew that the employment of plaintiff was outside the contract, or, otherwise than as servant of Fickett & Co., to perform the extras pursuant to the contract. "The principal, upon being informed of an act in excess of his authority, has a right to elect," etc.

Andrews v. Ætna Life Ins. Co. 92 N.Y. 604.

The decision of the general term is based, not alone upon the theory of agency, but upon the ground that as defendant is in enjoyment of the benefit of plaintiff's work, "the law implies an obligation to pay the value of it." It will be observed that the court assumes the building to be the property of defendant, of which there is no evidence. But, upon the postulate on which the case was tried, viz.: that the legal title is in defendant, for the benefit of the church, and that the building is occupied by the church as a hospital, it would not be a valid inference that defendant was in receipt and enjoyment of the benefit of plaintiff's work, with the effect of raising an implied assumpsit on his part to pay for the work. However, a long established and familar rule exempts the owner of real property from the operation of the rule here applied by the court.

Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 189; Reed v. Board of Education, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 24; Ellis v. Hamlen, 3 Taunt. 52; Burn v. Miller, 4 Taunt. 745; Munro v. Butt, 8 Ell. & Bl. 738; Zottman v. San Francisco, 81 Am. Dec. 105.

To the point that the extra work having been done without authority from defendant, he is not bound to pay for it, Dobson v. Hudson, 1 C. B. N. S. 652, is an explicit authority.

Mr. Daniel G. Harriman, for respondent:

The questions of fact in this action having been settled in favor of the plaintiff, by the referee, and confirmed by the general term below, upon conflicting evidence, cannot now be reviewed by this court.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 24th of February, 1882, the defendant, of the first part, and Fickett & Co., of the second part, entered into an agreement by which Fickett & Co. undertook to do certain work upon St. Mary's Hospital, in accordance with drawings and specifications made by one Keeley, an architect, and to finish the same to his satisfaction and under his direction. The plaintiff is not a party to that contract, but it is conceded that he did work and furnished materials necessary for the completion of the building, to the amount of $571.76. Not being paid he sued the defendant, alleging that the work was done and the materials furnished for the defendant and for his benefit.

The defendant answered, denying that he, either himself or by any authorized agent, employed the plaintiff to do the work.

Upon the pleadings, therefore, the only issue was as to the liability of the defendant to pay for work and materials, the benefit of which according to the pleadings he enjoys.

The issue was referred to a referee, and he, after hearing the evidence, at the defendant's request, found: first, that the plaintiff did the work under the instructions of P. C. Keeley; second, that Keeley was the architect of the hospital. He also found that Keeley acted as agent of the defendant, and further found that the defendant subsequently ratified the action of Keeley, accepted and is now using and enjoying the benefits of the plaintiff's work and materials. He found the value as above stated.

Upon appeal to the general term the judgment entered upon the report of the referee was affirmed; and from the decision then made this appeal is taken.

The learned counsel for the appellant contends in the first place that there was no evidence of authority in Keeley to contract with the plaintiff for the work in suit; second, that the defendant never ratified the appointment by Keeley; and lastly that the judgment is wrong because of the admission by the referee of improper evidence, without which the plaintiff's case was not made out; in other words, that the evidence was insufficient to charge the defendant with liability for the plaintiff's claim. He concedes that if there is any conflict in the evidence in regard to the matters in issue, the findings of the referee and the decision of the general term would be conclusive upon this court, and fatal to his appeal.

The only question then is as to the evidence presented by the parties.

That Keeley was the architect and superintendent of the construction of the building referred to is established beyond question. One of the firm of Fickett & Co. testified that the plaintiff was employed to do all the painting on the hospital that they had agreed to do under the contract, but that the work in question was outside the contract and not included in it.

The plaintiff testified that after completing the work now in question, he presented his bill to the defendant, who looked at it and asked him "What appeared to be the trouble? Was not the work done?" Plaintiff said: "It was," and the defendant said: "You know I know nothing about this work. Mr. Keeley looks after all this work for me, and I cannot pay this bill." Plaintiff said: "Why, Bishop; is not Mr. Keeley your agent?" He said, "He is, and therefore I cannot pay you without his signature to your bill; I will see Mr. Keeley and let you know shortly. Please call again." Plaintiff did so, and defendant examined the bill, and asked who ordered the work to be done? and then said: "This should be left to arbitration." "He asked me to leave the bill with him, and I did so. He objected to no part of the bill." The defendant subsequently told the plaintiff: "Mr. Keeley says he never ordered you to do any work." The defendant then advised plaintiff to see Mr. Keeley again.

The plaintiff further testified that the work was done in pursuance of directions received by him from Mr. Keeley; and further that he told Keeley that the things required were extra; and Keeley told him "They will have to be looked after and taken care of. You make them the same as the rest of the work."

Upon cross examination by the defendant, he not only reiterated the testimony before given as to directions received from Keeley, but being asked as to the authority he understood Mr. Keeley to have, answered, "I understood he had entire authority to do more or less work, or have me do anything he saw fit;" and also, "I considered Mr. Keeley's orders as completely binding on the defendant."

Further, in answer to the counsel for the defendant, he said: "I understood he was defendant's agent for all purposes on that building."

The defendant was examined as a witness and proved that Keeley was the architect of the hospital. He denied that Keeley had any authority to act for him outside of the contract, and that personally he never employed Mr. Mooney to do any work on the hospital.

Keeley, examined for the defendant, substantially contradicted the plaintiff, so far as his memory served him. With regard to the extra work as described by the plaintiff, his testimony tends to corroborate the plaintiff concerning the change of color and requiring the panels of the doors to be made lighter, and the stiles darker.

He also testifies that extra work was done besides what was mentioned in the contract, that some was ordered by Sister Ermiliana, who, by the terms of the contract, was authorized to make additions or require deviations from its provisions. He cannot state positively that he himself did not order some extra work.

In any view of the evidence the work was done, the materials were furnished, and now form part of the structure referred to in the contract. If on the defendant's evidence the work was such as the contractor should have performed, on the plaintiff's evidence it was extra work, ordered by the architect, by him deemed necessary in the construction of the building, to the benefit of which the defendant has succeeded, and there seems to be no legal reason why the plaintiff should not be paid according to his claim. It was for the referee to determine which of the two sets of witnesses he would believe, and what inferences he would draw from the facts stated by them. There is enough on the plaintiff's side to make out a case; and that is sufficient to deprive this court of jurisdiction to weigh the evidence.

We think the facts found by the referee are not conjectural merely, but are supported by evidence, and upon those facts the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The exceptions to evidence have been examined. They are general and not specific in form, and point to no substantial error.

The judgment should be affirmed.

OAKVILLE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
DOUBLE-POINTED TACK CO., Respt.

1. In an action to reform a written contract for mistake, where the trial court has found, as matter of fact, upon sufficient evidence that no mistake existed and the substantial purpose of the action is thereby defeated, the plaintiff cannot raise the further question of the construction of the contract and insist that its true meaning is precisely what it would have been if the instrument were reformed as asked.
2. That is a purely legal question which does not belong to the equitable action and can be determined in an action at law on the contract; the remedy at law is adequate, and no ground exists for the interposition of equity.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of defendant in an action to reform a written contract on the ground of mistake. Affirmed.

The Oakville Company was engaged in the manufacture of pins at Oakville, Connecticut. The Double Pointed Tack Company, the defendant, carried on business in the City of New York. Previous to the contract in question, the plaintiff, under orders from the defendant, manufactured certain safety pins, for which the defendant held two letters patent. On or about January 7, 1881, a contract was entered into between the two Companies, which, so far as material to this action, was as follows:

It was agreed upon the part of the Oakville Company, in consideration of the assignment to it of the above patents:

1. That it would manufacture the "Miles Safety Pin," and the "Miles All Wire Safety Pin," "but it shall not be obligatory upon the said Oakville Company to manufacture the 'Miles All Wire Safety Pin,' unless there shall be a demand upon the part of the trade for such a pin, and a reasonable profit can be made from its manufacture;" "2, that the said Oakville Company, will sell and pay royalty on, as hereinafter stated, not less than 25,000 gross of one or both kinds of the above named safety pins, each and every year during the life of said patents, except during the year 1881, and during said year this rule shall not be enforced; 3, that the Oakville Company shall render to the Double Pointed Tack Company, on or before the 10th day of each month, a statement in writing of the number of gross of safety pins sold by them during the previous month, to be accompanied by a check or New York draft, for four cents per gross upon the sales of such preceding month, the same being the patent fee for the enjoyment of the exclusive right to manufacture under the Miles patents assigned to them, as hereinbefore mentioned; 4, * * * 5, that if the said Oakville Company does not report and pay royalty to the said Double Pointed Tack Company upon at least 25,000 gross of safety pins each year during the life of said patents, except during the year 1881, or fails to render statements, and make payments as above provided, or does manufacture and sell other safety pins * * * then the said Oakville Company will, upon the written demand of the said The Double Pointed Tack Company, or its legal representatives, assign without consideration back to the said The Double Pointed Tack Company, or its legal representatives, both of said letters patents; * * * and the said The Double Pointed Tack Company shall enjoy from the date of such demand all the exclusive rights and privileges under said patents as it would have enjoyed had the above mentioned assignments to said Oakville Company and this agreement not been made."

Plaintiff brought this action to reform the above agreement, alleging that it was not drawn in accordance with the agreement and understanding of the parties preceding the execution of the instrument; that as the agreement was understood to be and intended to have been drawn, the only effect of a failure to sell not less than 25,000 gross of the said pins each year during the life of said patents, was the privilege of the said defendant to demand and receive a reassignment of the said patents, without consideration, and that it was not the intention or agreement of the parties that the plaintiff should pay royalties on any of said pins, except what it should actually sell.

At the trial in the special term, before a justice without a jury, the court found in favor of defendant, and a judgment was entered accordingly. On appeal to the general term where the judgment was affirmed, the court, per BRADY, J., stated the evidence bearing upon the construction of the contract as follows:

"The evidence shows that after much negotiation an agreement was prepared and executed by the parties through their respective officers, Mr. J. H. Bronson, the secretary of the plaintiff, acting for it, and Mr. Putnam, the treasurer of the defendant, acting in its behalf. The provision in the contract which related to the sale of safety pins, and which the defendant sought to reform, was to the effect that the Oakville Company was to sell and pay a royalty on not less than 25,000 gross of one or both kinds of safety pins named in the contract each and every year during the life of the patents relating to such pins, and which were assigned to the Oakville Company, except during the year 1881, during which the rule should not be enforced, the plaintiff insisting that it was neither the agreement nor intention of the parties that it should pay royalty on any pins except what it should actually sell. The difference between the two contracts thus suggested, the one executed and the one to be substituted for it, is apparent and important, because in the contract as executed the obligation is to pay a royalty upon not less than 25,000 gross, while in the other the royalty is to be paid on the pins actually sold.

"The testimony discloses some very extraordinary features. It appears that Mr. Bronson, who acted on behalf of the plaintiff, after interviews and correspondence relating to the subject, copied the agreement which was ultimately declared satisfactory to the defendant, and by Mr. Putnam handed to him for examination, who for this purpose retained it several days. According to the statement of Mr. Bronson, upon his examination in chief, there was no intention or design at any time to contract for the payment of a royalty, except upon pins actually sold, notwithstanding the agreement expressly provides to the contrary, and notwithstanding he admits having copied the agreement signed and must be charged, therefore, with having knowledge of its contents. His cross examination reveals the fact that his positive asservations detailed were not entirely reliable, for the reason that it satisfactorily appears that he saw interlined in the draft contract which was ultimately adopted the words imposing the payment of the royalty upon not less than 25,000 gross of pins. The evidence conclusively shows that the words were interlined when the paper was given to him, and he admitted upon his cross examination that the agreement ultimately adopted, which he sent with a letter to Mr. Putnam, contained the clause that the Oakville Company would sell and pay royalty on not less than 25,000 gross for one or both kinds of safety pins, as already stated; so that it appears from his testimony that while he denies any intention to make any agreement other than that the Company should pay a royalty upon the number of pins actually sold, he admits that he copied the paper containing the interlineation in favor of the defendant, and after having had the paper in his possession for several days, and also that he executed the agreement after having it in his possession for several days prior to its execution. And it may be added that the evidence does not show any objection by him at any time to the clause in question."

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. James S. Stearns and William E. Curtis, for appellant:

The proper construction of this contract is that plaintiff only agreed to pay a royalty to the defendant for the pins actually sold by it, and that the only right which plaintiff's failure to sell the 25,000 gross per year confers upon the defendant is the right to terminate the license.

The second article provides that the plaintiff "will sell and pay royalty upon, as hereinafter stated," not less than 25,000 gross, etc. The only provisions for payments thereinafter stated are as follows: the third article provides that the plaintiff shall render each month a true statement in writing of the number of gross sold by it during the previous month, and that this statement shall be accompanied by a check or draft for the royalty "upon the sales of such preceding month." As there is no provision made after the second article or anywhere else, for payment of any royalty except upon actual sales, this contract must be construed to mean that the payment of royalty on actual sales is all that is required.

In other words, if defendant's claim is correct, then the contract stultifies itself. It requires a payment, as thereinafter mentioned, without thereinafter making mention of any such payment. The only reasonable interpretation to put upon this clause is that the payment is to be made upon actual sales, and those are expressly provided for.

The amounts specified in the contract are not intended as a measure of the royalties to be paid.

It has been claimed that if the real agreement was that plaintiff should sell 25,000 gross per year this would amount to the same thing as an agreement to pay a royalty on 25,000 gross per year. In reading the contract, there is a marked distinction between the two. The one would be a positive contract to pay money; but the other would be only a covenant, the breach of which involves very different questions. In this case if there is such a covenant, its breach can carry no greater result than the forfeiture of the license.

If there is any doubt that plaintiff's interpretation of the contract is correct, then the whole contract, and all the circumstances attending the making of it, must be taken into consideration, and everything which may throw any light upon what was the intention of the parties, when the contract was made, can be brought in to explain its true meaning; and the actual intention of the parties will control.

Knapp v. Warner, 57 N. Y. 668; Clark v. N. Y. Life Ins. etc. Co. 64 N. Y. 38; Parshall v. Eggert, 54 N. Y. 18.

No other construction than that claimed by plaintiff ever entered into the minds of either party until long after the execution of the contract.

The rule for the construction and interpretation of this contract is clearly laid down in this State as follows:

"The rule in ethics is that 'when the terms of a promise admit of more senses than one, the promise is to be performed in that sense in which the promisor apprehended at the time the promisee received it,' and this is the established rule at law as well as in morals. In the language of the books, it is to be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor had reason to suppose it was understood by the promisee."

White v. Hoyt, 73 N. Y. 511 and cases cited.

Even if the construction claimed by plaintiff were not sufficiently established, yet the right would still remain to have the contract reformed, on the ground of mistake in reducing the agreement to writing, and the court has ample power to do so, in such a manner that it correctly express the actual agreement entered into between the parties.

Pitcher v. Hennessey, 48 N. Y. 423; Albany City Savings Inst. v. Burdick, 87 N. Y. 46; Oliver v. Mut. Com. Marine Ins. Co. 2 Curtis, C. C. 277; Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet. 1 (26 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 27); Cuff v. Dorland, 55 Barb. 481; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 156.

Mr. U. W. Tomkins, for respondent:

Equity will not reform a contract unless the mistake is mutual.

Story v. Conger, 36 N. Y. 673; Nevius v. Dunlap, 33 N. Y. 676; Jackson v. Andrews, 59 N. Y. 244; Albany City Savings Inst. v. Burdick, 87 N. Y. 40; Paine v. Upton, 87 N. Y. 327.

Willard's Equity Jurisprudence, Potter's ed. 64, lays down the following rules as applicable in cases of this kind, where fraud is not alleged: 1, there must be a plain mistake which must be clearly proved; 2, it must have been a mutual mistake; 3, it must have been a mistake of fact; 4, it should be made clearly to appear what the real contract was.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action alleges a mistake in the written contract between the parties, and seeks its reformation so as to correctly express their agreed purpose and intention. The trial court has found as matter of fact that no mistake existed, and upon evidence quite sufficient to support the finding. That of course defeats the action so far as its substantial purpose is concerned.

But the plaintiff seeks to raise a further question over the construction of the contract as originally drawn, and insists that its true meaning is precisely what it would have been if the instrument had been reformed in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. That is a purely legal question, which does not belong to the equitable action before us. It will arise, if at all, when one party sues the other for royalties claimed to be due, and may then be determined properly and correctly and with an effective result. The remedy at law is obvious and adequate, and no ground exists for the interposition of equity.

The exceptions taken to the exclusion of evidence as to what is customary in making similar contracts, and to that of the existing agreement between the defendant and the original patentee, need not be discussed. The ruling of the court in each instance involved no error.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.
All concur.

v.
Lazarus LISSBERGER, Appt.

1. In an action to recover the price of iron rails sold under a contract made in New York, dated February 2, 1881, providing for "prompt shipment by sail from Europe, and for delivery on dock at the Port of New York," dangers of the sea excepted, precedent to payment, it appeared that the rails were, on February 3, placed on board a ship at Stettin, a river port in Germany, which port was then closed by ice and was not open for navigation until April 2 or 3, on which last day the ship sailed for New York, where it arrived after a voyage of the ordinary length, and the rails were tendered to the buyer on June 14, but he then refused to accept or pay for them. Held, that the buyer was entitled to such timely delivery as would follow an effective shipment; that shipment cannot be said to have been made from Europe when the port selected had no passage way or outlet: that the tender was too late, and that the buyer was not bound to receive the rails.
2. Held further, that the buyer was not estopped from refusing to accept the rails when tendered, by the fact that he had been notified by the sellers on March 1, that the rails had been "shipped from Stettin;" on March 19, that the bill of lading was dated February 3, but that they "had no date of the vessel's sailing;" and on May 4, that it was reported that the vessel sailed on April 6;—and had made no objection until the tender of the rails on June 14.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiffs in an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract to purchase iron rails. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. William H. Page, Jr., with Messrs. Edward Lauterbach and William N. Cohen, for appellant:

A fair interpretation of the contract requiring "prompt shipment from Europe," imports that the goods should be gotten promptly without the port of shipment, and that they should become extra-European before the obligation of promptness could be dispensed with.

The force of the word "from" as explained by the authorities negatives the idea that "shipment from" means no more than "shipment at" or "shipment in."

Snyder v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 95 N. Y. 196; De Longuemere v. N. Y. Fire Ins. Co. 10 Johns. 125; Mey v. South Carolina Ins. Co. 3 Brev. 329; Bonney v. Morrill, 52 Maine, 252, 256; U. S. v. La Coste, 2 Mason, 130, 137.

The form of the obligation "prompt" covered the movement of the goods until the dangers of the sea could attach; and this point is reached only when a vessel has left her moorings with intention of sailing.

Pittegrew v. Pringle, 3 Barn. & Adol. 514; Snyder v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 95 N. Y. 196.

When construction is resorted to, the position of the defendant is further strengthened.

The legal rules on this subject direct that attention should be paid to the manner in which such business is usually conducted, and to the known contingencies attendant upon operations of this character.

Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Bowns, 58 N. Y. 573.

The rule that a comprehensive application should be given to the effect of the word "prompt" is recognized by the highest authorities.

The construction, if doubtful, should be against the plaintiff.

White v. Hoyt, 73 N. Y. 511.

The word prompt, when applied to the celerity with which a party shall perform, does not mean that he shall have two months within which to act.

The failure to perform a condition precedent is a bar to recovery.

The following decisions are directly in point: Hill v. Blake, Bowes v. Shand and Norrington v. Wright, supra.

Conceding the plaintiffs' construction of the word "prompt," even then, the delay in the ship's departure was foreseeable, avoidable and unreasonable, so that there was a breach by the plaintiff of an implied condition precedent.

The delay was foreseeable, for the plaintiff's case admits that a delay of four weeks was certain, a delay of six weeks probable, a delay of nearly two months possible; that by using any of numerous ports in Germany, England or France, which were sure to have rails and to be open all winter, the goods could have started at once.

It is a question of law for this court to decide on the facts whether or not this delay was unreasonable.

Hedges v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 223, 225; Roth v. Buffalo etc. R. R. Co. 34 N. Y. 548, 553.

A strict rule should be applied as to time, according to the principle of Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 216; Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 203 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 366, 368).

Norrington v. Wright, supra.

The defendant had waived no right to repudiate the goods when they were tendered.

The contract had no longer any existence on May 4, when the alleged act of waiver occurred, and the defendant was entitled to consider that no negotiation had ever been entered into.

Mere silence constitutes no waiver.

Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 216, 222; Ripley v. Ætna Ins. Co. 30 N. Y. 136.

To establish a waiver the plaintiff had the burden of proof to show that the defendant knew all the material circumstances connected with the shipment of the goods.

Peoples Bank v. Mitchell, 73 N. Y. 406, 413.

The law is that unless the act be express, this doctrine must rest upon the ground of equitable estoppel.

Ripley v. Ætna Ins. Co. and Hill v. Blake, supra.

The severity of the winter, which caused an unusual continuance of the icelocked condition of the Port of Stettin, and prevented the ship and goods from leaving, is no defense to the plaintiffs' failure to perform.

The circumstance which prevented the ship's departure was not an act of God or an inevitable accident.

Kemp v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 69 N. Y. 45; Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Rolling Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487; Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Bowns, 58 N. Y. 573; Read v. Spaulding, 30 N. Y. 630; Elliott v. Rossell, 10 Johns. 1; Nugent v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 19.

The facts show that the plaintiffs had an alternative in fulfilling their contract. They could select a ship in any of the numerous ports, certain to be open, and sure to afford an opportunity of buying goods like the rails contracted for.

The plaintiffs having by express stipulation engaged to act promptly would be bound, even were the occurrence in question conceded to be an act of God.

The dangers of the seas provided for in the contract do not protect the plaintiffs against the consequences of the event in question, since they can only attach when a ship has weighed anchor with intention of sailing.

Pittegrew v. Pringle, 3 Barn. & Adol. 514; Snyder v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 95 N. Y. 196.

Mr. Joseph A. Shoudy, for respondents:

The terms of the contract requiring "prompt shipment by sail from Europe" were strictly and fully complied with. The rails were placed on board the vessel on the day the contract was made, and the bill of lading was given the day following. That this action was prompt will not be denied. That that which was then done amounted to shipment of the rails is equally clear.

Shipment is complete from the moment the goods are placed in the control of the carrier, and the bill of lading given, although the place of delivery may be somewhat distant from the ship.

The Idaho, 11 Blatchf. 222; S. C. 93 U. S. 581 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 980); Foard, Shipping, 506, and cases cited; Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 998); Parsons, Mar. Law, 132, note 1.

The fact that the vessel was ice bound, and for that reason unable to sail promptly after its cargo was laden, does not affect the liability of the defendant. The contract, as we have seen, required only prompt shipment. There was no stipulation for prompt sailing. That would have been an entirely different contract. The plaintiffs having fulfilled the conditions of the contract by the shipment of the rails, if any delay thereafter occurred to the prejudice of the defendant, he must look to the ship for his indemnity. The delay in sailing was not occasioned by any fault of the vessel on which the shipment was made. It arose from an act of God which did not render ineffectual the performance of the terms of the contract by the plaintiffs. The duty which was imposed upon the vessel by receipt of the rails, to transport them with reasonable dispatch, was excused by this unforeseen difficulty.

Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N.Y. 100, and cases cited at p. 108; Worth v. Edmonds, 52 Barb. 40; 14 Wend. 215; 9 Wall. 455 (76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 779).

The court properly excluded defendant's offers of evidence to prove the existence of a custom excepting Baltic Ports under contracts for shipments from Europe.

Evidence of commercial usage in contradiction of the letter of the contract is inadmissible.

The defendant's offer was to show that when parties contracted for shipments from Europe, they did not mean what they in language clearly expressed. Such evidence is never permitted. Usage of the parties cannot be proved to contravene the express stipulation of a contract.

Bradley v. Wheeler, 44 N.Y. 495, 504; Colgate v. Pa. Co. 18 N. Y. Week. Dig. 383.

If appellant desired to take the position that the delay in sailing had released him from the contract, it was his duty to have done so immediately on being informed of the date of sailing.

No principal is better settled than that when one, by his words or conduct, has misled another, he is estopped from so changing his position as to prejudice or injure the party so misled. Nor is it necessary that he should have intended to mislead.

Continental Nat. Bank v. Nat. Bank of the Commonwealth, 50 N. Y. 575, 582; Blair v. Wait, 69 N. Y. 113, 116.

Nor is it necessary that the party should have been moved to act affirmatively, in order to claim an estoppel. His claim may arise from having refrained from action.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is for not accepting certain goods according to a contract made through brokers in these words:

"New York, Feb. 2, 1881.
Sold to Mr. L. Lissberger, New York.
For account Messrs. C. Tobias & Co.
New York.

About one hundred (100) tons old Iron Vignol Rails, for prompt shipment by sail from Europe, and for delivery on dock at the Port of New York (dangers of the sea excepted), at twenty-eight (28) dollars per ton of 2,240 lbs. weight, as per United States Weighmaster's return. Terms of settlement as follows: eighty (80) per cent cash payable when rails are landed on dock, and balance payable on receipt of U. S. Weigher's certificate.

Mann & Jones, Brokers.
Accepted, L. Lissberger."

The complaint, after setting out the agreement, alleges "that the plaintiffs promptly shipped by sail from Europe a lot of about 100 tons of such rails and duly performed all the conditions of the contract on their part, and on the 14th of June, 1881, were ready and willing to deliver, and duly tendered" the rails to the defendant, who refused to acccept or pay for them; that upon notice to defendant they sold the rails on his account, and after applying the proceeds there remained due $345.15, for which, with interest from June 14, 1881, they ask judgment.

The defendant by answer expressly admits the contract, and that on the 14th of June the plaintiffs were willing to deliver, and then tendered to him the rails mentioned in the complaint, and a refusal on his part to accept, and that the plaintiffs after notice sold the same; he denies, however, the other allegations in the complaint, and particularly denies that the goods were promptly shipped from Europe, and says that on the contrary there was a delay of two months, or thereabouts, in such shipment, in consequence of which the goods were of less value in the market than they would have been if promptly shipped; that in this omission the plaintiffs failed to perform the contract on their part, and he therefore refused to accept the rails.

Upon the trial of these issues the plaintiffs read the deposition of the captain of the ship "Brumm," to the effect that his vessel, then lying at Stettin, in Germany, was chartered on the first of January, 1881, for different kinds of goods for New York (Stettin was about forty miles from the sea, situated upon a river); that on the 3d of February, 1881, he received on board from the shippers, Ignatz Rosenthals, Wie & Co., 535 pieces of old rails, deliverable in New York on payment of freight. The bill of lading, then given by him and dated February 3, 1881, was produced by the plaintiffs, is to the same effect, and purports to be indorsed in blank, "Ignatz Rosenthals, Wie & Co."

It also appeared from the captain's testimony that when these rails were shipped the river was frozen fast, the ice being two or three feet thick. It was then expected the ice would break up in March. But the river, which had become closed to navigation about the 20th of January, remained so until the second or third of April, on which last named day the vessel sailed, and after a voyage of the ordinary length arrived in New York.

Usually the ice had broken up at Stettin late in February or early in March, but the winter of 1881 was of extraordinary severity. It was shown in evidence that rails of the kind described in the contract could have been obtained at any time in other European ports, where detention by ice was unknown, ports even in Germany as well as in France and England, and among others London and Liverpool. They seem to have been common in the markets and to be procured easily.

It is stated by the respondents that the only question litigated at the trial was whether the goods were promptly shipped, according to the terms of the contract, and the record sustains that view. The trial judge, against the exception of the defendant, directed a verdict for the plaintiffs. Upon denying a new trial he was of opinion that prompt shipment, under the words of the contract, was within the shipment proven, saying also that "If the defendant wished to provide against a distant port in Europe or any other delaying cause, it was in his power to make it part of the contract;" and failing to do this, he says: "I think the point he makes cannot be sustained." But, he added: "I do not put the decision of the case on the grounds above stated, but upon the ground that after the contract, after notice of shipment, the defendant waited until after the arrival here before making the objection now made."

The general term discusses only the ground first stated by the trial judge, and by a divided court sustained his decision.

The minds of the parties met when the sold note was communicated to and accepted by the defendant. It is the only evidence of the contract, and upon its proper construction the rights of the plaintiffs depend. Their action is upon the theory that the contract imposed upon them the obligations of bringing the goods to New York and there having them ready for delivery. They were, therefore, to furnish the rails, either by selection from their own stock, or by purchase or other means; but however obtained, the rails were to be got from Europe by sailing vessel, at the expense and at the risk of the vendors. They were to ship the rails in such vessel as they chose, upon such terms as they and the master could agree upon; they were to land them on the docks in New York, and at that moment only did any duty attach to the defendant, who was then to pay a certain proportion of the price. The vendors were to procure the weighmaster's return, and on its receipt the balance became due.

The plaintiffs then have sold a quantity of iron, and the question arises as to how the condition shall be performed, which will enable them to make delivery and entitle them to demand payment from the vendee. No time is specified, and if there was nothing else in the contract it would undoubtedly be the duty of the vendors to make delivery of the thing sold within a reasonable time, and to determine whether the plaintiffs had been able to do so, the facts and circumstances attending the transaction would have to be considered. But although the contract specifies neither month nor day, nor duration of time, within which or on which they must perform, it does specify the manner of doing the act which makes performance possible.

The contract provides for "prompt shipment," and it is this condition on which all other stipulations hang. So the plaintiffs understood it, and, as we have seen, they alleged as a condition precedent to the right of action that they "promptly shipped" the iron. This implies expedition, admits of less delay than would be permitted under a covenant to act merely within a reasonable time, and in effect the plaintiffs interpret it as meaning "directly" or "at once."

Such, indeed, was their conduct. The contract was made in New York on the 2d of February, 1881, and the plaintiffs rely upon a bill of lading showing that on the very next day, at Stettin, iron rails answering in description to those named in the contract, were put on board a vessel chartered for New York. Therefore, the respondents' contention is that the whole condition is satisfied, and "If any delay thereafter occurred to the prejudice of the defendant, he must look to the ship for his indemnity."

The last position fails when we see that no privity existed between the defendant and the vessel or its master, and that his only contract relation was with the plaintiffs. The sole object of prompt shipment was to secure a speedy arrival for delivery in New York. Until then the goods were at plaintiffs' risk; and only then could the defendant's liability attach. Before that event happened there was to be neither transfer of title nor transfer of possession. It is quite unimportant to inquire how it might be as between the master of the vessel and the plaintiffs or the shipper, one of whom may be assumed to be the owner, and the other, by virtue at least of the bill of lading, entitled to possession.

As to the plaintiffs in the case before us it is more reasonable to construe the condition of prompt shipment as a precedent to delivery, and so relating to the actual commencement of the voyage that the known unnavigable condition of the river could furnish no excuse for the delay. The defendant was entitled to such timely delivery as would follow an effective shipment; in other words, to an exact performance by the plaintiffs of their contract to ship and deliver, not two things separable in their nature, but two steps to a single end. That involves not only a purpose to transport, but an expectation that transportation would commence, if not at once, certainly within a reasonable time. Shipment cannot be said to have been made from Europe, when the port selected had no passage way or outlet. Nor can it be fairly argued even that the iron was shipped "for delivery in New York," if it was apparent to the shipper that the vessel could not leave the docks where it took in freight. Something more than shipment was bargained for, viz.: prompt shipment; and the delivery was to be within such time as, dangers of the sea only excepted, might reasonably follow. Nothing less could have been in the minds of the parties than expedition, or immediate and effective, or beneficial shipment as a step towards delivery. Payment was postponed to delivery, both to be made in New York. The sale was for shipment from Europe, altogether at the vendors' expense and risk, and no exception was provided for save "dangers of the sea," among which a certain and safe confinement in port is not included.

In Duncan v. Topham, 8 Man. G. & S. 225, the order was for certain goods to be put on board directly. The complaint alleged an order for goods to be delivered within a reasonable time, and the plaintiff failed in his action because the proof did not support the declaration, it being held that "a reasonable time" was a more protracted delay than "directly."

The contract here goes further. "Prompt" is synonymous with "quick," "sudden," "precipitate." Indeed, one who is ready, is said to be prepared at the moment; one who is prompt, is said to be prepared beforehand. Such represents the condition of the plaintiffs. Their immediate loading of the vessel shows that they were prepared beforehand; but if their construction of the contract is correct, the qualifying word might as well be one of postponement and delay. The fault was with the plaintiffs. It was optional with them to ship from any port in Europe. If at the time of shipment the plaintiffs, or their agents, knew or might have known that detention and delay at the place of shipment (and before ground could be broken for the voyage) were unavoidable and to be expected, they must also have known that the delivery could not be made as contracted for, and the subsequent tender was too late. It was not a "prompt shipment," and the defendant was not bound to receive the cargo.

It is now contended, however, by the plaintiffs that the appellant is estopped from denying that the rails were shipped in accordance with the terms of the contract. This might, under some circumstances, furnish a question for the jury. It cannot be said as matter of law that those now relied on have that effect. It appears that the usual length of a voyage from Stettin to New York is forty-nine days. On the first of March the defendant was notified by the plaintiffs that the 100 tons of rails sold to him "are shipped * * * from Stettin;" but the date of sailing was not given, and in answer to defendant's inquiry concerning it, the plaintiffs replied that they were not informed. On the 19th of March they told him the bill of lading was dated February 3, but that they had "no date of the vessel's sailing." On the 4th of May they wrote "according to New York Maritime Register, the Ger. Bk. 'Ferdinand Brumm,' with 100 tons rails sold to you, sailed from Stettin April 6, for New York." The vessel arrived at New York, and on the 14th of June, when tendered by the plaintiffs, the defendant, in writing, refused to receive them, saying the rails were not shipped according to contract.

We find nothing in these letters which would authorize a court to say that the defendant had waived performance by the plaintiffs. There is no evidence that he knew the circumstances attending or causing the delay; none that he was informed that the vessel when loaded was ice bound, nor of its detention from that cause. Moreover, the sole act relied upon in the complaint as a breach of the contract on defendant's part, a refusal to accept the rails tendered, took place, as is there alleged, and is admitted in the answer, on the 14th of June. Then the plaintiffs say they were ready and willing to deliver, and duly tendered the goods, and the defendant refused to receive them. If I am right in my view of the contract, he was under no obligation to do so.

I have not overlooked the argument of the plaintiffs by which our attention is directed to the difference between "shipment" and "sailing," nor failed to examine the definitions and decisions upon which the argument is founded. The context of the cases cited, however, prevent the application of the decisions to the one before us, and while the terms are no doubt well defined, there is no definition nor adjudged case which implies that an agreement to deliver goods after prompt shipment, is satisfied by merely placing them on board a vessel, which, although it should weigh anchor, or cast off moorings, and make other preparations to depart, could not for a considerable period of time—in this case exceeding the customary length of the intended voyage—leave the spot where the cargo was received. Such a shipment would be colorable and deceptive. If it answered the letter of the contract, it defeated its purpose. It would not in fact be the inception of the voyage, and the burden of showing a bona fide shipment would not be sustained. In all the cases referred to by the respondents the obligation to ship at or within a certain period was held to be unperformed, unless the ship might also sail at or within the time stated. Nothing less would be beneficial to the purchaser. The evident object of expressing the time of shipment, as declared in those cases, was to provide that the article purchased should come forward at such time as would, in the opinion of the purchaser, make the venture profitable, or as to time of arrival or payment suit his convenience. Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455; Alexander v. Vanderzee, L. R. 7 C. P. 530.

Another class of cases, also cited by the respondents, shows that when goods are sold and are to be delivered on board of vessels, either provided by the purchaser or by his appointment, putting on board is a good shipment, whether the vessel is in condition or is expected to sail, or not. Fisher v. Minot, 10 Gray, 260; Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Maine, 105.

The principle on which these cases were decided is not involved here; and the others do not lessen the strength of the appellant's case.

The time and manner and place of shipment might indeed have been accepted by the defendant as in compliance with the contract; and whether it was or not, and whether with full knowledge of the facts there was on his part a waiver of the strict performance of the condition on the plaintiffs' part, were questions for the jury. The trial court therefore erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, reversing a judgment of the Circuit in favor of defendants in an action to set aside an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Reversed.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 457.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Adolph L. Sanger, for appellants:

The provision in the assignment providing for distribution among the creditors of the individual partners, after the payment of all the partnership creditors, is to plaintiff's advantage, not his injury. He has, therefore, no standing in court.

Fox v. Heath, 16 Abb. Pr. 168; Scott v. Guthrie, 10 Bosw. 408; S. C. 25 How. Pr. 481.

In Bogert v. Haight, 9 Paige, 297, where the assignment contained a provision for the payment of copartnership debts, and directing the surplus to be paid over to the assignors (there being individual creditors), it was declared that such an assignment was not necessarily fraudulent as to individual creditors; and it was further held that such an assignment was valid as against those who were benefited by it, to wit: the partnership creditors.

See also Cox v. Platt, 32 Barb. 127, 130; Morrison v. Atwell, 9 Bosw. 503; Powers v. Graydon, 10 Bosw. 630, 645-652; Richardson v. Herron, 39 Hun, 540; Richardson v. Thurber, 6 Cent. Rep. 799; Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 2 Cent. Rep. 511, 101 N. Y. 510.

The fact that there is a provision in an assignment executed by partners for the payment of the private and individual debts of the assignors out of the residue remaining after the payment of all the partnership debts, furnishes no evidence of an intention to hinder, delay or defraud creditors; and the legal intendments are all in favor of the validity of assignments in trust for the benefit of creditors, the same as in respect to other instruments.

Turner v. Jaycox, 40 Barb. 164; S. C. affirmed in 40 N. Y. 470.

Such a provision is not illegal. Even if it appeared in the assignment that each assignor was individually insolvent, and that the property assigned by each was unequal in value, and the debts of each unequal in proportion, still the presumption is that the assignee would do his duty, and not pay the private debts of one partner with the property of the other, in the absence of any express provision to that effect in the assignment.

Eyre v. Beebe, 28 How. Pr. 333, 340; Friend v. Michaelis, 15 Abb. N. C. 366.

O'Neil v. Salmon, 25 How. Pr. 246, has no authority to support it and must be deemed reversed by the other authorities which are in direct conflict with its doctrine and which support defendants' contention in the present case.

See Cox v. Platt, 32 Barb. 127, 130; Bogert v. Haight, 9 Paige, 297; Morrison v. Atwell, 9 Bosw. 503; Turner v. Jaycox, 40 Barb. 164; affirmed in 40 N.Y. 470; Fox v. Heath, 16 Abb. Pr. 168; Scott v. Guthrie, 10 Bosw. 408; Richardson v. Herron, 39 Hun, 540; Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 2 Cent. Rep. 511, 101 N. Y. 510.

Smith v. Howard, 20 How. Pr. 121, rests upon certain dicta of Judge Bronson in the cases of Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438; Barney v. Griffin, 2 N. Y. 365, and Leitch v. Hollister, 4 N. Y. 211, all of which have been either unfavorably criticised or overruled in Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 114, et seq.

And in Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 587, partnership property was appropriated to pay the preferred individual debt of one partner, for which neither the firm nor his copartner was liable,—a reservation for the benefit of such partner or his creditors to the direct injury of the firm creditors, the joint fund being inadequate to satisfy the firm creditors.

Mr. Edward T. Bartlett, for respondent:

The inequality of the individual debts of each partner and of his individual assigned estate is fully established. The provision in the assignment in question renders the general assignment void.

O'Neil v. Salmon, 25 How. Pr. 246, 249.

A creditor provided for in a prior clause of an assignment may avoid it by reason of a provision authorizing the debtor's property to be applied in part to the debts of another person, for which neither the debtor nor his property was bound.

Smith v. Howard, 20 How. Pr. 121.

The right of plaintiff, in case at bar, to attack the assignment is recognized in the reasoning of Judge Gardiner in Leitch v. Hollister, 4 N. Y. 215.

A fictitious debt avoids a general assignment. Talcott v. Hess, 31 Hun, 282.

The fact, if proved, that after the payment of partnership debts as directed by the assignment there will remain no assets to be paid to or credited to the assignors is no defense to this action.

O'Neil v. Salmon and Smith v. Howard, supra; Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438; Barney v. Griffin, 2 N. Y. 365; Collomb v. Caldwell, 16 N. Y. 485-6.

An assignment by an insolvent is void for actual fraud, if, while he provides for only a part of his creditors, he makes the attempt in the instrument to reserve any portion of the fund to himself.

The clause of the assignment criticised in the case at bar works just that result by devoting a part of the debtor's estate to the payment of debts for which he was not liable.

O'Neil v. Salmon, 25 How. Pr. 253; See also Collumb v. Caldwell, 16 N. Y. 485; Leitch v. Hollister, 4 N. Y. 211; Kirby v. Schoomaker, 3 Barb. Ch. 46; Smith v. Howard, 20 How. Pr. 121; Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 587.

"An assignment void in fact for fraud is void in toto. The fraud taints and vitiates the whole."

Hyslop v. Clarke, 14 Johns. 458; Mackie v. Cairns, 5 Cow. 547; Grover v. Wakeman, 4 Paige, 23; 11 Wend. 187; Rogers v. De Forest, 7 Paige, 277; Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438; Barney v. Griffin, 2 N. Y. 365.

It is true Goodrich v. Downs, above cited, was overruled in Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 114-124, in so far that it held 2 Revised Stattues 135, § 1, applied to general assignments; but Judge Comstock, who wrote the overruling opinion, explains in Collomb v. Caldwell, 16 N. Y. 485, as follows: "But in overruling the decision in that respect we by no means called in question the doctrine that an assignment by an insolvent is void, if, while he provides for only a part of his creditors, he makes the attempt, in the instrument, to reserve any portion of the fund to himself. Such an attempt has been regarded as establishing what is sometimes termed 'fraud in law;' but more accurately speaking, it affords a conclusive presumption of an actual fraudulent design on the part of the assignor. In this view of the question Goodrich v. Downs was well enough decided, and the decision considered as depending upon this principle was approved in Barney v. Griffin, 2 N. Y. 365."

A very recent case holds that when, from the facts, the inference of fraud is inevitable, a finding of no fraudulent intent does not alter the case.

Coleman v. Burr, 93 N. Y. 31.

The complaint herein contains two counts: 1, that the assignment is void on its face; 2, that the assignment is void by reason of certain facts alleged. The plaintiff, while reying on the first, proved his case under the latter allegation. That is, he proved the inequality of individual debts and assets. By so doing he relieved his case from any criticism found in Turner v. Jaycox, 40 Barb. 164, which is relied on by defendants.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 23d of October, 1882, Leopold Rindskopf and Meyer Rosenthal, composing the firm of Rindskopf & Rosenthal, executed an assignment of all their property, both real and personal, in trust to Abraham Rosenthal to convert the same into money, and, after paying the lawful expenses of the trust, to pay their partnership debts in the order specified in the instrument. It then provided "That with the remainder and residue of said net proceeds and avails, if any there shall be, the party of the second part shall pay and discharge all the individual and private debts of the parties of the first part or either of them, whether due or to become due, provided such remainder shall be sufficient for that purpose; and if insufficient, then the same shall be applied pro rata, share and share alike, to the payment of said debts and according to their respective amounts."

It was further provided that if there was any surplus then remaining, it should be repaid to the said assignors or to their executors, administrators or assigns.

The proof established the facts that the assigned estate amounted in value to the sum of $9,360.87, and the firm indebtedness to $14,667.87, and that the individual assets of the members of the firm amounted to $40, of which Rindskopf owned $10 and Rosenthal $30. Rindskopf's absolute individual liabilities amounted to $300, and his contingent liabilities to $4,300, and Rosenthal's absolute individual liabilities to $2,850.

The plaintiff, being a judgment creditor of the firm, brought this action to set aside the assignment, upon the ground that it was made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of said assignors and to have the assets of the assigned estate applied to the payment of his debt. Both the assignors and assignee respectively appeared and answered in the action, and the assignee denied all of the allegations contained in the complaint imputing fraud to the assignors, which put the plaintiff to the proof of his case. No attempt was made on the trial to show any fraud in the assignment, except such as was sought to be inferred from the provision relating to the payment of individual debts, considered in connection with evidence tending to show that the individual members of the firm owned individual assets of unequal amounts in value, and were liable in unequal sums upon their respective partnership accounts, also for individual debts.

The trial court found that there was no fraud in fact in the making of the assignment, and as a conclusion of law that the instrument constituted a valid transfer of the property of the assignors to their assignee, and ordered judgment dismissing the complaint.

Upon appeal the general term reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial. As that court did not assume to reverse the judgment upon the facts, its order can now be sustained only upon the theory that the undisputed evidence furnished conclusive proof of fraudulent intent on the part of the assignors in making their assignment. The conclusion of that court was based wholly upon the ground that the clause of the assignment providing for the payment of the individual creditors of the respective assignors, considered in connection with the facts of inequality in the amount of individual indebtedness, of value of individual assets, and of the amount of the respective accounts with the partnership firm, operated as a fraud in law upon the individual creditors of the partner having the largest individual estate, and afforded conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent on the part of the assignors rendering the assignment wholly void.

Passing over the questions as to whether an intended fraud by one member of a firm in transferring his individual assets, avoids an assignment of the firm assets made by the firm, and whether such a fraud, affecting a distinct portion of the assets devoted to a special class, is inseparable and must, as matter of law, be held to vitiate the entire trust, we will first consider the case upon the theory discussed by the court below. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show by affirmative evidence that the enforcement of the provisions of the assignment must necessarily work a fraud upon the creditors of the assignors, or one of them, and that it could not legally be carried out without producing such a result.

It has in some cases been held that assignors for the benefit of creditors, who contemplate and provide in their assignment for an illegal disposition in any respect of their property, are not at liberty, in an action to set it aside, to show, as proof of innocence of fraudulent intent, that the assigned fund was insufficient to satisfy the prior valid provisions of the assignment, and could not, therefore, be affected by the alleged illegal provision, and are estopped from controverting the existence of the conditions which they had provided for. Collomb v. Caldwell, 16 N. Y. 485, and cases there cited.

It has, however, been frequently held that it may be shown in rebuttal of an inference of fraudulent intent arising from provisions for the payment of individual debts, that there were, in fact, no such debts or individual assets to be affected by such provision; Turner v. Jaycox, 40 N. Y. 470; Bogert v. Haight, 9 Paige, 297; or that the property formerly belonging to the firm had become the property of purchaser making the assignment; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65; and other circumstances showing that no fraud, in fact, was intended. Dimon v. Hazard, supra; Hurlbert v. Dean, 2 Keyes, 97.

The principle that a party may be inquired of as to his interest in doing an act, where such interest is material, tends strongly to confirm the proposition that the presumption of fraud arising from the provisions of an assignment may be repelled by parol evidence. Seymour v. Wilson, 14 N. Y. 567; Hunt v. Johnson, 44 N. Y. 27.

The plaintiff in this case, anticipating the probable defense, did not rely upon the presumptions of fraud arising from the assignment alone, but undertook to establish the fact affirmatively that, in the actual circumstances of this case, the execution of the provision in question would necessarily operate as a fraud upon creditors. It is unnecessary, therefore, to assail the doctrines enunciated in Collomb v. Caldwell, 16 N. Y. 485; Barney v. Griffin, 2 N. Y. 365; Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438; and similar cases, for, conceding them to the fullest extent claimed, the facts of this case do not bring it within their operation.

It is lawful for an insolvent member of a firm to devote his individual property to the payment of firm debts to the exclusion of his individual creditors; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65; Saunders v. Reilly, ante, 59; Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 2 Cent. Rep. 511, 101 N. Y. 504; Kirby v. Schoonmaker, 3 Barb. Ch. 46; and it follows from the same principle that he may also apply it to the payment of any debt owing by him to his partners in the firm, and no inference of fraud can legally be derived from such dispositions of his individual property.

This case was decided by the general term, as appears from their opinion, solely upon the ground of a fraud alleged to have been intended by Rosenthal upon his individual creditors. The argument of the respondent is, in brief, that Rosenthal having $20 more individual property than Rindskopf, the law will assume that he, by placing that sum in a common fund with other individual assets and directing the payment of their aggregate individual indebtedness therefrom, intended to commit a fraud upon his individual creditors, because, it is said, if the excess of Rosenthal's individual assets is distributed pro rata among each and all of the individual creditors of both parties, according to the amount of their respective claims, that Rindskopf's creditors will necessarily receive something to which Rosenthal's creditors were equitably entitled.

We think this argument, upon the facts of the case, is defective in several particulars. It is not at all certain that such a result would follow in this case, for if Rindskopf's contingent liabilities never became fixed, there would be only $300 of his individual debts to be paid as against $2,850 of Rosenthal's; and in that event private property of Rindskopf's would be taken to pay Rosenthal's individual debts.

We also think the result claimed does not follow from the premises assumed by the court below, but that it would necessarily be produced only by the existence of exact equality of interest in the firm assets by both members or a greater interest in Rosenthal, combined with equality in individual indebtedness, and inequality in the individual property. If there is simply inequality of interest in the firm assets, and inequality in individual assets, one inequality could be easily compensated by a corresponding inequality in the other, and the evidence does not show but that this state of things in fact existed. It does appear that the assignors were equal partners in their firm business; but there is no evidence as to the amount they each originally contributed to the capital of the firm, except that the amounts were about equal. Neither does it appear how much they had respectively drawn from the firm except that the amounts were nearly equal. As the witness says one might have contributed "a little more or a little less than the other."

No statement of accounts between the respective partners has been given showing their liabilities to the firm, or the amount of their respective interests in its assets, and for aught that appears in the case Rosenthal might, on a settlement of the partnership accounts, have owed Rindskopf the exact sum which it is claimed he diverted from his individual assets to the payment of Rindskopf's creditors. This, in the absence of a fraudulent intent, he had a perfect right to do, as he could lawfully pay his debt to his partner in preference to that of any other creditor, if done in good faith; and if he did so in fact, it would relieve the clause in question from any criticism or objection. Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 2 Cent. Rep. 511, 101 N. Y. 504; Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65.

Assuming that there was a surplus remaining after the payment of the firm debts, and the assignment required this residue of $40 to be put into a common fund for the payment of the individual debts of both assignors, and that Rindskopf's contingent liability became fixed, it is evident that about $15 of his assets would be paid to Rosenthal's individual creditors, leaving $15 only subject to be diverted from them to the payment of Rindskopf's creditors. The insignificance of this sum, as compared with the amount of individual debts to be paid, and the almost infinitesimal amount of the dividend to individual creditors to be derived therefrom, would seem to furnish a conclusive answer to the presumption of fraud sought to be drawn from the obviously tentative provision in question. It would also seem, in view of the large amount of property transferred and the trivial value of that which might be improperly paid out, that the maxim De minimus non curat lex might well have been applied and held to control the determination of the case. Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y. 200; Colman v. Shattuck, 62 N. Y. 363; Ross v. Hardin, 79 N. Y. 84-93.

We conclude, therefore, upon this branch of the case, upon a consideration of the whole evidence, that, within the authorities cited below, every inference of fraud derivable from the provisions referred to, was effectively answered. Bogert v. Haight, Turner v. Jaycox, Hazard v. Dimon, and Hurlbert v. Dean, supra.

We are also of the opinion that the provisions of this assignment, if fairly construed and enforced according to their natural meaning and import, would not occasion an illegal disposition of the individual property of either assignor. While heretofore there has been some diversity of opinion in the courts, in respect to the proper rule to be applied in the construction of such instruments we think the tendency of modern decisions, especially those of most approved authority, has been to adopt the same rules which obtain in the interpretation of other contracts. Knapp v. McGowan, 96 N. Y. 87; Rapalee v. Stewart, 27 N Y. 315; Benedict v. Huntington, and Townsend v. Stearns, 32 N. Y. 219, 209.

Among those rules is that requiring such an interpretation as will render the instrument consistent with innocence, and the general rules of law, in preference to such as would impute a fraudulent intent to the assignor, or defeat the general purpose and intent of the conveyance. Ginther v. Richmond, 18 Hun, 234; Rapalee v. Stewart, 27 N. Y. 315; Benedict v. Huntington, and Townsend v. Stearns, 32 N. Y. 219, 209.

Such transfers are sanctioned by law and are, when made like other contracts, to be fairly and reasonably construed with a view of carrying out the intentions of the parties making them. When authority to do an act is conferred in general terms, it will be deemed to be and to have been intended to be within the limits prescribed by law. Kellogg v. Slauson, 11 N. Y. 302.

In such cases, as in others, doubtful and ambiguous phrases admitting of different meanings are, in accordance with the maxim Ut res magis valeat quam pereat, to be so construed as to authorize a lawful disposition of the property only, although there may be general language in the instrument susceptible of a different construction. Townsend v. Stearns, supra.

If the instrument in question be considered in the light of these rules we think it is not fairly subject to the criticism which has been made upon it. The insolvency of the firm of Rindskopf & Rosenthal necessarily worked its dissolution and a division of the interests of its respective members, except so far as their property was already legally disposed of by the assignment. After satisfaction of the firm debts by the assignee the law would restore each member of the firm to his legal rights in the residue of the property, subject only to the execution of the power conferred upon the assignee to dispose of the same.

It is essential to the argument of the respondents to establish that the language of this assignment contains authority to the assignee from each member of the firm to satisfy the individual debts of the other from the combined individual property. We do not think a proper construction of the instrument justifies the inference of such an authority; certainly no such power is expressly given; and it would be contrary to settled rules to impute such an intention to its respective authors unless the language of the instrument expressly requires it.

The law would require in the event of an assignment by a firm of two persons that, after the payment of firm debts, the residue should be divided into two funds for the payment of individual creditors, and the only defect, if any, in this assignment is that it did not expressly recognize the possible existence of the two funds. We think the law will supply this omission and order a distribution of the fund according to the legal rights of the claimants upon it. It was plainly contemplated in the assignment itself that this division should be made in the eventual surplus, for that is directed to be paid to the parties of the first part, their executors, administrators and assigns.

This provision could be carried out only upon the assumption that a division of the residue had been made between the two assignees, and thus reflects strongly upon the intention of the conveyance in the use of the language criticised. A reasonable construction of this provision would seem to require that the language should be distributively applied, and held to mean that each member of the firm transferred such part of the property as he had a lawful right to convey, and subjected the residue of such part to the payment of such debts as he was individually liable for. The assignment purported to deal with all of the property, and its fair import was to distribute it to those who were legally entitled to it, paying the firm creditors first, and then, in case there were assets applicable to that purpose, providing for the respective individual creditors of the members of the firm. There is no language in the clause in question which expressly forbids such a construction or requires that the property of one should be applied to the payment of the debts of the other, and its whole language would be satisfied by the distribution of the share of each in payment of his individual debts.

Upon the satisfaction of the debts of the firm it would be the legal duty of the assignee, even in the absence of any express provision requiring it, to determine the interest of the individual partners in the surplus and devote each share to the interest of its respective owner in accordance with his legal rights. Eyre v. Beebe, 28 How. Pr. 333; Friend v. Michaelis, 15 Abb. N. C. 354.

While the instrument was necessarily the joint act of the firm so far as their joint property was concerned, it was the individual contract of the respective members so far as they dealt with individual property. When providing for their joint interests and property, which constituted the main object of the assignment, they spoke of their joint interest and purpose; but when dealing with their individual interests, although inaptly continuing the use of the phraseology applicable to its earlier provisions, their language must be construed as referring to and expressing only their individual wishes with reference to their individual property and liabilities. In case a surplus arose in the administration of this estate, and it became the subject of judicial controversy among the individual creditors of the members of the firm, it could not reasonably be said that there is anything in the language of the assignment which precluded Rosenthal, or his creditors, from demanding that his individual property should be applied to the payment of his individual debts.

It may be finally said that the effect of the provision complained of could not in any event have been intended to defraud the creditors of the firm; and until they are aggrieved they have no cause of action. Royer Wheel Co. v. Fielding, 2 Cent. Rep. 511, 101 N. Y. 510; Dimon v. Hazard, supra.

The order of the General Term should be reversed, and that of the Special Term affirmed.

All concur (Andrews, J., on the construction of the instrument), except Danforth, J., not voting.

William F. BRIDGE, Appt.,
v.
George H. PENNIMAN, Respt.

1. In an action to recover back the price paid for certain shares of corporate stock which the plaintiff alleged he was induced to buy and pay for by representations of defendant which were untruthful, held, that the question, whether the plaintiff rescinded by tendering back the stock without conditions or whether he used the stock and its transfer to defendant as a new consideration for a new contract by which he obtained from defendant a bond of indemnity, with surety, against the liabilities to which he was exposed, was one of fact for the jury.
2. The referee having found as a fact that the plaintiff did not make an unconditional tender of his stock, but used it as his own with which to purchase the indemnity received, and the possible questions of law in the case being inextricably involved in and dependent upon the conclusions of fact, held, that the judgment dismissing the complaint should be affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of New York City, affirming a judgment entered upon report of a referee dismissing the complaint in an action to recover back the price paid for certain shares of corporate stock. Affirmed.

Reported below, 19 Jones & S. 183.

The facts were stated in the prevailing opinion of the court at general term, as follows:

The plaintiff claimed that the defendant had sold to him twenty-two shares of the stock of the Judd Linseed & Sperm Oil Company, a corporation, for which he had paid the defendant $22,000; also, that the purchase was so induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant, that the plaintiff had a right to rescind the purchase and recover the $22,000; and that he had in fact rescinded.

The defense denied the right to rescind, and the fact of rescission, claiming that the plaintiff had not tendered or returned the stock to the defendant in a manner that would allow the plaintiff to rescind, or in other words, unconditionally.

The most important fact as to the return of the shares to the defendant is that after negotiation or dispute between the plaintiff and defendant, after plaintiff had demanded that defendant should give security as well as his own obligation, as an indemnity against plaintiff's liability as stockholder, etc., the defendant and his wife, the latter expressly charging her separate estate, made a bond to the plaintiff. It recited, whereas, William F. Bridge has transferred or is about to transfer, to George H. Penniman, all his stock and interest in the company specified, and has resigned as president and trustee of the company, in consideration of the premises, and of $1, the said George H. Penniman, and his wife, "do jointly and severally agree to indemnify and save harmless the said Bridge from all claims, debts or demands of whatever name, nature or kind, now existing against said company, or heretofore contracted by it, or on its behalf, also from all claims or demands against him as a stockholder in, or trustee of, said company," etc. The plaintiff upon receiving this bond transferred the stock.

Mr. William C. Holbrook, for appellant:

Plaintiff having purchased the entire sixty shares, and taken office in the corporation on the faith of defendant's individual representations, thereby rendering himself liable for certain debts of the corporation, for which he was not previously responsible, as the referee has found, was entitled upon rescinding the contract to indemnity against such debts, in addition to a return of the purchase money which defendant personally received, and in giving the bond of indemnity defendant was doing no more than his plain duty, i. e., of restoring plaintiff to the position he occupied before he acted upon his representations.

Newbigging v. Adams, 55 Law Times, N. S. 794.

Even, however, upon the assumption that that case is not entirely decisive of this, plaintiff's right to indemnity should be sustained upon the strength of defendant's promise to indemnify plaintiff from loss should he, when the seed was worked up, decide to surrender his stock and retire from the company, or otherwise stand upon his legal rights.

Pollock, Contracts, pp. 165-7, 497-9; Benjamin, Sales, § 417 and cases cited.

If our contention as set forth in the preceding points is correct, then there was no such condition annexed to the return of the stock as prevented rescission, nor was the taking of the bond of indemnity an arrangement or new agreement, incompatible and at variance with the theory of rescission as found by the referee.

Hammond v. Pennock, 61 N. Y. 145-155; Pollock, Contracts, p. 510.

Plaintiff having a legal right to rescind, nothing short of release, or the acceptance of something in satisfaction, would bar such right.

Bowman v. Teall, 23 Wend. 309; Allaire v. Whitney, 1 Hill, 484; De Bussche v. Alt, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 286.

The fact that the bond of indemnity was signed by defendant's wife, who was not previously under any liability to plaintiff in respect to his transactions with defendant, and the fact that plaintiff surrendered the entire sixty shares upon receiving such bond, do not militate against his theory of a rescission.

Gunby v. Sluter, 44 Md. 237.

Laches in rescinding are not to be imputed to plaintiff. Defendant, in fact, sustained no damage from the fact that plaintiff did not rescind upon the first discovery of the falsity of his statements; and even had he met with injury he would be estopped to assert it, inasmuch as plaintiff, at his request, deferred exercising his right to rescind.

A purchaser who is entitled to rescind a contract for fraud, but who delays doing so for the purpose of affording the vendor, at his request, an opportunity of attempting to make the thing sold of value, and satisfactory to the purchaser, is not precluded by such delay from thereafter rescinding the contract.

Powell v. Woodworth, 46 Vt. 378; Gatling v. Newell, 9 Ind. 572; Pierce v. Wilson, 34 Ala. 596; Williamson v. N. J. Southern R. R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 311, 320; Marston v. Simpson, 54 Cal. 189; Clough v. London etc. R. Co. L. R. 7 Exch. 26, 35; Pence v. Langdon, 99 U. S. 578 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 420).

So also it is no defense to an action as for rescission that the wrong doer has by his own act made a full restitution impossible. He cannot prevent a restoration as far as is within his power, by showing that he has himself done acts which prevent his being restored to his original position.

Hammond v. Pennock, 61 N. Y. 145; Masson v. Bovat, 1 Denio, 69; Pearse v. Pettis, 47 Barb. 276; Colson v. Smith, 9 Ind. 8; Baker v. Lever, 67 N. Y. 304.

So, too, where one party to a contract makes a positive representation, it is not laches in the other not to proceed immediately to verify that representation; unless he has reason to doubt its accuracy laches cannot commence.

Partridge v. Usborne, 5 Russ. 195, 232; Doggett v. Emerson, 3 Story, 700, 740; Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, L. R. 5 P. C. Cas. 221.

The referee having found that plaintiff relied upon defendant's representations, that such representations were material and untrue, plaintiff had a right to rescind, even though they were not fraudulent or made with intent to defraud.

Hammond v. Pennock, 61 N. Y. 145, 152 and cases cited; Pollock, Contracts, pp. 484-489; Degraw v. Elmore, 50 N. Y. 1; Bowen v. Mandeville, 95 N. Y. 237; Neblett v. Macfarland, 92 U. S. 101-5 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 471, 472. See note).

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, for respondent:

Assuming that the plaintiff, as late as November, had a right to rescind, his course was plain. He might do one of three things:

1, to retain the shares and sue the defendant for damages;

2, to proceed in equity for a rescission of the contract of purchase;

3, to return, or offer to return, unconditionally, the twenty-two shares bought from the defendant, and sue for the price paid as money had and received.

Gould v. Cayuga Co. Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 75; S. C. 99 N. Y. 333.

Or, as the court below has said: "A party seeking to rescind a contract must reject it wholly, without imposing conditions."

Welsh v. Goessler, 15 Jones & S. 104.

Or, again; an offer to return, on condition that the party rescinding shall be paid a sum of money, is an invalid tender.

Howard v. Hayes, 15 Jones & S. 89.

The plaintiff lost by his laches any right of rescission that he might originally have had. The rule is a rigid one that the purchaser who claims to have been defrauded must disaffirm promptly upon ascertaining the fraud; and the proof is clear and the referee finds that in June the plaintiff had fully ascertained that the capital of the company was impaired. He could not speculate in its prospects, business and condition till November, and then disaffirm.

Lawrence v. Dale, 3 Johns. Ch. 23; Lowber v. Selden, 11 How. Pr. 526; Rosenbaum v. Gunter, 3 E. D. Smith, 203; Wheaton v. Baker, 14 Barb. 594; Bruce v. Davenport, 3 Keyes, 474; Dows v. Griswold, 4 Hun, 550.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

That the plaintiff was induced to buy and pay for the stock of the oil company, by representations of the defendant which were untruthful and incorrect, and so, upon a discovery of the facts, was at liberty to rescind the contract and recover back the purchase money is scarcely disputed on this appeal, and may be assumed without discussion.

The real controversy revolves about the inquiry whether the plaintiff did in fact rescind by tendering back without conditions the stock received, or whether, on the contrary, he used that stock and its transfer to the defendant as a new consideration for a new contract, by which he obtained from the defendant a bond of indemnity with the protection of a surety added, against the liabilities to which he had become exposed by his official connection with the company.

This appears to us to be a question of fact. The history of the transaction as detailed by the adverse parties runs upon different lines and is colored by their respective theories. As a consequence, there is to some extent disagreement and contradiction between them; and where the facts themselves are not disputed the inferences derivable from them as to the real nature of the transaction and the true intent and understanding of the parties are extremely divergent and open to wide differences of opinion.

The plaintiff's theory is that when the worthless character of the stock was fully ascertained, the defendant promised to protect his vendee from loss; that the latter tendered back the stock and demanded the purchase money as a clear rescission of the contract; and that the indemnity given stood outside of that rescission, and rested independently upon the duty and liability of the defendant to indemnify, and upon his express promise so to do. This theory has been assailed with the criticism that the plaintiff transferred not only the stock bought of defendant but that purchased of other parties, and received from defendant a bond of indemnity which could not have been compelled and which he was not bound to give either by virtue of his general duty or of any promise which he had made.

It is argued from the terms of the correspondence which passed between the parties that the plaintiff steadily demanded the protection of a surety, the liability of some third person which would supplement that of the defendant, and so was seeking to obtain what he had no right to demand and could not have compelled, and which, therefore, he chose to buy by a transfer of all the stock which he owned.

The theory of the defendant is that the arrangement was made in that way; that the plaintiff by becoming the president of and a director in the oil company stood exposed to a heavy and dangerous liability for its debts in case of disaster, and above and beyond the total loss of his stock; that he realized and conceded that he had not been willfully or purposely deceived; and so concluded as the wisest treatment of the misfortune to lose his stock in exchange for adequate protection against threatened and further loss in addition.

Attention is directed to a letter written by the defendant which, it is claimed, offered to plaintiff a choice of alternatives and meant in substance that in the emergency the defendant would give to the plaintiff all his stock, if the latter would assume the risk of the corporate success or failure and leave the defendant's loss measured only by the stock thus transferred; or, on the other hand, if the plaintiff chose to give his stock to defendant he might end his loss at that point, and the defendant would protect him by adequate security against any further injury. The letter is capable of such interpretation, and it is said presented to plaintiff's mind a choice of alternatives one of which he adopted, and which fully explains and accounts for the transfer made and the bond given in return.

It seems to us apparent that the question thus raised depends almost wholly upon the view taken of the facts and of the conflicting inferences which they originate. The referee has found as a fact that the plaintiff did not make an unconditional tender of his stock, but used it as his own with which to purchase the indemnity received; and refused to find in accordance with plaintiff's theory and version of what occurred. There are facts and inferences in the case from which that conclusion could fairly be drawn, although open to a doubt which manifested itself when the general term affirmed the judgment by the dissent of one member of the court. The possible questions of law in the case are inextricably involved in and dependent upon the conclusions of fact; and accepting them as found by the referee and approved by the general term, it is clear that there was no rescission, but a new contract agreed upon and executed.

All concur.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas of the City and County of New York, affirming a judgment of the trial term in favor of plaintiff in an action on a bond of indemnity. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. A. Blumenstiel, for appellants:

The liability provided against in the indemnity bond is only in case that the attachment should remain in full force, or rather against the liability for any seizure or detention under an existing attachment, and under any execution which might be issued in the action while such attachment remained in full force, and could not refer to any indemnity for any trespass created by the Sheriff in holding on to property for the taking of which he held no process at the time of the conversion.

Clark v. Woodruff, 18 Hun, 419, affirmed in 83 N. Y. 518.

The suit and recovery in the superior court was not for the taking under the execution, but for the detention on the theory of an attachment then having been issued. The execution was issued and the sale was had long after the suit in the superior court was brought. If this is clear, then this indemnity bond could not cover a case where the Sheriff held the property after the process was vacated, because the defendants could not, in law, give an indemnity to a sheriff to hold property without any process whatever; in other words, a party cannot indemnify the sheriff to do a wrongful act; such a bond as that would be void.

Griffiths v. Hardenbergh, 41 N. Y. 464; St. John v. St. John's Church, 15 Barb. 346; Ives v. Jones, 40 Am. Dec. 421, 423, 426; Chapman v. Douglas, 5 Daly, 244, 252.

It is not proven in this case that the Sheriff was requested even to hold on to the property after the process was vacated; and even if such request was made by the attorneys for the plaintiffs in the attachment suit, that could not bind the sureties on this bond—

First. Because plaintiffs' attorney was not the attorney for these indemnitors.

Second. Even if he were, he could not bind them by direction of an illegal act.

The sale under the execution without notice to the indemnitors, although the attorneys had notice, is not such a ratification as makes these defendants liable.

Clark v. Woodruff, 83 N. Y. 518.

It must be made to appear that the recovery in the action against the Sheriff was for the identical taking under which the bond was given; and if that does not appear distinctly by the record, it can be proven that such recovery was otherwise.

Willett v. Kipp, 12 Hun, 474.

The proceedings on the trial of the main action in the superior court clearly show that the verdict and judgment was founded upon the refusal to deliver the property when demanded on December 21. This was in aid of the record, and was allowable.

McKnight v. Devlin, 52 N. Y. 399; Doty v. Brown, 4 N. Y. 71; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 9; Dear v. Reed, 37 Hun, 594; Agan v. Hey, 30 Hun, 591; Banfield v. Haeger, 7 Abb. N. C. 318; Leavitt v. Wolcott, 95 N. Y. 212, 222.

A bond must be construed strictly in favor of the obligors, and a construction given which will relieve them from liability, rather than to hold them; and in this connection, the surrounding circumstances may be examined to see what these defendants agreed to hold themselves liable for.

Clark v. Woodruff and Griffiths v. Hardenbergh, supra; Blossom v. Griffin, 13 N. Y. 569.

The judgment in the superior court action was clearly right, and the subsequent demand on the 21st day of December constituted a conversion within the terms of the complaint in that action.

Roberts v. Berdell, 52 N. Y. 644; Gillet v. Roberts, 57 N. Y. 33; Jessop v. Miller, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 449; Oberwarth v. McLean, 7 Daly, 70.

Mr. Charles F. MacLean with Mr. Malcom Graham, for respondent:

The superior court suit by Galinger was brought for matters indemnified against. The record is in evidence. The complaint shows exactly what that suit was for. It is an action of trespass. The allegation is that on December 11, 1880, "The plaintiff wrongfully entered said store, * * * and wrongfully took possession of said property, and converted the same to his own use."

The removal of the goods did not constitute this cause of action, nor did the refusal to return them; nor would a return of them constitute a defense. Galinger's cause of action was complete when the Sheriff took his goods under an attachment against Mrs. Briggs, and no demand was necessary.

Hicks v. Cleveland, 48 N. Y. 84; Kluender v. Lynch, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 538; Kuhlman v. Orser, 5 Duer, 242.

It is immaterial whether a second demand was made or not. The plaintiff having a complete cause of action by the taking, whether the Sheriff subsequently refused to return the property or not, he had a right to proceed upon the trespass, even though he might have declared upon the demand and so laid his action in trover.

Livermore v. Northrup, 44 N. Y. 107.

The Statute of Limitations runs in such case from the time of the seizure; the cause of action was thus complete.

Snebly v. Conner, 7 N. Y. Week. Dig. 93; Coddington v. Carnley, 2 Hilt. 528.

Parol evidence cannot be admitted to countervail the record in the Galinger Case. The record in that case is in evidence and shows plainly that the action is brought for the trespass of December 11, 1880; and as the record is the proper evidence, defendants were not at liberty to go outside of it and show that other matters appeared upon the trial.

Manny v. Harris, 2 Johns. 24; Royce v. Burt, 42 Barb. 655; Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329; Union Nat. Bank v. Kupper, 63 N. Y. 617; Beard v. Yates, 1 Thomp. & C. Add. 21; Nickett v. Armstrong, 6 N. Y. Week. Dig. 73; Campbell v. Butts, 3 N. Y. 173; Davis v. Talcot, 12 N. Y. 184.

This rule has no exceptions. It is true that when the grounds of a judgment do not appear, either by the record or the judgment, parol evidence may be received; as, for example, where the extent of the locus in quo is in dispute, or upon which of two defenses the action was defeated, or what were the grounds of a nonsuit.

Kerr v. Hays, 35 N. Y. 331; Dunckle v. Wiles, 11 N. Y. 420; White v. Madison, 26 N. Y. 117.

But none of these cases hold that when the issues appear plainly by the record, parol evidence may be received to show that something else was tried. Even where matters outside the record may be shown, they must be such as "might legitimately have been given in evidence under the issue joined."

Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 9.

Even though all that Galinger swore to upon either trial were conceded, yet his alleged second demand was insufficient.

Whitney v. Belden, 4 Paige, 140; Bronner v. Loomis, 17 Hun, 439; Smith v. Dodd, 3 E. D. Smith, 215; Sage v. Mosher, 17 How. Pr. 367, 371.

Section 709 of the Code prescribes the sheriff's duties upon the vacation of an attachment; he is to deliver the property to the defendant or to the person entitled thereto, upon reasonable demand, and upon payment of all costs, charges and expenses. It was the duty of the Sheriff to give the attaching plaintiffs an opportunity to take such steps as might be necessary to protect themselves; and they would have had just ground of complaint if the Sheriff had abandoned his attachment and delivered the property to Galinger before entry of the order and before they could possibly have obtained a stay. Had this been done, we should not have found the defendants claiming that Galinger's alleged demand was a "reasonable demand." Until the entry of the order they could not appeal.

Smith v. Dodd, 3 E. D. Smith, 215; Star Fire Ins. Co. v. Godet, 2 Jones & S. 359; Plato v. Kelly, 16 Abb. Pr. 188; Gallt v. Finch, 24 How. Pr. 193.

This doctrine that a sheriff has a reasonable time within which to comply with demands upon him exists without the aid of the statute and it extends even to cases of imprisonment.

Watson, Sheriffs, 108; Taylor v. Brander, 1 Esp. 45.

In this particular case of vacation of attachment, it has in terms been held that the sheriff ought to give the plaintiff in attachment a fair opportunity to litigate his action; and if he does not he will be liable to the plaintiff should the vacatur be reversed.

Danforth v. Carter, 4 Iowa, 230; Danforth v. Rupert, 11 Iowa, 547; Wheeler v. Nichols, 32 Maine, 233; Drake, Attachment, §§ 427, 428.

The Sheriff was not bound to deliver the property to Galinger, even though the alleged second demand should be granted.

The attaching plaintiffs were insisting that the property was not Galinger's; Mrs. Briggs' claim may have been in conflict with Galinger's, and had there been a delivery to Galinger, and she had thereupon brought suit for the property as hers, the delivery to Galinger would have been no defense; the Sheriff and the indemnitors might have been estopped from showing that, although they took it as hers, it was owned by some one else.

Frankel v. Elias, 60 How. Pr. 74; Lambert v. Converse, 22 How. Pr. 265.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from defendants some $5,000 which he had paid upon a judgment recovered against him by one Galinger under the following circumstances: in December, 1880, one Harriet S. Briggs was the owner of a stock of goods in a store in New York and on the 11th of that month she assigned them to Galinger for the benefit of her creditors; on the same day William H. Talbot and others commenced an action against Mrs. Briggs and procured an attachment against her property and placed it in the hands of the Sheriff, who levied upon the goods which she had assigned to Galinger and which were claimed by him.

The Sheriff on the 16th took a bond of indemnity signed by these defendants and kept the goods. The condition of the bond was that if the obligors should indemnify the Sheriff from all liability, suits and judgments against him, by reason of the levying, attaching and making sale under or by virtue of such attachment of the property, and for the defense of any action which might be brought against the Sheriff for such taking, then the bond to be void, otherwise valid. This attachment was, on the 21st of December, vacated; and on the 24th of that month Galinger commenced an action to recover from the Sheriff the value of the goods which had been taken by him. The Sheriff gave notice of the suit to these defendants, and at their request he defended it, they being represented by counsel on the trial thereof. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment against the Sheriff for the value of the goods, which he subsequently paid and then commenced this action to recover from the defendants on their bond the amount he had paid under the Galinger judgment and the expenses he had been put to in defending it. The defendants herein set up in their answer that the Sheriff, after the attachment had been vacated and after due demand had been made upon him, refused to surrender the property attached; and this refusal was without the knowledge or assent of the defendants herein, and that the recovery in the Galinger action was based on this demand and refusal, and that such conduct on the part of the Sheriff was not within the condition of the bond, and consequently they were not liable therefor.

Upon the trial of the action the plaintiff claimed to have proved his case by the production, among other things, of the judgment roll in this Galinger suit. The defendants then, under plaintiff's objection, proved by a parol the ground upon which that suit was decided, viz.: that the Sheriff became liable for a conversion upon the attachment being vacated and his refusal to give up the property upon a demand made after that event. Notwithstanding this evidence the circuit gave judgment for the plaintiff, which has been affirmed by the general term and the defendants have appealed here.

They claim: 1, that the condition of their bond did not cover the facts upon which the judgment was founded in the Galinger suit; 2, that the ground upon which the recovery was based was within the issues raised by the pleadings in that action; 3, that it was proper to show by parol what that ground was.

It is beyond dispute that the recovery in the Galinger suit was upon the sole ground above stated. The evidence upon the trial of this action as to what that ground was is wholly uncontradicted and consists of the stenographer's minutes of evidence upon that trial.

As to the first contention of the defendants: Was this act of the Sheriff within the condition of the bond? We think not. When the attachment was vacated it became his duty, upon reasonable demand, to deliver up the property to the defendant or to the person entitled to it, who in this case was Galinger. Code, § 709.

The bond indemnified the Sheriff for his act in taking the property as that of the defendant in the attachment suit, and for his keeping it under such attachment and refusing to give it up to Galinger or anyone else. The property was originally taken by virtue of the attachment, and the writ was the only justification for its retention; and if in truth it belonged to Galinger, as he claimed, the writ would then furnish no justification for taking or retaining the property. The bond taken was intended to and did cover the risk of this taking and detention under the writ. It cannot be construed to cover a detention by the Sheriff after the writ (which was his sole authority for ever taking and for continuing to keep the property) had been vacated. After such vacation the Sheriff was bound to surrender the property upon reasonable demand and his refusal to do so would be an illegal act, which it cannot be supposed the indemnitors in the bond proposed or assumed to indemnify against, and which if they had, such bond would have been void to that extent. Griffiths v. Hardenbergh, 41 N. Y. 464.

As to the second claim of the defendants. The basis of the recovery in the Galinger suit was fairly within the issues.

Pleadings are to be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice, or in other words, with a view to get out the real truth of the case when it will not involve surprise or injustice to either party. The complaint in the Galinger suit (which was brought several days after the attachment had been vacated) did allege a wrongful taking from Galinger's possession on or about the 11th of December, and a conversion to the defendant's use. It also alleged a demand made for a return and a refusal by defendant; it then demanded judgment for the value of the property.

The defendant answered by setting up the issuing of the attachment and justified the taking and retention under that writ, and alleged that the assignment from Mrs. Briggs to Galinger was void, as made with intent to hinder, etc., the creditors of the former. This answer did not set up new matter constituting a counterclaim, and did not call for a reply; and, under section 522 of the Code, such new matter was deemed controverted by the plaintiff by traverse or avoidance, as the case might be. Therefore, upon evidence by the defendant that the property was taken and held under the attachment as the property of Mrs. Briggs, the plaintiff could properly prove that it had been vacated, and a demand for the return of the property had bee nmade thereafter and had been refused before suit was amended. If this were proper to put in evidence, the court could then decide upon its effect. It did so decide, and held the defendant liable for his conversion, or, in other words, for his retention of the property subsequent to the time when the attachment was vacated.

The defendants then make the third claim that it was proper to prove by parol the ground upon which the Galinger Case was decided.

When it does not appear from the record what was the precise ground upon which the case was decided, parol evidence thereof may be given, provided such ground was within the issues in the case. Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 9. We have just seen that this ground was within such issues.

The plaintiff herein makes some answers to these several defenses and he says that, as matter of fact, there was but one demand made by Galinger for the goods after they were taken, and that demand was made on the day of their seizure by the Sheriff and he gave some evidence to that effect on this trial. The difficulty with this evidence is that it was not given on the trial of the Galinger suit. The evidence is wholly uncontradicted as to what took place on the trial of that suit and its only possible importance was to show the reason for the decision of the Galinger suit, and that it was decided upon a ground not covered by the bond. As I say, the evidence on that trial was uncontradicted and conclusive, showing that Galinger made a demand after the attachment had been vacated, and that there was a refusal of the Sheriff to give up the property notwithstanding such fact, and that the action was decided on that sole ground.

The plaintiff herein also states that the case does not purport to contain all the evidence taken on the trial of the Galinger Case, and that to support this judgment it must be presumed that other evidence was given, and upon a point which was covered by the defendants' bond; but the difficulty is that the language of the court on that trial, as proved by defendants, shows explicitly that the sole ground of recovery was the demand and refusal subsequent to the attachment being vacated. In the face of such language no such presumption can be indulged in.

It is also urged in behalf of the plaintiff that even after the attachment had been vacated and demand made (conceding for this purpose that a demand was made), still the Sheriff was not bound to surrender the property forthwith. He says the Sheriff was entitled to demand service of a certified copy of the order vacating the attachment; and to be paid his costs, fees and charges, before a delivery could be claimed.

Assume that the Sheriff would be entitled to all these privileges, even including his costs (which he as to the latter probably would not be in case of the writ being vacated), yet the evidence on the Galinger trial was uncontradicted, that when Galinger made his demand for a return of the property after the attachment had been vacated, the refusal of the Sheriff to deliver was not put on any of these grounds, but was absolute, unconditional and final, and placed solely upon the ground that he had a bond of indemnity and it was no use to ask for a delivery.

In the light of such facts the claim now made in behalf of the Sheriff comes too late. It would have very likely constituted a defense to the Galinger judgment if proved on that trial as having been a position taken by the Sheriff in answer to the demand for the property after the writ had been set aside. To prove it on this trial was useless, because too late and no answer to the proof of what took place on the Galinger trial and what was the ground of that judgment. Nor is any defense made out by proof of the proceedings, subsequent to the rendition of judgment in the attachment suit. Judgment was therein duly obtained February 12, 1881; and on that day an execution was issued thereon, nearly two months after the commencement of this action.

The Sheriff under that execution proceeded to levy on the goods which he had attached and kept in his hands, and he sold them under such execution, and turned over the money to the attorney for the plaintiffs in the execution, who knew that it came from the sale of those goods. There is no evidence that these defendants ever knew one word as to where the money came from to pay a judgment in an action to which they were not parties, and none that any orders were given by anyone to the Sheriff as to what property to levy on. Issuing an execution without any directions as to how it is to be enforced or as to what property is to be taken, implies only an authority to do a lawful act pursuant to its command; Welsh v. Cochran, 63 N. Y. 181; and the knowledge of the attorney in the execution, as to where the money came from which he took from the Sheriff, there being no proof of like knowledge by the plaintiffs in the execution, when they received the money from him, would be no ratification, even as to them, of the prior illegal act of the Sheriff in refusing to surrender the goods, much less on the part of these defendants, being equally ignorant. Clark v. Woodruff, 83 N.Y. 518.

Neither is the defense of the Galinger suit by the defendants, at the notification of the Sheriff, equivalent to a ratification. It does not appear that, at that time, they knew of the demand and refusal after the attachment had been vacated; and the pleadings in the Galinger suit would not necessarily disclose that fact; but even if they at that time did know of such demand and refusal, it nowhere appears that they knew of or approved it when it happened, or that they ever requested or expected the Sheriff to so refuse. An attempt to defend the Sheriff from the consequences of an illegal act, done without their request or sanction, cannot properly be set up as a ratification of such act as between the Sheriff and these defendants.

Upon a careful consideration of all the facts in this case we are reluctantly brought to the conclusion that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur, except Ruger, Ch. J., dissenting.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York, affirming a judgment of the trial term on a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Darlington, for appellant:

The court erred in taking the case from the jury and directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

We have here the corrupt agreement, the notes delivered under and in pursuance of the agreement, the return of the former notes thus paid by renewals by the party with whom the corrupt agreement was made, and the reservation of a sum greater than that allowed by law.

Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 112; Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. 446 (34 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 188); Shober v. Hauser, 4 Dev. & B. 91, 106; Southworth v. Bennett, 58 N. Y. 659.

The court erred in not permitting the defendant to show the true consideration of the notes.

Nat. Bank v. Lewis, 75 N. Y. 516.

The court erred in not allowing defendant the affirmative of the issue.

Millerd v. Thorn, 56 N. Y. 405; Murray v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 236.

The court erred in not permitting the defendant to prove the prior transactions of which this note was given in renewal.

Fiedler v. Darrin, 50 N. Y. 437, 444.

Suppose there had been a variance between the allegation and the proof; this ought not to deprive the party of his defense.

Mr. H. D. Van Orden, for respondent:

Defendant is bound not only to set up the usurious contract in his answer, specifying its terms and the particular facts relied upon to make usury, but must prove them as alleged.

The transaction proved is entirely different from that set up in the answer.

Ahern v. Goodspeed, 72 N. Y. 108.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was by the plaintiff as indorsee for value, against Boynton as maker and first indorser of a promissory note payable to his own order, and one Tuttle as second indorser. The complaint alleged the indorsement and delivery of the note by Boynton to Tuttle, and its indorsement and delivery by Tuttle to the plaintiff. The defendant, Boynton, by his answer put in issue these facts. The burden of proving them was of course on the plaintiff, and the trial court did not err in refusing to give the defendant the affirmative.

He also set up that the note in suit had its inception in a corrupt and usurious contract with one F., for a loan of money for which F. was to receive 8 per cent per annum, besides a commission of ½ per cent on the face of the note. The evidence gave no color for the defendant's contention on this point, and the proof offered by him was of a contract totally different from that stated in the answer. Such was even the defendant's position on the trial, but to show that the plaintiff was not surprised at the variance, he offered in evidence papers on which he had on some former occasion unsuccessfully moved at special term for leave to serve a new answer, conforming to the proof now offered, but in no respect like the present pleading.

The usurious contract must be proved as laid, and it was not error to hold that an admission that it has not been and could not be so proved, has no tendency to defeat a cause of action which came to the plaintiff for full value and without notice of any defect.

The appellant cites Tyng v. Commercial Warehouse Co. 58 N. Y. 308, as against the ruling of the trial court; but in that case no question was made upon the trial as to the sufficiency of the pleadings or the relevancy of the proofs, and it was held that it was within neither the authority nor the duty of an appellate court to deprive the successful party of his recovery upon the grounds of incompleteness or imperfection of his pleadings. In the case before us not only was the objection taken on the trial, but the trial judge to overcome it was required to disregard the decision of the special and general terms and grant indirectly a favor which those courts had upon formal application denied. The statute against usury is, like other statutes, to be obeyed, but whoever desires its aid through the interference of a court must make out his title to relief by allegations as well as proof. This the defendant failed to do.

The judgment should be affirmed.

CROSS APPEALS from orders of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming orders of the Wayne Special Term, modifying and reducing assessments for taxation. Affirmed.

Reported below, 40 Hun, 598.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Hornblower, for plaintiff.

Mr. E. B. Wynn, for defendant.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are cross appeals. In the case of the same relator against the assessors of the Towns of Somerset and Wilson recently decided [ante 51] we declined to review the conclusion of fact upon the question of value.

It is usual for us, on a motion, to follow the determination of the courts below upon the facts; and unless this court is to become a board of assessors to settle finally disputed valuations all over the State we must confine our review of proceedings instituted under the Act of 1880 to questions of law, and to the inquiry whether legal rules or correct principles have been violated. We have several times dismissed similar appeals, as involving only the discretion of the supreme court in dealing with the valuations of assessors. People, Ogdensburg etc. R. R. Co. v. Pond, 92 N. Y. 643; People, Albany etc. Bridge Co. v. Weaver, 99 N. Y. 659.

It is sought to bring to our notice errors of law by treating the reasoning and computations of the opinions as before us, and insisting that no other considerations affected the conclusion reached. The orders entered show only a valuation fixed and determined. Nothing in them or in the record discloses any violation of the correct principles upon which the valuation should be ascertained, or shows that the conclusion of the court was founded solely and alone upon earning capacity. On one side a capitalization, upon the basis of 5 per cent is criticised. But the whole process was tentative, and for consideration in its bearing on the ultimate result, and not conclusive. It was an aid in determining value and a very important one, but simply an assistance to the judgment in connection with cost, location, feeders, and probable increase of business and the like; and no law dictates what calculations the court shall make to enlighten its own ultimate judgment. On the other hand the opinions are searched to detect errors in arriving at net profits. But they are inquired into only as means to an end, and possibly no two minds would agree precisely as to what they were.

We observe that the learned referee made up fourteen different tables of valuation showing the variation in possible methods of computation. All these were before the special and general terms, and were doubtless considered in reaching the result. What may have induced a preference of one over another we cannot accurately know. So far as it is said that the reports of the Company, made under oath and as required by law, should not have been considered, the answer is that they furnish almost the only available means of testing earning capacity. The assessors had a right to refer to them and probably did, and the peculiar character of the proceeding seems to make them ex necessitate a source and means of information. To apply rigidly all the rules of evidence to such an investigation might make it fruitless.

Of course, the view we take of our duty may lead to the result that the same line of road will be differently valued in different towns. That is inevitable, so far as assessors are concerned; and it can excite no surprise that general terms should also differ in their valuations. Nevertheless, we shall continue to rest upon the judgment of the courts below, where the value is fairly in dispute, unless we can see that elements proper to be considered have been excluded, or those not proper to be considered have been given force, or that some legal error has vitiated the conclusion. We are better satisfied with the reduced valuations now before us than with those previously affirmed; but so long as the differences are upon judgments of value merely, and where there is room for disagreement, we shall decline to interfere.

There is nothing in the objection that the writ issued to the assessors of the Town of Webster came to late. No notice of the completion of the roll and its delivery to the proper officer, and stating where it could be inspected, was ever given. Laws 1880, chap. 269, § 9.

We have recently held that the omission does not set running the fifteen days during which application may be made for the writ, and leaves it to be sued out at any time.

The orders should be affirmed, without costs to either party against the other.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of the General Term of the City of New York, affirming a judgment entered upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover for goods sold and delivered. Affirmed.

Reported below, 19 Jones & S 310.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. William Hildreth Field, for appellant:

Before the Code all actions were prosecuted in the name of the party who held the legal title. If a contract was made with a party as agent, the legal title was in his principal, and any action upon the contract had to be brought in the name of the principal.

Gunn v. Cantine, 10 Johns. 387.

If, however, a contract was made with a party described as agent, and was by its terms made payable to such party, then the words of agency were descriptive merely, the legal title was in the agent, and he could sue in his own name. But this decision was put upon the grounds that the contract was, by its express terms, made payable to the agent.

Harp v. Osgood, 2 Hill, 216.

The Code changed the rule of parties by enacting that suits should be brought in the name of the real party in interest, excepting that the trustee of an express trust, may sue in his own name; and subsequently the Code enacted that "A person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section."

The effect of this enactment in suits brought upon contracts made with agents has been to leave the rule as to proper parties plaintiff the same as before the Code, the courts holding that unless the agent is the trustee of an express trust, the suit must be in the name of the principal, and also, that an agent is the trustee of an express trust only when he is vested with a beneficial interest under the contract, or where the contract is by its express terms payable to him.

Neither of these conditions exists in the present case.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was to recover $22,251.60 as the price of certain bitumen theretofore sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. Besides a general denial, the answer set up that the bitumen was sold and delivered by the plaintiff, not on his own account, "but as known agent for the firm of Arles, Dufour & Co., his disclosed principals, under a special contract in writing, and without authority to receive the proceeds of such sales;" and upon this defense the defendant, upon trial of the issues before a referee, asked a dismissal of the complaint. His request was denied and judgment went against him, both upon the report of the referee and at the general term.

The principal point made in his behalf upon this appeal is that the action was improperly brought by the plaintiff in his own name. It appeared that the contract was negotiated by one Clarke, a broker, who in that character made and signed a writing which, so far as is material, was in these words:

"New York, April 25, 1882. Sold for account of Mr. E. Ludwig, Agt., to Mr. L. C. Gillespie,. four thousand (4,000) cases Syrian bitumen," etc.

A time for delivery was specified and the price declared payable thirty days from each delivery. This contract was assented to by both parties, and the referee finds that "There was no proof that the name of Arles, Dufour & Co., was disclosed or mentioned as the principal of the plaintiff in the negotiations for the sale, nor at any time before this contract had been executed and delivered;" but he also finds that at the time of making it, the "plaintiff was in fact the agent of Arles, Dufour & Co., of Marseilles, France, for the sale of imported goods," and that the bitumen was sold and delivered by him, not on his own account, but for, and on account of Arles, Dufour & Co., and as their agent.

The evidence sustains these findings, and the case is thus brought within the well established rule of law that when a contract, not under seal, is made with an agent in his own name for an undisclosed principal, whether he describes himself to be an agent or not, either the agent or principal may sue upon it. Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389; Schaefer v. Henkel, 75 N.Y. 378.

The defendant has received the thing bargained for, and a recovery by the plaintiff and payment of the judgment will be a complete protection to the defendant against any claim of the principal arising upon the contract.

The other questions presented by the appellant relate to rulings by the referee upon offers of evidence, and were properly held by the general term to be without merit.

The judgment should be affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term dismissing the complaint in an action to set aside assignment of a claim due to a decedent's estate. Reversed.

This action was brought by Hannah Diffendarfer, as sole residuary legatee named in the will of Sarah E. Quinn, deceased, against Geo. W. Dicks, William Apgar, as executor of the will of Thomas Walling, deceased, and Coffman James, administrator c. t. a. of Sarah E. Quinn, deceased, to set aside an assignment of a claim of $5,534.30 due from the estate of Walling to the estate of Sarah E. Quinn, deceased, which Coffman James, Quinn's administrator, March 10, 1882, assigned to defendant Dicks for $273; to restrain said Dicks from collecting the claim of the estate of Walling, by action or proceeding at law or otherwise, and to restrain Walling's executor from paying the claim to Dicks, or any person other than plaintiff or Quinn's administrator, and for other relief on the grounds: 1, that the assignment was made for a grossly inadequate consideration and in fraud of the rights of plaintiff, the said residuary legatee; 2, mistake of fact as to the actual amount of said claim; 3, actual fraud on behalf of Quinn's administrator and Dicks, the assignee.

At the trial in the special term, after the close of plaintiff's case, the court granted defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint, and a judgment was entered accordingly.

On appeal to the general term this judgment was affirmed and plaintiff appealed to this court.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. J. P. Osborne, for appellant:

I. As sole residuary legatee named in Quinn's will, the plaintiff may elect either of two remedies: 1, a remedy against the administrator or trustee, to hold him responsible for devastating the estate; 2, a remedy as against the assignee to follow the assets in his hands, or to annul the fraudulent transfer to him.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We concur with the opinion of Judge Davis that evidence was improperly excluded on the trial, bearing upon the question of fraud in the assignment and purchase of the claim in favor of the estate of Quinn, against the estate of Walling. This conclusion does not conflict with the authorities cited in the prevailing opinion, which establish that mere inadequacy of price, unaccompanied by fraud, is not a ground for rescinding an executed contract, and that a party is not to be deprived of the benefit of a good bargain, merely because the other party may have acted in ignorance of the value of the thing sold, or of some material fact known to the purchaser, and no undue advantage is taken by the latter, and where there are no special circumstances calling for disclosure. But the jurisdiction of chancery to rescind contracts for fraud or mutual mistake of material facts, is one of the best settled and most beneficent powers of a court of equity.

The case presented by the evidence was that of the assignment by Quinn's administrator to the defendant Dicks, for the consideration of $273, of a claim in favor of that estate against the estate of Walling, amounting to more than $5,000, and which on a reference under the statute, instituted subsequent to the assignment, has been found by the referee to have amounted on June 8, 1883, to $5,534.30. The assignment to Dicks was made March 10, 1882. If the estate of Walling was solvent it is the case of an assignment made by an administrator of a claim in favor of the estate he represented, upon a consideration which was grossly inadequate. The inadequacy of the consideration was one of the facts which the plaintiff was entitled to prove. Whether, standing alone, it would support a finding of fraud is not the question.

The trial judge, we think, erroneously excluded evidence offered to show that the estate of Walling was solvent. It was a material fact bearing upon the question of the adequacy of the consideration. So also evidence was excluded as to what the books of Quinn and Walling showed was the amount of the account against Walling. This evidence was also, we think, improperly excluded. If it had appeared from the books of both creditor and debtor that there was an admitted balance of $5,000 due to Quinn's estate, it would have been a significant circumstance bearing upon the good faith of the administrators of the respective estates; and also, in view of the other evidence, of the good faith of the defendant Dicks.

The way in which the defendant Dicks came into the transaction is peculiar. Quinn and Walling both died in 1880. In March, 1881, the administrator of Quinn wrote the administrator of Walling that Walling was indebted to Quinn in the sum of $273. In November, 1881, the defendant Dicks sent one Condit to Philadelphia with $300 to buy the claim, but James, the administrator of Quinn, then declined to sell it.

In March, 1882, James came from Philadelphia to New York and there had an interview with Apgar, Walling's executor. James informed Apgar that as near as he could make out the claim was $273. The executor of Walling did not inform James that the claim was more than $273, or say anything upon the subject of the amount, but said he would pay the claim if James would make a detailed statement of it. James replied that he could not make a detailed statement, but only a statement of what appeared on the books. Apgar replied that this would not do and that he could not pay it. Thereupon, James went to one Egbert, a nephew of Dicks and a son of Walling's bookkeeper, "of whom Apgar told him," and the two together went to the place where Dicks was employed as a clerk, and found him; and Dicks offered James $273 for the claim, which offer James accepted; and thereupon Dicks took from his desk an assignment already prepared, which James signed, and the $273 was paid.

The complaint alleges that at the time of the assignment Dicks had knowledge or information of the true amount of the claim. In his answer he denies knowledge only, but does not deny that he was informed of the amount. On the trial he testified that he did not know the amount until after the assignment, but admitted that he had testified, on the reference under the statute, that he was informed of the amount in October or November, 1881. If the plaintiff had been permitted to show that Dicks knew, or had reason to believe when he took the assignment, that Walling's estate was solvent, would not a case have been presented calling for explanation on his part? He knew that he was dealing with an administrator. If he knew also the amount of the claim, and that Walling's estate was solvent, must he not have known that the administrator of Quinn, in selling a claim of more than $5,000 for $273, was acting either under a mistake, or in reckless disregard of his trust? If he was acting in collusion either with the administrator of Quinn or of Walling, the transaction was a fraud. How came he to know that the claim was $273, or how did it happen that he prepared an assignment in advance?

We do not say that this transaction may not have been fair and honest; but the circumstances are suspicious, and it was a case where the fullest inquiry as to the facts should have been permitted within the rules of evidence.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered.

All concur.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Circuit on a verdict for plaintiff for $1,000 damages, in an action to recover for personal injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of defendant's driver. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised sufficiently appear from the opinion.

Mr. Edmund Randolph with Mr. John M. Scribner, for appellant.

The court erred in refusing to charge, as requested by defendant's counsel, that "the defendant was entitled to the exclusive use of its track for the unrestricted passage of its cars, and the plaintiff was bound to keep out of the way of the car, and if the plaintiff was hit while the car was proceeding at a lawful rate of speed, and the plaintiff had notice of its approach in season to get out of its way, the plaintiff cannot recover, and defendant is entitled to a verdict." Hegan v. *Eighth Ave. R. Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence of the plaintiff tended to show that while he was engaged in trying to remove his team and wagon from the track of defendant's road, one of its drivers carelessly drove one of its cars against him and caused the injury of which he complains. This evidence was controverted on the part of the defendant; and hence, there was a question of fact for the jury, and their decision thereon is not reviewable here.

The trial judge did not err in charging the jury that the defendant did not have the exclusive right to the use of its tracks, but simply the paramount right. Street railways have the lawful right to put their tracks in streets and run their cars thereon. Their cars are confined to the tracks, and cannot turn out to avoid obstacles thereon; hence, they have the right of way, and persons lawfully driving upon the same tracks must not recklessly, carelessly or willfully obstruct the passage of their cars. But such persons are not absolutely bound to keep off or get off from the tracks; they must fairly, and in a reasonable manner, respect the paramount right of a street railway; and if they do this, and without any fault on their part they are injured by carelessness or fault chargeable to the railway, the law affords them a remedy by action for damages.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, modifying a judgment of the Sullivan Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. John F. Anderson, for appellant:

The action was treated on the trial as one solely for the purpose of construing the instrument under which the defendants claimed the premises and its effect upon the mortgage. Having been tried in the court below upon the merits without any exceptions on the part of the defendants, it will be so considered on appeal.

Brundage v. Domestic etc. Missionary Society, 60 Barb. 218; Barnard v. Onderdonk, 98 N. Y. 158–163; Keeler v. Keeler, 3 Cent. Rep. 324, 102 N. Y. 30.

The court had jurisdiction over the parties, and they submitted their rights to it, and asked for an adjudication.

Barnard v. Onderdonk, 98 N. Y. 158; Jordan v. Van Epps, 85 N. Y. 436.

One asserting a right under the mortgagor is a proper party to an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage.

Brown v. Volkening, 64 N. Y. 76; Bank of Orleans v. Flagg, 3 Barb. Ch. 316; Keeler v. Keeler, 3 Cent. Rep. 324, 102 N. Y. 30.

After these defendants had asked to have the trust deed declared valid, and the mortgage discharged of record, and had tried the case upon the issues raised by their answer, without an exception, and asked and procured from the court a decision holding, as conclusions of law: 1, that the contract and deed were intended as a marriage settlement for the support and benefit of the issue of said marriage; 2, that said instruments create a valid implied trust in the said Henry Reinheimer, which must be upheld and enforced as such; 3, that the mortgage to Catherine Gunglock conveyed no interest in the mortgaged premises; 4, that the plaintiff's complaint should be dismissed with costs; and these defendants having entered judgment upon that decision accordingly—it was error for the general term to dismiss the complaint as to these defendants because they were not proper defendants in such an action, or because the question litigated was not a proper one in an action to foreclose a mortgage.

Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 41–48; Osgood v. Toole, 60 N. Y. 475; Devyr v. Schaefer, 55 N. Y. 446.

It was not a matter discretionary with the general term after the action had been disposed of in the court below upon the merits.

Cole v. Malcomb, 66 N. Y. 368.

The agreement, which is incorporated in the deed and in pursuance of which the deed was made, provides that Jacob Reinheimer will settle and assign the lands and tenements to Henry Reinheimer to the use and behalf of the said Philipena in manner following: in the event of the decease of said Jacob Reinheimer during the lifetime of the said Philipena, the said Philipena shall have the south half of the above named property during her natural life; and after her decease it shall revert to the heirs of the said Jacob Reinheimer.

The granting clause of the deed given in pursuance of this agreement, expresses the intent in the following language:

"I, the said Jacob Reinheimer, do hereby grant and convey to the said party of the third part the lands and tenements in the above named instrument in writing described and specified for the use and purpose also therein mentioned."

The purpose of the instrument is here clearly expressed.

The construction should be as favorable to, and as near the minds of, the parties as the rules of law will permit.

1 Chitty, Bl. book 2, p. 379; Brown v. Murdock, 12 Abb. N. C. 360.

It is clear, in this instrument, that Jacob Reinheimer did not intend to devest himself of this land, all that he had, during his lifetime. He only intended this deed to be operative, and to give his wife support, in case he died first. Then it would be important to not only reserve the use to his wife, but also to direct to whom it should revert at her decease.

Counsel for the defendant urges that the clause in the second part of the deed, "In the event of the decease of the said Philipena without issue during the lifetime of the said Jacob Reinheimer, all the property then held in trust under this indenture shall be transferred and assigned back to the said Jacob Reinheimer," is repugnant to the clause, "For the use and behoof of the said Philipena Winegarth in manner following: in the event of the decease of the said Jacob Reinheimer during the lifetime of the said Philipena," etc.

In a deed, if there be two clauses so totally repugnant that they cannot stand together, the first shall be received and the latter rejected.

1 Chitty, Bl. book 2, p. 381.

The latter clause was unnecessarily in the deed. It was made for a specific purpose; to take effect in a certain contingency. That contingency did not, and cannot now, happen. The deed is therefore inoperative, and the trust ceased when Philipena died during the lifetime of Jacob Reinheimer.

When the purpose for which an express trust was created shall cease, the estate of the trustee shall also cease.

R. S. Banks' 7th ed. p. 2182, § 62; p. 2183, § 67; Quin v. Skinner, 49 Barb. 128.

The word revert implies that there was a residue left in the grantor.

This is not one of the trusts authorized by that statute. It does not come under either of the subdivisions.

R. S. Banks' ed. p. 2181, §§ 49, 55.

This instrument is not a power under Revised Statutes, Banks' ed. p. 2182, § 58, for the reason that it does not direct or authorize the performance of any act which may be lawfully performed under a power.

It is a passive trust and is therefore void.

Jarvis v. Babcock, 5 Barb. 139; Hotchkiss v. Elting, 36 Barb. 38; Verdin v. Slocum, 71 N. Y. 345.

If it is held that this conveyance was limited upon a contingency which cannot now happen, and that it is a power in trust under the statute relating to powers (Revised Statutes, p. 2191, § 102, referring to the Statutes of Uses and Trust, p. 2183, § 67), the purposes of the power have ceased to exist, and the power has also ceased, and the premises revert to the grantor without any conveyance.

Quin v. Skinner, 49 Barb. 128, 133; Hawley v. James, 5 Paige, 318, 457; Sharpsteen v. Tillou, 3 Cow. 660; Hutchings v. Baldwin, 7 Bosw. 241.

As to the south half, this deed was void for uncertainty as to the heirs of the said Jacob Reinheimer.

The grantees must be plainly described, capable of contracting, and competent to take the estate.

Jarvis v. Babcock, 5 Barb. 146: 4 Kent, Com. 462; 2 Bl. 296; Verdin v. Slocum, 71 N.Y. 345, cases cited on 347.

If the deed to the north half is a power, it was given only for the purpose of securing to Philipena support in case of the decease of Jacob Reinheimer, during her lifetime. The power was to take effect only upon that contingency; and the purpose of the power having ceased, the power also ceases.

R. S. Banks' ed. p. 2191, § 102.

Mr. T. F. Bush, for respondents:

The plaintiff's action must be regarded as an action only for the foreclosure of the mortgage; being a mortgagee out of possession, and not having acquired the title or right of possession by foreclosure, he could not maintain an action in equity to set aside a prior conveyance, or to remove a cloud upon the title.

Moores v. Townshend, and cases cited, 3 Cent. Rep. 441.

Rights claimed in priority or hostility to the mortgage cannot properly be litigated in a foreclosure action; and a judgment determining that right is erroneous.

Eagle Fire Co. v. Lent, 6 Paige, 637; Corning v. Smith, 6 N. Y. 82; Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502; Merchants Bank v. Thomson, 55 N. Y. 7; Rathbone v. Hooney, 58 N. Y. 463; Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank v. Goldman, 75 N. Y. 127.

Since the reorganization of the courts of this State, blending in the same tribunal both legal and equitable jurisdiction, and permitting both legal and equitable controversies to be tried and determined in one action, there would seem to be no doubt as to the power of the court to determine all matters, voluntarily submitted by the parties.

Barnard v. Onderdonk, 98 N. Y. 158.

But here the real parties in interest under the trust deed, viz.: Anthony, Lizzie and George Reinheimer, the issue of the marriage of Jacob and Philipena, did not appear and answer. It was therefore not within the power of the court to determine the rights of those parties under that instrument upon the pleadings. Moreover, these children were infants, and their interests could not have been submitted in this action.

The two causes of action could not be joined without consent.

Code Civ. Proc. § 484.

The supreme court in banc having determined, in view of all the facts, that the rights of parties dependent on this trust deed ought not to be adjudged in this action, and having awarded to the plaintiff a usual judgment of foreclosure, leaving questions of title to be settled in a proper action for that purpose, after he shall have acquired all the title possible under his mortgage, leaves no ground whatever for appeal to this court.

The trust deed executed prior to the mortgage devested the mortgagor of his title.

It was a conveyance in præsenti. The language of the granting clause is "hereby grant and convey to the party of the third part the lands and tenements."

The only event in which the title was to return to the grantor was the death of Philipena, for whose use the conveyance was made, before her husband and without issue. This event can never happen as she died first, leaving issue.

It seems clear from a reasonable interpretation of the instrument that it operated to convey a life estate to Philipena, with a contingent remainder in fee to the children of the marriage.

The grant was to the "use and behoof of Philipena Winegarth." No estate, legal or equitable, vested in the trustee.

3 R. S. 7th ed. p. 2180, § 49.

The beneficiaries of the grant were, therefore, vested with a legal estate of the same quality and duration, and subject to the same condition as their beneficial interest.

Id. § 47.

The creation of contingent remainders, contingent both as to the person and estate limited, to vest in the future, limited in a life estate, is authorized by the revised statutes.

3 R. S. 7th ed. p. 2176, §§ 13, 26, 28, 30.

Presuming from the nature of the instrument that it was designed for the protection and support of the issue of the marriage, courts of equity put it beyond the power of the parents to defeat such intention by requiring the execution of a strict settlement, giving the parents an estate for life, with remainder over to children: and to preserve contingent remainders, limitations were made to trustees eo nomine.

Story. Eq. Jur. §§ 983, 984, 991, 992.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to foreclose a mortgage on real estate, executed in the year 1873, by Jacob Reinheimer and his wife Philipena, to the plaintiff's intestate, to secure the payment of money lent. None of the defendants answered except Henry Reinheimer and Henry Reinheimer, Jr. The execution of the mortgage and the amount due thereon were not disputed, but the two defendants who answered set up as a defense that at the time of the execution of the mortgage, the mortgagor Jacob Reinheimer had no title to the mortgaged premises and had acquired none since; that in 1864 he had conveyed said premises to the defendant Henry Reinheimer in trust for the benefit of said Philipena and the heirs of said Jacob, and that said Henry still owned them for the purposes of the trust, and they demanded as relief that the complaint be dismissed, and that the premises be adjudged free from the lien of said mortgage.

The plaintiff then amended his complaint, and alleged that the trust set up in the answer had terminated; that the deed was void, and demanded, in addition to the judgment of foreclosure, that the alleged trust deed be adjudged null and void.

The same answer was then made to the amended complaint, and the issues were tried before the court.

No question of fact was involved, but only the construction and effect of the deed from Jacob Reinheimer and wife to Henry Reinheimer, given in 1864, the defendants contending that it created a valid trust, and that the mortgage created no lien, and the plaintiff insisting that the deed was of no effect.

Neither of the parties made any objection to the trial of this issue in the foreclosure suit, If the objection had been raised that the defendants claimed under a title paramount to the mortgage, it would, according to some of the cases cited, have been the duty of the court to refuse to try that issue. It is not necessary to decide that question now; but if that course had been taken, the judgment rendered would have had no effect upon the rights of either party, so far as the question of the validity or effect of the trust deed is concerned. But instead of taking the objection, both parties submitted their rights, in that regard, to the adjudication of the court.

The court at special term decided that the deed of September, 1864, to Henry Reinheimer and the contract therein recited, were intended as a marriage settlement for the benefit of the children of the marriage between said Philipena Reinheimer, as well as for the said Philipena, and created a valid implied trust for the benefit of said children, and a power in trust in favor of said Henry, and that the mortgage to plaintiff's intestate conveyed no interest in the mortgaged premises, and accordingly rendered judgment dismissing the complaint with costs.

The general term, on appeal from the judgment, decided that the question of the validity and effect of the trust deed should not have been tried in this action, the interests of those claiming under that deed not being subsequent to the mortgage, but being adverse to it, and that the complaint should be dismissed with costs as to the two defendants who had answered, but without any decision on the merits, and that as to the other defendants the usual decree of foreclosure should be granted. Judgment was entered, in conformity with this decision, containing a provision that the judgment should not prejudice any parties who might be interested under the construction of the trust deed or involving its validity or effect.

We do not concur in the view taken by the court at general term. If the defendants had claimed that they had been improperly made parties defendant, because their rights were paramount and not subsequent to the mortgage, and could not properly be litigated in this action, it might, as before stated, have been proper to dismiss the complaint with costs, as to them, for that reason. But in this case instead of taking any such ground, they themselves, in their answer, set up their claims under the trust deed, and asked that they be adjudicated upon, and demanded judgment that the mortgaged premises be freed from the mortgage, and that it be discharged of record; and on the trial both parties litigated the question and the defendants obtained judgment in their own favor thereon. Under these circumstances we think that it was too late to take the ground that the dismissal of the complaint as to them, should be sustained upon the ground that the questions could not properly be litigated in this action. Both parties having consented to litigate, and having actually litigated them in this form, we think they would both be bound by the judgment.

Jordan v. Van Epps, 85 N. Y. 435, 436; Barnard v. Onderdonk, 98 N. Y. 158, 163.

We must, therefore, consider the case as to the two defendants, who are respondents on this appeal, upon the merits. As to the other defendants whose interests are alleged in the complaint to be subsequent and subject to the mortgage, and who have not answered, the judgment will not estop them as to any rights which they may have by title paramount to the mortgage. But as to the two respondents, one of whom is the trustee named in the alleged trust deed, and the other one claiming to be a beneficiary thereunder, a valid judgment can be rendered determining the questions which they have voluntarily litigated in this action.

The deed of September, 1864, under which they claim, is in substance to the following effect: it recites an antenuptial contract between Jacob Reinheimer, then the owner in fee of the mortgaged premises, bearing date the 13th of August, 1863, of the first part, Philipena Winegarth of the second part, and Henry Reinheimer, brother of said Jacob, of the third part; that a marriage is shortly to be solemnized between said Jacob and said Philipena, and therefore it is agreed as follows: first, the said Jacob agrees that in case the intended marriage is solemnized, he and said Philipena will, by a sufficient conveyance, settle and convey the land in question on and to said Henry "to the use, benefit and behoof of the said Philipena in manner following;" that in the event of the decease of the said Jacob Reinheimer during the lifetime of the said Philipena, she shall have the use of the south half of the property during her natural life; and after her decease the same shall revert to the heirs of said Jacob Reinheimer; and second, the use of the other half of said premises during the minority of Henry Reinheimer and Mary Reinheimer, two children of said Jacob by a former marriage; and when they become of age that they shall have the north half of said property conveyed to them, and in the event of the decease of the said Philipena without issue during the lifetime of the said Jacob all the property shall be transferred back to said Jacob; third, the said Jacob agrees to adopt Christ Anton Winegarth, son of his said intended wife, and place him in every respect on equal terms with whatever children may issue from the marriage; and in case there should be no such issue, that said Christ Anton shall be joint and coheir with said Henry and Mary Reinheimer.

After this recital, the deed of September, 1864, proceeds to recite that the marriage has taken place, and in pursuance of the agreements and covenants contained in the antenuptial contract conveys the land in question to Henry Reinheimer for the use and purpose therein mentioned. The legal effect of this deed was, in our judgment, to vest in Philipena, in case she should survive her husband, an estate for her own life in the south half of the land, leaving the remainder in fee to Jacob, and in the same contingency to vest in her an estate, during the minorities of Henry and Mary, in the north half of the premises, with remainder in fee to said Henry and Mary, to vest in them on the death of Jacob in the lifetime of Philipena, and to take effect in possession on their coming of age; that no trust estate and no estate whatever was vested in Henry, the grantee named in the deed, but it was a mere conveyance to him to the use of the respective beneficiaries named, which uses would be executed by the statute, without any conveyance, and that those provisions were not to take effect at all, except in the contingency of Jacob dying during the lifetime of Philipena.

The intention clearly was to provide for Philipena in case she should survive Jacob, and she having died before him the deed, on her death, ceased to operate, and the whole title remained in him. The purpose of the antenuptial agreement, and of the deed, seems to have been only to provide for the case of Jacob dying in the lifetime of his wife, leaving him to take care of and provide for his children in case he should survive her.

There is no provision in the agreement or in the deed for the issue of the marriage, in any event. An intention to provide for them is sought to be implied from the provision in the agreement that in the event of the decease of Philipena without issue during the lifetime of Jacob, all the property shall be assigned back to the said Jacob; but it is impossible to say that this provision is, of itself, sufficient to create any trust in their favor, for there is nothing in the deed providing that if Philipena should die before Jacob, leaving issue, such issue should derive any benefit from the property.

The provision for the adoption of Christ Anton Winegarth gave him no greater rights than those of the children of Jacob, born either before or after the marriage. As their interests were subject to the contingency of Philipena surviving Jacob, they were defeated by her death during his lifetime.

We think the mortgage given to the plaintiff's intestate was a valid lien upon the mortgaged premises and that the deed to Henry Reinheimer ceased upon the death of Philipena to have any operation, Jacob Reinheimer being then living.

The judgments of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and the usual judgment for the foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the mortgaged premises should be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, with costs.

All concur.

v.

Alonzo B. RAYMOND et al., Appts.

1. The court of appeals can consider no objection which is not based upon some exception taken at the time. Hence that court cannot grant relief, however unjust the verdict may be, unless the question is properly presented by an exception.
2. Whether or not a deck load on a canal boat was properly covered so as to protect it from rain, is not a subject for expert testimony: when the facts in relation thereto have been proved, it is for the jury to determine whether the covering was sufficient.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Erie Circuit in favor of plaintiff on the third trial of an action to recover freight. Affirmed.

The action was first tried before a referee who held that both parties had violated their contract and that neither could recover from the other. This judgment was reversed by the general term and a new trial ordered. On the second trial, the referee, to whom the case was referred, reported in favor of plaintiff and judgment entered upon such report was affirmed by the general term but reversed by this court and a new trial ordered. See 83 N. Y. 192.

On the third trial at the Erie Circuit, verdict was entered for plaintiff. A motion made at special term, upon a case and exceptions, to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, was denied; and defendants appealed to the general term from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, where the same was affirmed. See 35 Hun, 666.

They appealed to this court.

Mr. D. C. Hyde, for appellants.

Mr. Geo. M. Osgoodby, for respondent.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover his freight for transportation of 200 barrels of beans on a canal boat from Albion and Brockport to New York City. The defendants allege by way of counterclaim that the beans were transported in such a careless and negligent manner that they became wet and in consequence thereof sprouted, and were greatly damaged.

Upon the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to show that the contract was to carry the beans on the deck of his boat, and that he was not to be responsible for any damage to them from moisture, but that he was to furnish lumber sufficient to cover them and that the defendants were to cover them with the lumber thus furnished. The plaintiff claimed, and gave some evidence tending to show, that he furnished the lumber in pursuance of this agreement.

On the part of the defendants they gave evidence tending to show that there was no agreement that the plaintiff should be exempt from any responsibility as carrier; that he was to furnish lumber to cover the beans, and that they were to give directions to the captain of the boat as to covering them with the lumber; that the plaintiff failed to furnish lumber for that purpose; and that the boat entered upon its voyage without any covering upon the beans, and that in consequence thereof they became wet and were greatly damaged.

As to what the contract really was between the parties there was a fair conflict in the evidence; but there was a great preponderance of evidence that the plaintiff did not furnish lumber to cover the beans and that he failed in that respect to keep his contract.

There was no motion, however, to nonsuit the plaintiff at the trial, or for the direction of a verdict, and no exception which brings to us the question whether there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury. The court below had the power to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence, without any exception; but in this court we can consider no objection which is not based upon some exception taken at the trial, and the appeal to this court from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial brings here only questions of law based upon exceptions taken at the trial. Therefore, however unjust this verdict may be upon the facts appearing in the case, we are powerless on that account to give the defendants any relief.

The record contains but one exception taken by the defendants during the progress of the trial before the submission of the case to the jury. While one of the defendants was testifying as a witness he stated that he had heard the testimony of the captain of the boat as to the manner in which he covered the beans; that he was acquainted with the manner of covering deck loads, and had been for fifteen or twenty years; that he had been a shipper on the canal for sixteen or eighteen years, and that the defendants' warehouse was on the canal.

He was then asked this question: "What is a proper and proof way of covering deck loads?" To this there was objection on the part of the plaintiff, and then this question was asked: "I will ask if loose boards on barrels tiered in the manner mentioned by the witness Jacobs, loosely lapping one on the other in that way, lengthwise with the boat, if that will protect deck freight from rain?" To this plaintiff's counsel objected and the objection was sustained and defendants' counsel excepted.

We think the question was properly excluded. Whether the barrels were properly covered by the captain so as to protect them from rain was not properly a subject of expert evidence. The facts were proved, and from them the jury were to determine whether the covering was sufficient. It was not difficult to place all the facts before the jury, and from them they must be supposed to have had sufficient skill and knowledge, dealing with elements as to which all men are adequately informed, to determine whether the barrels were properly covered for protection against rain.

The only other exception which requires any notice whatever is that taken to the refusal of the judge to charge as requested by the defendants, as follows: "If they find from the evidence that it was a part of the contract of affreightment that defendants should perform or help perform the labor of covering the goods with lumber to be furnished by the plaintiff, and that he would not be responsible for the manner in which such labor would be done, nor for protection of the goods by such cover from the elements, and did furnish the lumber, yet that the defendants were entitled to a reasonable opportunity for performance after the production of the lumber, and the proper arrangement of the goods on the deck to receive the cover; and if the captain departed with the goods from Albion or Brockport without a proper cover or the defendants' consent that they might go uncovered, and without giving the defendants such opportunity, the plaintiff waived performance by defendants in that respect, and was bound to care for the goods as though no special contract had been made."

In reply to this request the court said: "It is unnecessary, I think, as my charge covers it."

This was a clear intimation to the jury that the request was proper, and we think the charge did substantially cover it. The court had charged the jury as follows: "If you find that the property should be carried upon the deck, and further, the agreement was that the plaintiff should furnish the lumber and the defendants should themselves place the lumber on the beans and cover them, then, if the captain furnished the lumber and they omitted to use it and cover the beans, when they had an opportunity, then they cannot recover; and that involves the proposition that the captain did furnish lumber, either at Albion or Brockport; for it was not contemplated that the defendants should at any other place adjust the lumber. If you find it was the agreement that the plaintiff was to furnish, and that the defendants were to advise the captain how to use it and cover and protect the property, and the lumber was furnished and they gave instructions to the captain, then they did all their duty, and the plaintiff was liable to them for the damages which might have occurred, the plaintiff himself assuming the risk that he would protect and preserve the property; and if he did not furnish the lumber at all then they were under no obligation to adjust it."

It may, however, be said that there was really no controversy at the trial that the defendants had opportunity to cover the beans, provided the lumber was furnished by the plaintiff. The contention of the plaintiff was that he furnished the lumber, and that of the defendants was that no lumber was furnished, although they repeatedly requested that it should be; and therefore they are not in a position to contend that they had no opportunity to use the lumber.

The principles controlling this case were in the main settled when it was here before; 83 N. Y. 192; and nothing further needs to be written now.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit on a verdict for defendant in an action on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Benno Loewy, for appellant:

The policy was in force and of binding effect, even though no premium had ever been paid upon it. The credit accepted by Langford on delivery of the policy was a sufficient payment to sustain it.

Bennett v. Maryland F. Ins. Co. 14 Blatchf. 422; Boehen v. Williamsburgh City Ins. Co. 35 N. Y. 131; Angell v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 171.

Langford's notice that the Company desired to cancel the policy and that "The same will be held binding until the 28th inst., 12 o'clock noon. After that date the Company will not be liable for any loss under said policy," is a recognition of the validity of the policy.

Ætna Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Ill. 342.

The policy in suit was never legally canceled, as the pro rata unearned premium had never been actually paid or tendered to the assured prior to the occurrence of the loss.

White v. Conn. F. Ins. Co. 120 Mass. 330; Bennett v. Maryland F. Ins. Co. 14 Blatchf. 422: Hathorn v Germania Ins. Co. 55 Barb. 28; Van Valkenburgh v. Lenox F. Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 465; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Ill. 342, 351.

There was no cancellation of the policy, even if notice without repayment of the unearned premium had been sufficient, as there was no notice to the assured. The clause in the policy, making the person who procures the insurance "the agent of the assured, in any transaction relating to this insurance," does not make such person the agent of the assured to receive notice of its termination.

Hermann v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 707, 100 N. Y. 411, 415; Von Wein v. Scottish Union & National Ins. Co. 20 Jones & S. 490; Hodge v. Security Ins. Co. 33 Hun, 583; White v. Conn. F. Ins. Co. 120 Mass. 333; Grace v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. 109 U. S. 278 (Bk. 27. L. ed. 932); reversing 16 Blatchf. 433; Rothschild v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. 74 Mo. 44; First Nat. F. Ins. Co. v. Isett, 14 Rep. 378 ; Latoix v. Germania Ins. Co. of New Orleans, 27 La. Ann. 113; Van Valkenburgh v. Lenox F. Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 465.

There is in this case no evidence whatever that Frank's authority extended to anything beyond placing the insurance.

Mr. Osburn E. Bright, for respondent:

The policy provides for the return to the assured of the unexpired premium pro rata; and although it is usually necessary to do so in order to effect a cancellation, yet where it becomes impossible to do so because no premium has ever been paid, and hence none is due the assured, the courts make an exception, and hold that the cancellation is valid in such cases, even where the cancellation is to take effect on a given hour on a future day.

Bergson v. Builders Ins. Co. 38 Cal. 541, 546; Mueller v. South Side F. Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 399; Von Wein v. Scottish Union, etc. Ins. Co. 20 Jones & S. 490.

In Van Valkenburgh v. Lenox Fire Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 465, the attempted cancellation was made in ignorance that the fire had already occurred; p. 467; and it was also held that the agent was not authorized to consent to an abandonment of the insurance.

In Griffey v. N. Y. Cent. Ins. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 528, 100 N. Y. 417, the company asked for a return of the policy, promising in that case to remit the return premiums. No step showing a purpose to abandon the insurance was taken by the assured.

Frank, being clearly the agent of the assured at the time of the fire, the notice of cancellation was properly served upon him.

Grace v. Am. Cent. Ins. Co. 16 Blatchf. 433; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Reynolds, 36 Mich. 502, 507; Standard Oil Co. v. Triumph Ins. Co. 64 N. Y. 85.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On or about the 18th day of February, 1881, the defendant issued a policy insuring certain property of the Standard Tinware Company of the City of New York, to the amount of $1,500, for one year from the 16th day of February, 1881. The policy contained this clause: "To protect itself against such increase or change of the risk as may not, under the above conditions, render this policy void, the Company reserves to itself the right at any time and for any cause to return the assured the unexpired premium pro rata, which shall have the effect to cancel and annul this policy;" and also the following clause: "It is a part of this contract that any person, other than the assured, who may have procured this insurance to be taken by this Company, through its regularly appointed agents, shall be deemed to be the agent of the assured named in this policy, and not of this Company under any circumstances whatever, or in any transaction relating to this insurance."

The insurance was procured through an insurance broker named Frank, from Langford & Co., who were agents of the defendant. The premium was never paid, but by the course of business between Langford & Co., and Frank, they allowed Frank to take insurance and pay when it suited his convenience. On the 26th day of February Langford & Co. sent to Frank this notice:

"Dear Sir: The Franklin Insurance Company of Boston desire to cancel their policy No. 9190, covering property of Standard Tinware Co., Nos. 394 and 396 First Ave., N. Y. The same will be held binding until the 28th inst., 12 o'clock noon. After said date the Company will not be liable for any loss under said policy.

Yours respectfully."

This notice came to Frank's hands about 9 o'clock A. M. on the 28th and in the evening of the same day the property insured was damaged by fire to the extent of $4,600. Six other insurance companies had policies upon the same property. On the 16th day of June, 1881, the Standard Tinware Company assigned its claim against the defendant upon its policy, to the plaintiff; and in February, 1882, he commenced this action. He claims that the policy was in force at the time of the fire, while the defendant claims that it was effectually canceled before the fire.

The plaintiff contends that the cancellation was ineffectual, because at the time of the notice of cancellation a pro rata share of the premium was not returned. But the premium had never in fact been paid. If it could in any sense be treated as paid, it was so paid by the credit given to the broker, Frank. The defendant had never actually received anything, and therefore it had nothing to return. If the premium could be paid by the credit, so it could be restored by the cancellation of that credit, and after the defendant gave the notice canceling the policy its charge against Frank or the Tinware Company was thereby canceled. If it could thereafter enforce payment of the premiun against anyone, it would have been only a pro rata share thereof for the time intervening between the 16th and the 28th days of February, at noon, when the cancellation took effect. It was the agreement between the parties to the insurance that the Insurance Company should have the right to cancel the policy; and it was certainly not contemplated that it should make a present to the insured in case the premium had not been paid as a condition of its right to cancel. We do not think, therefore, that the contention is sound that the cancellation was ineffectual on account of the nonreturn of the pro rata portion of the premium.

It is further claimed on behalf of the plaintiff that Frank had no authority to receive this notice of cancellation, and that notice to him was not notice to the insured. We are of opinion that upon the undisputed evidence Frank was so far the agent of the Tinware Company that notice to him was notice to that company. He had been the agent of the Tinware Company for about two years, through whom it procured insurance upon its property from various companies, in all to the amount of $10,000. It does not appear that he received any particular instructions as to the companies from which he was to receive insurance, or as to the rates of premium, or the amount to be insured by any particular company. It is inferable that all these matters were left to his discretion.

After the fire Scheider, the president and general manager of the Tinware Company, did not know how much insurance the company had, nor what policies it held until he called upon Frank the morning after the fire and obtained the information from him. The defendant's policy, and probably all the other policies, remained in the possession of Frank until after the fire. Frank, when he received the notice of cancellation, retained the same and in no way objected that he was unauthorized to receive the notice, and when Scheider called upon him the next morning after the fire, he informed him of the receipt of the notice and he in no way questioned Frank's authority to receive it. On the afternoon of the same day Langford, one of defendant's agents, called upon Scheider, informed him that the policy was canceled, and thereupon Scheider surrendered it to him, without objection, as a canceled policy.

On the day after the fire formal notice of the loss, and in about two weeks after the fire, formal proofs of loss were served upon all the other companies, but not upon the defendant. In the proofs of loss thus served the insurances in the other six companies were specified and the loss was apportioned among them, in proportion to the amounts respectively insured by them; and one of the companies specified in the proofs paid to the Tinware Company its share of the loss as thus determined. In those proofs the defendant was not named among the insurance companies having policies upon the property. No claim of liability against the defendant on its policy was made until about three months after the fire, and no proofs of loss were served upon the defendant until about three and a half months after the fire.

From all these facts, including the stipulation in the policy above set out, it is clear that Frank was understood by the parties to be the general agent of the Tinware Company to procure and deal with this insurance. During more than three months after the fire his authority to that extent seems to have been conceded by the Tinware Company and was not questioned by anyone. If upon this evidence the jury had found that Frank was not authorized to receive the notice, their verdict would have been so far contrary to the evidence that it would have been the duty of the trial judge to set it aside.

It is true that Scheider testified that Frank was simply the broker whom he authorized to get so much insurance and that he did not consider him his agent, and that Frank testified that he had nothing to do "but to place the business" (meaning probably to perfect the insurance) as Scheider ordered him to do. But these were mere expressions of opinions by the witnesses, while testifying, which in no way impaired the force and significance of the other evidence or changed its legal effect.

It is a matter of some significance that nothing was said about the extent of Frank's agency in the charge of the judge; and he was not requested to submit the facts in reference to such agency to the jury.

If Frank had had no authority, except as a broker, to procure this insurance, and the defendant had been obliged to rely solely upon the clause in the policy above set out to establish his agency, then this case would have been in that respect like the case of Hermann v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 707, 100 N. Y. 411.

But the evidence bearing upon Frank's agency distinguishes this case from that. Certainly, so long as Frank held the policy and it was carried upon his credit, and not delivered to or accepted by the insured, notice of cancellation could be given to him, and upon receipt of such notice, it would be his duty, as broker, to procure other insurance. Suppose in this case the notice had been given to him within one hour after the policy was delivered to him; would anyone doubt that the policy would have been thereby effectually canceled and that it would have been his duty at once to procure other insurance? The fact that it remained in his possession for ten days does not affect the principle or make any difference in his status, authority and obligation.

The further claim is made that there was not sufficient proof that Scheider was authorized to represent the Tinware Company. We think the proof is ample that he was so authorized and that he was the general manager of the company. It appears that the Tinware Company was the successor of Joseph Scheider & Co., and so it was printed upon the letter heads of the company. He was its president and acted for and represented it in all its transactions in reference to the insurance upon its property and the adjustment and settlement of the loss. The assignment of the claim to this plaintiff was executed by him. When testifying he spoke of the bookkeeper of the company as "my bookkeeper," and of Frank as "my agent," thus showing that, in his estimation at least, he was the company; and there is no hint in the evidence that any other person had authority to represent it.

From all this evidence the inference is irresistible that he was the general manager of the company, authorized to represent it; and the trial judge could properly have so determined as matter of law.

We are, therefore, of opinion that upon the evidence as it appears in this record, the trial judge could, if moved thereto by the defendant, have nonsuited the plaintiff. The plaintiff, therefore, has no cause of complaint of the verdict of the jury against him, or of any error in the charge of the judge.

If the policy had not been canceled before the fire, and thus had remained in force, its subsequent surrender to the defendant would not have extinguished its cause of action for its loss. It is the cancellation of the policy before the fire, and that alone, which requires the affirmance of this judgment.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

George HALL et al., Appts.

1. Whenever an equitable right to subrogation cannot be made out without resorting to some agreement or security which is void for usury, no such equity exists.
2. Hence, where one on paying off certain liens upon another's realty received from the latter a mortgage on such realty which was subsequently declared void for usury, and thereafter assigned his cause of action arising out of his payment of said liens, and his assignee thereupon brought suit to revive and to be subrogated to and to enforce the liens which had been so satisfied, a judgment, declaring that plaintiff's assignor, having paid said liens and there being a junior mortgage, was entitled to be subrogated to said liens so paid by him, was erroneous—the so-called junior mortgage being the mortgage which had been declared usurious; the usurious contract being out of the case, he stood merely as a volunteer and would have no right to subrogation.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to revive and be subrogated to and enforce certain liens against real estate. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Hunt, Leavenworth & Everson, for appellants:

There was no existing fact, pleaded, given in evidence or found, which gave plaintiff's assignor any standing whatever to subrogation, except that contained in the usurious mortgage. The mere fact of payment alone is not enough.

Baldwin v. Moffett, 94 N. Y. 82, 85.

Said usurious agreement cannot be the foundation of a valid claim.

Mr. J. R. Shea, for respondent:

The mortgage given to plaintiff in consideration of his paying off certain existing and valid liens on the premises having been declared void, on the ground of usury pleaded by the mortgagor in an action to foreclose such mortgage, the original valid obligations were thereby revived.

Y. 89; Winstead Bank v. Webb, 39 N. Y. 325; Russell v. Nelson, 99 N. Y. 119, 123.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as assignee of Payn Bigelow, sought by this action to revive and be subrogated to and enforce certain liens upon real estate of the defendant Hall, which Bigelow had paid and procured to be discharged of record under an agreement with Hall. These liens consisted of two mortgages executed by Hall, and of certain legacies which were charges on the real estate in question.

It appears by the findings of the trial judge that on the 17th of October, 1874, an agreement was entered into between Hall and Bigelow whereby Bigelow agreed to advance the amount of the said liens and pay them off, and also to advance to said Hall the sum of $919.71 in cash and Hall. agreed that to secure the payment of said advances and of the further sum of $150 as a bonus Hall and his wife would execute a mortgage on said premises to Bigelow.

In pursuance of this agreement the mortgage was executed for $3,000 and interest, which amount included the amount then due on said liens and the cash advance of $919.71 and the bonus of $150. This mortgage of $3,000 provided in express terms that, as part of the consideration thereof, Bigelow was to assume and pay the before mentioned liens.

Bigelow paid a portion of the liens, and they were discharged of record; and he afterwards brought an action against Hall and others for the foreclosure of the $3,000 mortgage, in which action such mortgage was adjudged void for usury. After that adjudication he assigned to the plaintiff his cause of action arising out of the satisfaction of said liens, and she thereupon brought this action, and judgment was rendered in her favor in the supreme court, adjudging that her assignor (having paid said liens, and there being a junior mortgage) was entitled to be subrogated to said prior liens so paid by him, and entitled to enforce the same.

We are of opinion that this judgment was erroneous. The only claim of Bigelow to be junior mortgagee rested upon his $3,000 mortgage which was adjudged to be void for usury, and upon his agreement to pay off the prior liens, which agreement was part of the usurious contract. It was necessary to resort to this usurious contract and security to make out any equitable right in Bigelow to subrogation. If they were left out of the case, he would stand as a mere volunteer, and would have no right to subrogation; Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 395; Gans v. Thieme, 93 N. Y. 225; and whenever an equitable right to subrogation cannot be made out without resorting to some agreement or security which is void for usury, no such equity exists.

We think the case of Baldwin v. Moffett, 94 N. Y. 82, is decisive on this point. None of the cases cited in the respondent's brief, or in the opinion at general term, conflict with this principle, or sustain the claim of the respondent.

In the cases of Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 89, Barnes v. Mott, 64 N. Y. 397, Cole v. Malcolm, 66 N. Y. 363, Gans v. Thieme, 93 N. Y. 225, no question of usury was involved, and they have no special bearing on the case. Cook v. Barnes, 36 N. Y. 520, Winstead Bank v. Webb, 39 N. Y. 325, Gerwig v. Sitterly, 56 N. Y. 214, Real Estate Trust Co. v. Keech, 69 N. Y. 248, Russell v. Nelson, 99 N. Y. 119, simply hold that when an existing valid debt is renewed, or the time of payment extended, or a valid security held therefor is canceled, by means of a subsequent agreement or security which is void for usury, the original debt or security is not invalidated; and if it has been discharged by means of the usurious security it will be revived and enforced.

In Patterson v. Birdsall, 64 N. Y. 294, the plaintiff was the holder of a valid junior incumbrance which entitled him, without reference to the usurious agreement, to redeem from prior incumbrances and be subrogated thereto.

In the case now before us the right of the assignor of the plaintiff to pay the prior incumbrances, and his claim to subrogation, rested wholly upon the usurious agreement. He had no position of junior mortgagee, except under the mortgage which was adjudged void for usury.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

(Decided May 13, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of New York City, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover an award for land taken in the opening of a street. Affirmed.

Reported below, 19 Jones & S. 112.

The facts and questions raised sufficiently appear from the opinion.

Mr. W. Stebbins Smith, for appellant.

Mr. James R. Marvin, for respondent.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are no exceptions to the findings of fact or conclusions of law contained in this record, and none to the refusals to find, requested on behalf of the defendant. There is nothing subject to our review beyond an exception taken to the jurisdiction of the court, and one to the exclusion of a question during the progress of the trial.

The action was brought in the Superior Court of the City of New York to recover an award for land taken in the opening of a street, and the city was the original defendant. A claim to the award was also made by Morris and an order of interpleader granted and entered substituting him as defendant and discharging the city upon its paying into the hands of the chamberlain to the credit of the action the amount of the award.

The jurisdiction of the court was assailed upon the basis of a single provision of the statute. Laws 1882, chap. 410, § 993.

The enactment is that where no ownership is named in the report of the commissioners, or the owners named cannot be found "it shall be lawful" for the city to pay the award "into the said supreme court" to be disposed of by it. This is a provision for the city's benefit which it may adopt and plead as a defense, but to which it is not compelled to resort. It did not adopt it in the present case and made no such defense, but admitting its liability to the true owner brought the money into the court in which it was sued and left it there to the credit of the action. That such action could be maintained for the award we have heretofore decided. Fisher v. Mayor, 57 N. Y. 344; Spears v. Mayor, 87 N. Y. 359.

The question excluded called for an inference or opinion of the witness founded upon facts either undisclosed or insufficient to warrant the conclusion sought. The inquiry whether all persons who obtained deeds from Morris did so because they were members of the Land Owners' Association involved an inference derived from the character of that association and Morris' relation to it, and the possibility of his conveyance outside of its control, matters which depended upon the force of the written contract, and as to which the judgment or inference of the witness was inadmissible. The effort was to derive from that inference another that Hyde when he took his deed from Morris must have been a member of the association, and then from that a third that he knew of the contract and so was affected by it. The witness did not even know that Hyde was a member of the association or that Morris had conveyed to him, and his inference from or reasoning upon the facts were properly rejected.

Walter C. TUCKERMAN, Appt.

A written stipulation entered into by the attorneys for the respective parties declared that the compensation of the referee should be $20 "for every hearing." Held, that the meaning of the word "hearing" could not be extended so as to include days appointed for a hearing but on which no hearing in fact was had, and when, in advance of the time appointed, the parties had agreed upon a postponement and in pursuance thereof had omitted to appear before the referee.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of the Orange Special Term denying a motion for a new taxation of costs. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Prescott Hall Butler, for appellant:

An appeal lies to this court upon a question of costs, and especially from an order fixing the amount of a referee's fees under the statute, as one "affecting a substantial right, and not involving any question of discretion."

Code Civ. Proc. § 190, subdivision 2; Sturgis v. Spofford, 58 N. Y. 103; First Nat. Bank of Cooperstown v. Tamajo, 77 N. Y. 476; Ogdensburgh etc. R. R. Co. v. Vermont & C. R. R. Co. 63 N. Y. 176; Columbian Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 37 N. Y. 536; Hobart v. Hobart, 86 N. Y. 636.

The stipulation did not extend the right of the referee to charge for times when, under the general rules of practice, he could not charge the statutory fee. Under these general rules he was not entitled to any compensation whatever for days when no other proceeding was had before him, excepting the asking for and obtaining an adjournment.

Such a proceeding is not, under the decisions, a hearing, and the referee is not entitled to make any charge therefor.

Shultz v. Whitney, 17 How. Pr. 471; Watson v. Gardiner, 50 N.Y. 671; Townsend v. Peyser, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 324; Brown v. Windmuller, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 359.

The provision of the Code, § 3296, requiring that any agreement varying the compensation of referees fixed by law, should be in writing or entered in the minutes, is conclusive against the claim of the referee in this case for $780 over and above the $1,500 to which, at most, he can be entitled.

The stipulation speaks of "every hearing" only. The Code says "for each day spent in the business of the reference." These mean the same thing; or if there is any difference in meaning, the language of the stipulation has a more restricted application.

And if such a conversation were had as is relied upon to affect the original stipulation, it was a new and independent oral agreement between the parties in respect to the compensation of the referee, and as such it was nugatory and ineffective for any purpose under § 3296 of the Code: 1, because, admittedly, it was not entered into either at or before the commencement of the trial as appears by the affidavits which state this conversation; 2, because it was not in writing; and 3, because it was not entered in the minutes.

Shultz v. Whitney, 17 How. Pr. 474; First Nat. Bank of Cooperstown v. Tamajo, 77 N.Y. 476; Townsend v. Peyser, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 324; Chase v. James, 16 Hun, 14.

Mr. Frederick Seymour, for respondents:

The order is not reviewable by this court.

People, Clute, v. Boardman, 41 N. Y. 362; McClure v. Supervisors, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 202; People, Waldman, v. Board of Police Comrs. 82 N. Y. 506.

The parties placed their own interpretation upon the stipulation, and that interpretation was acted upon by the referee and by the plaintiff.

R. R. Co. v. Trimble, 10 Wall. 367 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 948); Reading v. Gray, 37 N.Y. 79, 90; Stokes v. Recknagel, 38 N. Y. 368.

The stipulation provides that the referee's certificate shall be final as to the amount of the time spent by him.

It has been repeatedly held that where the parties have agreed to submit to a third person the decision of a question likely to arise under contract or stipulation, one of the parties cannot thereafter withdraw from him the decision of the question and submit it to the determination of a legal tribunal.

Smith v. Brady, 17 N.Y. 173, 176; McMahon v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 463; Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N.S. 378; Weeks v. Little, 15 Jones & S. 1, 30.

Per Curiam:

The question in this case turns upon the interpretation of that clause in the written stipulation of the attorneys for the respective parties, which declares that the compensation of the referee shall be the sum of $20 per day "for every hearing." The fees in controversy relate to the charge made by the referee for thirty-nine days on which appointments for a hearing had been made at the request of counsel, but where no hearing in fact was had, and no meeting or appearance before the referee. The failure to appear on the several days so appointed was due to the fact that by arrangement between the respective counsel made prior to the times fixed by the referee, the hearing was postponed, of which postponement the referee was notified. The postponements were made in most cases at the request and for the accommodation of the counsel for the defendant. The reference continued during the period of two years or more, and the referee charged fees for 114 days at the stipulated rate per day, amounting in the aggregate to $2,280.

We are of opinion that the charge for the days on which there was no hearing and no appearance, was unauthorized. The compensation of referees is fixed by statute at $6 "for each day spent in the business of the reference," unless a different rate of compensation is fixed by the consent of the parties, manifested by an entry in the minutes of the referee, or otherwise in writing, or a smaller compensation is fixed by the court or judge in the order of reference. Code § 3296.

In this case there was no entry in the minutes on the subject, and the right to fees beyond the statutory rate depends solely upon the written stipulation. It is impossible, we think, to extend the meaning of the words "every hearing" in the stipulation so as to include days appointed for a hearing, but on which no hearing in fact was had, and when, in advance of the time appointed, the parties by arrangement had agreed upon a postponement and in pursuance thereof had omitted to appear before the referee. It might have been proper to have provided for this contingency in the stipulation. But the stipulation is silent on the subject; and we cannot, in face of the statute, give any force to the alleged oral agreement or understanding between the counsel and the referee that the word "hearing" should be deemed to include appointments of hearings. The word "hearing" is unambiguous; and to give effect to the oral evidence would be adding a material term to the stipulation, contrary to settled rules of evidence.

The statute is founded on a just policy. When counsel undertake to fix the rate of compensation by agreement it is but just that their intention should be manifested in such a formal and authentic manner as to leave no doubt.

The orders of the Special and General Terms should be reversed, and an order entered for the retaxation in respect to the items mentioned

All concur.

Mark L. McDONALD, Respt.,
v.
Erwin DAVIS, Appt.

1. A judgment obtained against defendant intermediate the commencement by him of voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy under the late bankrupt law and the granting of his discharge therein is discharged by the discharge in bankruptcy where such judgment was founded upon a debt which existed when the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced and was provable therein.

2. If the discharge had been in existence before the judgment was rendered, leave to set it up as a defense to the action might have been applied for; but as it had not been granted at that time, it is competent to interpose it as a shield to any proceeding taken to enforce the judgment, by asking for a perpetual stay upon the execution, if any is issued, or by setting it up as an answer to any action brought upon the judgment.
3. An order in the bankruptcy court vacating the stay which defendant had procured and permitting plaintiff to proceed with his suit and in case he obtained judgment therein permitting him to take any other proceeding which the law allowed, had no effect by way of limiting the subsequent discharge of defendant, and such discharge can be pleaded by him and its full legal force insisted upon in an action upon the judgment and is a perfect defense in such action.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiff on the second trial of an action on a judgment obtained in the State of California. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph H. Choate and Henry A. Root, for appellant:

It is claimed that the order of the bankruptcy court permitting plaintiff to prosecute his suit to judgment was equivalent to adjudging that the plaintiff's suit and the judgment and execution therein should not be affected by a discharge in bankruptcy, if any were subsequently obtained; and that the order was equivalent to a dismissal of the proceedings in bankruptcy pro tanto. Assuming the bankruptcy court to have thus intended by its order, such action would have been void and of no effect, because of the utter lack of power in the bankruptcy court to give such effect to the order under the Bankruptcy Act.

Under the general rule the plaintiff's claim would be barred by the discharge in bankruptcy.

Section 5119 of the United States Revised Statutes provides as follows:

"A discharge in bankruptcy duly granted, shall, subject to the limitations imposed by the two preceding sections, release the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities and demands which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy."

Plaintiff's debt was provable in bankruptcy; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5067; and it was so proved.

The fact that the original claim had been reduced to judgment does not merge it in the judgment. The judgment is not a new debt.

This is one of the class of cases in which a judgment, instead of being regarded strictly as a new debt, is "held to be merely the old debt in a new form, so as to prevent a technical merger from working injustice."

Mr. E. R. Robinson, for respondent:

Under the Bankrupt Act of 1867 it is not the general rule, as asserted by defendant, that a discharge in bankruptcy is per se a defense to a judgment obtained against a bankrupt, pending bankruptcy proceedings and before the discharge, upon a debt contracted prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy and provable against the estate.

On the contrary the general rule is precisely the reverse, viz.: that the discharge in bankruptcy is not a defense to such a judgment.

By this we do not mean, of course, that the court, by which the judgment was rendered, loses control over it, and may not, on equitable grounds and proper cause shown and laches excused, open its own judgment so as to permit the discharge to be set up as a defense, or even grant a perpetual stay against the enforcement of the judgment.

Monroe v. Upton, 50 N. Y. 593; Palmer v. Hussey, 87 N. Y. 303; Revere Copper Co. v. Dimock, 90 N. Y. 33; S. C. 117 U. S. 559 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 994).

The Bankrupt Law of 1867 necessarily contemplates that, notwithstanding the proceedings in bankruptcy, a valid and enforceable judgment may be obtained against the bankrupt, which will not be barred by a subsequent discharge in either of two events: 1, the failure of the bankrupt to apply for and obtain a stay; or 2, the dissolution of the stay, in consequence of unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in applying for his discharge.

S. 521 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 403); Hill v. Harding, 107 U. S. 631 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 493).

The English decisions, and those made by the New York Courts under the Act of 1841 (Clark v. Rowling, 3 N. Y. 216; Dresser v. Brooks, 3 Barb. 429, and Fox v. Woodruff, 9 Barb. 498) cited by the defendant, are inapplicable. No similar provision as to stay, etc., was contained in the Bankruptcy Act of 1841, or in the Bankruptcy Laws of England.

This difference in the rule with respect to the judgment being or not being barred by the discharge, arising out of difference of practice under the Act of 1841, with regard to granting a stay, is clearly pointed out in Bradford v. Rice, 102 Mass. 474, and Re Gallison, 5 Nat. Bank. Reg. 355.

The Bankruptcy Act of 1867 adopts and incorporates the Massachusetts practice of granting a stay for a reasonable time to enable the bankrupt to apply for and plead his discharge if obtained.

The reason for the New York decisions under the Act of 1841 that a judgment on a provable claim is barred by a subsequent discharge, therefore, no longer exists, and the propriety of adopting the principle of the Massachusetts decisions on this point is evident. Cessante ratione, cessat lex. Eadem ratio, eadem est lex.

The decisions made by this court under the Act of 1867 (Monroe v. Upton, 50 N. Y. 593, and Palmer v. Hussey, 87 N. Y. 308), relied upon by defendant, are not opposed to this view. They do not hold that as matter of law the subsequent discharge is a bar to a suit on the judgment obtained on the original debt; on the contrary, they proceed on the assumption that it is not a bar. They hold that a bankrupt against whom such a judgment has been obtained, may, by excusing his laches and showing adequate grounds for equitable interference, obtain relief from the court which rendered the judgment by having it vacated or having its enforcement restrained. The necessary implication is that in the absence of interference on equitable grounds by the court which rendered the judgment, the judgment may be sued, and the subsequent discharge will not be a legal defense to the suit.

Therefore, under the general rule, and without claiming or insisting upon the benefit of the express terms of the order of the bankruptcy court of the 25th of February, 1873, the plaintiff was entitled to have a verdict directed in his favor for the amount of the California judgment and interest.

But even if the general rule were as asserted by the defendant, nevertheless, the plaintiff, by reason of the order of the bankruptcy court of the 25th of February, 1873, was entitled to such direction.

The order of the bankruptcy court of the 25th of February, 1873, was much more than a mere vacation of the stay of proceedings. It not only authorized the plaintiff to proceed with his action in the same manner as he might have done if no restraining order had been issued, but also expressly provided that if he should obtain judgment therein he should be at liberty to sue out execution and to take any other proceedings under the judgment that the law and practice of the state court permits to enforce judgments. It was in effect an adjudication that the plaintiff's suit, and the judgment and execution therein should not be affected by a discharge in bankruptcy if any should be subsequently obtained, and was equivalent to a dismissal of the proceedings in bankruptcy pro tanto, and in so far as they affected the plaintiff's suit. Such adjudication was made after due notice and hearing, has never been appealed from, vacated or modified, and cannot be attacked collaterally.

The bankruptcy court had the power to make the order.

A bankrupt, by his laches in prosecuting his proceedings for discharge, loses his right to restrain creditors, and loses the benefit of his discharge as to a creditor who pursues and obtains his remedy, as the plaintiff in this case did, by motion to vacate the stay and proceed to judgment and execution. Such a creditor has a right to collect the judgment, if obtained, out of after acquired assets.

The direction of the verdict in plaintiff's favor was also proper, because he was precluded from availing of his defense in this action by the previous adjudication adverse to him in his proceeding in California to set aside the judgment.

Pepin v. Lachemeyer, 45 N. Y. 27; Dwight v. St. John, 25 N. Y. 203.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment sued on herein was obtained in the State of California against defendant, intermediate the commencement by him of voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy in that State and the granting of the discharge therein. The judgment was founded upon a debt which existed at the time the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced, which debt was provable and was in fact proved in the bankruptcy proceedings.

Under the Bankrupt Act of 1841, this court held that a discharge in bankruptcy operated upon such a judgment. Clark v. Rowling, 3 N. Y. 216.

The ground upon which that decision rested was that although technically a judgment upon a contract merged the original debt, yet it did not do it so completely that the court could not look behind the judgment to see upon what it was founded, for the purpose of protecting the equitable rights of the parties in their original relations to each other. It was said that in such a case a judgment, instead of being regarded strictly as a new debt, was to be looked upon as the old debt in a new form so as to prevent a technical merger from working injustice.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff claims however that there are some provisions of the late bankrupt law which differ in such a material degree from those of the Law of 1841 as to call for a different disposition of the case.

It is urged that in the Act of 1841 there was no provision for a stay of proceedings in an action prior to the discharge in bankruptcy; and hence, a judgment obtained prior thereto should be discharged by the certificate, while in the later Act there is an express provision for such a stay and a defendant has a legal right to it. The argument then is that if, having the legal right to a stay, he does not procure it, or having once procured it, if it has been vacated by reason of his own neglect, the judgment then obtained ought to merge the debt and escape the force of the discharge in bankruptcy.

Although it does not appear that this precise argument has been heretofore used for the purpose of permitting such a judgment to remain, notwithstanding the discharge, still the question of the effect of such discharge, under the later Bankrupt Act, upon a judgment obtained under similar circumstances as the one in suit, has been decided; and we do not think it wise to open the door to further discussion here. Monroe v. Upton, 50 N. Y. 593–597.

That case decided the question in the same way as Clark v. Rowling, supra.

Nothing said or decided in Revere Copper Co. v. Dimock, 90 N. Y. 33, affects this question. The judgment in that case was subsequent to the discharge, and the court simply held that the determination by the judgment of the existence of a debt on that day was conclusive, and the prior discharge could not be set up to dispute the absolute verity which the judgment imported.

The cases of Clark v. Rowling, and Monroe v. Upton, supra, were cited with approval and distinguished from the one then under discussion. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the judgment was affirmed, the court holding that as the discharge had been obtained before the entry of the judgment, application to the court should have been made for leave to plead it as a defense, and that as that was not done the judgment was valid, like any other judgment in an action where a good defense existed but had not been pleaded, and that such defense could not thereafter be set up in an action on the judgment. Dimock v. Revere Copper Co. 117 U. S. 559–565 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 994, 996].

There is nothing in the case of Hill v. Harding, 107 U. S. 631 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 493], which impairs the authority of the two cases in this court already referred to, and we must still adhere to the law as therein decided, although the courts of some other States may have taken a different view of the question.

Of course the discharge operates only when pleaded, like the defense of a release or payment, and it must exist in order to be pleaded; hence, the answer to the plaintiff's claim that the Supreme Court of California was the only tribunal to which to apply for leave to set up the discharge. If the discharge had been in existence before judgment was entered, undoubtedly that tribunal would have been the one to apply to for leave to set it up as a defense to the action. As it had not been granted at that time, it was then competent to interpose it as a shield to any proceeding taken to enforce the judgment by asking for a perpetual stay upon the execution, if one were issued, or by setting it up as an answer to any action brought upon the judgment. This is all, as I understand the cases, that has been decided by any court of this State or by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The next question is as to the construction and effect of the order in the bankruptcy court in California, vacating the stay which defendant had procured, and permitting plaintiff to proceed with his case the same as if never restrained, and in case he obtained judgment therein, permitting him to take any other proceedings that the law and practice of the state court allowed.

We think this order had no effect by way of limitation upon the subsequent discharge of defendant, and that it could, therefore, be properly pleaded and its full legal force insisted upon in this action.

The order simply took away from the defendant the protection of the statute while he was obtaining his discharge, leaving the plaintiff at liberty, if he could, to obtain judgment and issue execution thereon and enforce payment of his debt before the discharge was obtained.

This is, or might be in many cases, a most desirable privilege to a plaintiff, while the defendant, by his negligence, is deprived of his freedom from harassing litigation during the bankruptcy proceedings which he otherwise would be entitled to, and which was one of the reasons for the provision granting a stay. Hill v. Harding, supra.

As we think this to be the true construction of the order it is unnecessary to examine the question of its legality, provided it were construed, as the court at general' term did, as in effect a dismissal of the bankrupt proceedings as to the plaintiff, grounded upon the assumed right to dismiss them altogether as to everybody, because the defendant had not applied to be discharged within one year after his adjudication as a bankrupt, there being, as alleged, no assets in the hands of the assignee.

The court should have granted the motion of defendant to direct a verdict for him, on the ground of the discharge in bankruptcy being a perfect defense to the action.

The judgment should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial ordered; costs to abide event.

All concur.

FLOUR CITY NATIONAL BANK of Rochester, Appt.,
v.
TRADERS NATIONAL BANK of Rochester, Respt.

By the system of exchanges among the banks in Rochester, commercial paper held by either of them payable at any of the others was, on being presented at maturity at the bank where payable, marked by that bank "certified" and then returned to the bank presenting it, to be held as an item of credit to such bank in its exchange account for the day with the certifying bank, for the purpose of being set off against items in favor of that bank against the other. These exchange accounts were compared on the following day and the balance only was paid by the debtor bank to the other. On December 19, 1882, a draft payable that day at the plaintiff bank was presented to it by the City Bank of Rochester; the draft was marked "certified" by the plaintiff and returned to the City Bank, which bank on the same day transferred it to the defendant bank, under a special arrangement between them, in settling that day's balance between them. The City Bank stopped payment and was insolvent at the close of business on that day. On the next day this draft was, with other items, passed into the plaintiff bank by the defendant bank in settlement of the account between them, but on being discovered by the plaintiff was returned to the defendant, with a statement that the plaintiff had off-sets to a much larger amount in its account with the City Bank. The defendant insisted however on being credited with the draft and refused to pay the amount thereof to the plaintiff, which, therefore, brought this suit for such amount.

Held, that under the circumstances, the defendant did not become a holder of the draft in good faith; that it purchased what it knew to be a mere voucher for an item in an account to be settled between the plaintiff and the City Bank, and necessarily took it subject to the result of the settlement of that account, and that therefore judgment for defendant should be reversed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Monroe Circuit in favor of defendant on the second trial of an action to recover the balance of a bank exchange account. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Thomas C. Montgomery, for appellant:

The defendant is not entitled to credit for the certified Gordon acceptance in its account with the plaintiff, because it took that acceptance with knowledge that its transfer by the City Bank was a diversion of it to the plaintiff's damage, and was in violation of the plaintiff's right and of the City Bank's duty.

Davis v. Spencer, 24 N. Y. 386; Morehouse v. Second Nat. Bank of Oswego, 98 N. Y. 503; Belden v. State, 4 Cent. Rep. 180, 103 N. Y. 9; Evans v. Kymen, 1 Barn. & Ad. 528.

The suggestion that no notice of the plaintiff's rights can affect the defendant's claim under the certified acceptance, because such a certification is like the bank's circulating notes or currency, is without force.

No national banking association shall issue any notes to circulate as money other than such as are authorized by the provisions of this title.

U. S. R. S. § 5183.

The Gordon acceptance when presented for payment at maturity, and "certified," was thereby canceled, and served only as a memorandum that the City Bank was entitled to credit for the amount of it in the exchanges the next morning.

Mr. William F. Cogswell, for respondent:

The certificate of the Flour City Bank was, in effect at least, its certificate of deposit, payable on demand to the holder. It did not become dishonored until after actual demand made and refusal to pay. This is the lowest form of stating the liability of the plaintiff bank. It has been stated much stronger.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the system of exchanges established among the banks in the City of Rochester, commercial paper held by either of such banks, payable at any of the others, on being presented at maturity at the bank at which it was made payable, instead of being paid on presentation, was marked by the teller of the bank where payable, "certified," and was then returned to the bank which had presented it, for the purpose of being held as an item of credit to such bank, in its exchange account for the day with the certifying bank, and being off-set against any similar credit in favor of that bank against the other, which might arise during the same day for paper presented at and certified by it. On the following day these exchange accounts were compared and the balance only was paid by the debtor bank to the other.

Under this system the purpose of the certification was not to furnish to the bank receiving it a negotiable instrument, which might be put in circulation, but simply to furnish it with a voucher or memorandum, to be used as a credit on the settlement, the next day, of its exchange account with the certifying bank. If paper certified under these circumstances should be used, by the bank receiving it, as negotiable paper and passed off as such to anyone who would receive it, it is evident that the exchange system could not subsist.

All the banks concerned in the present litigation were doing business in the City of Rochester, and were parties to this system of exchanges, and had exchange accounts with each other. The plaintiff and the defendant had an exchange account with each other, and each had an exchange account with the City Bank of Rochester. On the 19th of December, 1882, a draft for $800 drawn by Wellington Bros. & Co., upon Gordon, payable at one day's sight to the order of the cashier of the City Bank of Rochester and accepted by Gordon on the 15th of December, payable at the Flour City Bank of Rochester (the plaintiff) was presented by the City Bank of Rochester to the plaintiff, it having matured on the 19th. Instead of paying it, the plaintiff, in accordance with the exchange system, marked it "Certified" and returned it to the City Bank, to be used the next day in the settlement of its exchange with the plaintiff, charging it to Gordon as having been paid.

On the same day the plaintiff held commercial paper, payable at the City Bank of Rochester, and on presenting it at that bank received its certifications, in lieu of payment, to the amount of over $1,900, which were held by the plaintiff to be charged to the City Bank on the settlement of the exchange account, leaving a balance at the close of the day's transactions in favor of the plaintiff against the City Bank of over $1,100, after crediting the $800 draft.

At the close of the same day (December 19, 1882), there was a balance due to the plaintiff from the defendant on their exchange account for the day, and on the morning of the 20th of December the items of the previous day in favor of the plaintiff in its exchange account with the defendant, amounted to $26,423.15, and were undisputed, and the defendant, in settlement of this amount, sent in to the plaintiff $21,790.59 in cash and an account of items, which it claimed in its favor, amounting to $4,632.56, but in which was included the before mentioned $800 Gordon acceptance which had been certified by the plaintiff on the 19th for the City Bank of Rochester, and which belonged in the exchange account of the plaintiff with the City Bank of Rochester.

The City Bank of Rochester had finally stopped business at the close of the business day on the 19th of December and was then insolvent and did not afterwards resume.

The plaintiff on the morning of December 20, on discovering that the Gordon acceptance was among the items of credit claimed by the defendant in its exchange account, refused to allow it, and immediately returned it to the defendant, with a statement that the plaintiff had off-sets to a much larger amount in its account with the City Bank. The defendant insisted on being credited with the Gordon acceptance, and has never paid the balance of $800 claimed by the plaintiff; and hence this action.

The trial court found that defendant had received the certified Gordon acceptance from the City Bank of Rochester on the 19th of December, 1882, under the following circumstances: although by the usual custom between the banks the exchanges were to be made on the day following the certifications, the defendant (instead of exchanging with the City Bank in the usual way) had, for a month previous to the 19th of December, 1882, required of the City Bank a settlement each day, of the balance of that day, instead of settling on the morning after. On the 19th of December, on exchanging their respective demands due on that day, there was found due from the City Bank to the defendant a balance of $8,000, and the said Gordon acceptance, certified by the plaintiff, was thereupon transferred by the City Bank to the defendant as a payment of $800 of that balance, the remainder being otherwise paid, and the defendant surrendering its demands against the City Bank in consideration of such payment and transfer.

It was further found by the trial court that prior to November 19, 1882, the exchanges between the defendant and the City Bank had been settled in accordance with the general custom among banks before stated, that is on the day after the paper became due and was certified, but that the defendant had adopted the course of requiring from the City Bank a settlement on the same day, because it was unwilling to give credit to the City Bank; that this Gordon acceptance was taken by the defendant from the City Bank, under circumstances which charged the defendant with notice that it was intended to be used in settling the exchanges between the plaintiff and the City Bank; that the intention of the plaintiff in certifying the Gordon acceptance, instead of paying it, was that it might be offset by any cash demands which the plaintiff might have against the City Bank, and that such certification carried with it notice of such intention to the defendant, and that the defendant took the said Gordon acceptance, with notice that it was diverted from the purpose for which it had been certified by the plaintiff.

On the 19th of December, and before the Gordon acceptance was passed off by the City Bank to the defendant, the City Bank had certified paper held by the plaintiff, to the amount of $1,900.

On the first trial of this action the special term held that the certification in question was not negotiable, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. This judgment was reversed at general term, and a new trial ordered. On the second trial the court at special term, conforming to the decision at general term, rendered judgment for the defendant, and that judgment was affirmed; and the plaintiff now appeals to this court.

It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff that the certification, being of an acceptance payable on time, was notice that the paper had matured and been presented for payment at maturity, and that as to all the parties to the bill the certificate was a payment which discharged them, and the paper had lost its negotiable character. On the other hand it is claimed that although all the parties to the bill were discharged, and as to them the paper had ceased to be negotiable, yet as to the Bank certifying it, the certification was equivalent to a certificate of deposit payable to bearer on demand, and as such was negotiable as against the Bank.

We do not deem it necessary to pass upon this question, because to entitle the holder of the certification to recover upon it, without regard to the equities between the certifying Bank and the party to whom the certification had been issued, it was necessary not only that it should be negotiable, but that the party claiming on the certification should have received it in good faith and without notice of those equities.

It seems to us that the defendant in this case does not, under the facts found, occupy that position. The defendant received the certification with notice that it represented an item merely in the exchange account between the City Bank of Rochester and the plaintiff, and that whether anything would be due or payable upon it would depend upon the state of the exchange account between the two Banks at the close of the day,—that it was certified for the purpose of being used in the settlement of that account. This was notice that it was intended as a mere voucher, and was not made for purposes of negotiation; and it is expressly found that the defendant took it with notice that in transferring it to them the City Bank was diverting it from the purpose for which it had been certified by the plaintiff. It matters not that the defendant did not know the actual state of the exchange account between the City Bank and the plaintiff. As matter of fact it appears from the findings that at the time the defendant received the plaintiff's certification from the City Bank it had been more than paid by certifications which had been made by that bank and were held by the plaintiff. But it is not necessary that the defendant should have had notice of that fact. It knew that there was an exchange account between the plaintiff and the City Bank and that the certification was subject to the settlement of that account on the following day, and also that in the ordinary course of business it was probable that the City Bank held paper certified by the plaintiff against which this certification was applicable.

By insisting on the City Bank settling with it on the 19th, contrary to the general custom, because it doubted the credit of the City Bank, and taking from it this certification for that purpose, it was endeavoring to cast upon the plaintiff, in case it had off-sets, the risk which it was unwilling to incur, and to subject the plaintiff to the chance of the City Bank providing other means, if required, of meeting its liabilities to the plaintiff. Whatever might have been the rights of an innocent party taking the certified draft in ignorance of the purpose for which the certification had been made, and of the right of the plaintiff to apply it on a pending account, we cannot hold, in the face of the facts found, that the defendant in taking this paper from the failing bank, under the circumstances, became a holder in good faith. It purchased what it knew to be a mere voucher for an item in an account to be settled, and necessarily took it, subject to the result of the settlement of that account.

The judgments of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and a new trial ordered; costs to abide the event.

All concur.

Peter B. AMORY, Respt.

1. The failure to inform another of the existence of a fact is not a fraud, unless there was some legal duty to make the disclosure.
2. There must be some relation of trust and confidence existing between the parties upon which to build the duty to disclose before the right to disclosure can be enforced, and no such trust can be supposed in the case of adverse parties to a contested lawsuit as to facts connected with the amount of the judgment.
3. 4. Where a judgment defendant learned during the pendency of an appeal that the judgment appealed from had been, through inadvertence of the referee, entered for too large an amount, but failed to object or to take any steps to correct the mistake, and after affirmance of such judgment paid the amount thereof under execution,—such payment must be considered as voluntary.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action to reform or modify a judgment on the ground of mistake. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Samuel J. Crooks, for appellant:

The judgment is a contract, and as such may be reformed: 1, because the mistake is plain and can be clearly made to and does appear from the allegation in the complaint; 2, it was a mutual mistake; and 3, one of fact.

It is no answer to say that the mistake could have been corrected at law; it was not apparent from the record, nor was it corrected, which is a sufficient answer; nor is it any answer to say that the mistake arose from a want of care on the plaintiff's part, or that the defendant cannot be restored to his original position.

Kingston Bank v. Eltinge, 40 N. Y. 391; Nevius v. Dunlap, 33 N.Y. 676.

The remedy sought is clearly within the equity powers of the court, and presents a state of facts showing an apparent valid judgment in toto; whereas, in fact, to a large extent, the judgment is not valid, owing to facts aliunde, that is to say, facts that can only be made to appear by evidence outside the record.

"Fraud vitiates all contracts and fraudulent proceedings, and equity as a general rule will relieve against all deeds, writings, and assurances, also against all judgments and decrees, which have been obtained by fraud and imposition.

Willard, Eq. Jur. 160.

In cases where fraud is not penal, equity has concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, as a general rule."

Dederer v. Voorhies, 81 N.Y. 153.

Mr. George E. Horne, for respondent:

The action was brought to review a judgment recovered in a court of competent jurisdiction, which had the entire subject matter in dispute before it; which judgment had never been reversed, but on the contrary, had been affirmed by all the appellate courts, and paid in full by the judgment debtor. It was an action to overhaul such a judgment, and to recover back money paid on that judgment. The ground of recovery was stated to be an alleged mistake by the court in arriving at the amount of recovery; and an excessive award by the former judgment.

No such action can be maintained. The authorities are unanimous against it, from the earliest reported cases, both in England and in this country, to the present time.

The rule is equally applicable to courts of equity, as of law.

LeGuen v. Gouverneur, 1 Johns. Cas. 437.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions herein arise upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint.

The plaintiff in his complaint alleged that prior to October 1, 1860, one Austin Packard commenced an action against him, which was duly referred, and on that date the referee reported in favor of Packard, and judgment was entered in favor of the latter for nearly $30,000.

On appeal by the defendant therein, the judgment was modified by the general term and so affirmed, and the defendant then and about December 8, 1864, appealed to the court of appeals, and the judgment was affirmed in the commission of appeals in January, 1873; that Amory, this defendant, previous to the entry of the first judgment, became the owner of the claim which Packard had been prosecuting against this plaintiff up to that time, and succeeded to the interest of Packard, and prior to the judgment of the commission of appeals he had been made the party plaintiff in such action; that such judgment was entered on or about January 3, 1873; that the judgments have all been paid through executions duly issued to enforce the same; that in or about the month of May, 1872, this plaintiff first was advised of the existence of the mistake hereinafter spoken of and of the means of verifying the same, and that such mistake did not appear from any of the records in that action and could only be shown by evidence aliunde; that the action was brought to compel an accounting by this plaintiff with Packard, and on the trial, and in making up his report, the referee made two mistakes of fact which increased the judgment against this plaintiff by the amount of more than $10,600 at the date of the report in August, 1860, and these errors of fact became a part of and entered into the judgment above spoken of, and remained forever uncorrected, and the amount thereof was fully paid to the defendant herein, with interest from date of the report; that these errors of fact were wholly attributable to the inadvertence of the referee; that, at the time of filing the report, Packard knew of these mistakes of fact made by the referee and concealed his knowledge from the referee and from the plaintiff herein, with intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiff; that this error was so concealed by Packard until May, 1872, when Packard, having quarreled with his assignee Amory, made an affidavit in proceedings in that action and therein disclosed the mistakes spoken of; that at the time of the transfer of the claim by Packard to Amory, and at the time when the latter was substituted as a party plaintiff, he well knew these mistakes of fact had been made by the referee and for the purpose of defrauding this plaintiff he has at all times concealed the same from this plaintiff; and that Packard and Amory colluded and conspired together so to do for the purpose of defrauding the said plaintiff, to the extent of these errors to the end that they might profit thereby.

The plaintiff then demanded, as relief, that the judgment, as affirmed by the commission of appeals, should be modified so that the sum of 10,000 and some odd dollars, with interest from August 16, 1860, etc., might be adjudged to have been included in said judgment by a mistake of fact, and such judgment should be declared to be erroneous to that extent; also, that this plaintiff might recover from the defendant the sum above named, etc., besides costs; and for such other or further relief as might be just.

The defendant demurred to this complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer has been sustained at the special and general terms; and from the judgment of affirmance, the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

The allegations of fraud made against Packard and defendant simply assert a failure on the part of either to inform the plaintiff of the existence of the mistake. There is no allegation that either resorted to any misrepresentations or had recourse to any artifice to prevent the disclosure to the plaintiff, or that either did anything whatever towards concealment beyond the bald and naked failure to give this information to him. If this failure were not in and of itself a fraud, it is not made so by alleging that it was induced by a desire to deceive and defraud the plaintiff. Van Weel v. Winston, 115 U. S. 228 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 384].

It was not a fraud unless there was some legal duty resting upon the defendant to make the disclosure.

It may be that in foro conscientiæ the disclosure should have been made, but unless a party has the right to this information, not only in that forum but juris et de jure, the withholding of it cannot be classed as a legal fraud. 1 Story, Eq. § 207 et seq.

I can see no such right here. There must be some relation of trust and confidence existing between the parties upon which to build the duty to disclose, before the right to a disclosure can be enforced by the courts. As has been said, it is not always easy to define when this relation of trust and confidence exists; but there is no difficulty in denying its existence here. If there even were a case where no such trust could be supposed, it is that of adverse parties to a contested lawsuit.

No additional strength is given to the allegation of fraud by stating that Packard and defendant colluded and conspired together to conceal the fact for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff. If there were no duty resting on either to disclose the fact, each had the right to agree to be silent. The agreement to be silent where each has the right so to be is not made illegal by alleging that it was done pursuant to conspiracy and collusion between the parties, without going further and showing that the concealment was but one step in carrying out a conspiracy which was unlawful, and it must be shown that it was unlawful and how, and what the steps were which were illegal or fraudulent. Mere general allegations of fraud or conspiracy are of no value as stating a cause of action. Van Weel v. Winston, supra; Cohn v. Goldman, 76 N. Y. 284; Knapp v. Brooklyn, 97 N.Y. 520.

The idea of a mutual mistake existing between the parties, it seems to us, is equally idle upon the allegations in this complaint. The mistake was wholly that of the referee, unaided and uninfluenced by either party. That there may not be relief given in some form when such a mistake exists, we are far from saying, but not upon the principles applicable to transactions between persons who, in the course of the business, make a mutual mistake of facts upon which their transaction is based; and it is clear that a mere mistake of a referee or court in its decision, could not be remedied in such an action as this.

Assuming, however, that a case of fraud or mistake, or both, were made out on this complaint, yet it is shown therein that the plaintiff had full knowledge of all the facts about the time the case was argued in the commission of appeals, and months before the decision of the case by the court, and yet from the time when he acquired such knowledge up to the time of the commencement of this action in 1876, so far as appears from the complaint, he took no step, made no protest nor claimed in any way the existence of a mistake or fraud; and in the most perfect silence he paid the executions (sometime in 1873) issued upon the judgments; and he gives no excuse for such silence or for the payment of the judgments with this knowledge, and without the least effort made to correct the mistake or to expose the fraud and escape from the payment of the money based upon its successful accomplishment.

Under these circumstances we cannot see but that this payment was substantially a voluntary payment, after knowledge of all the facts, and no cause of action could survive such a payment.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

v.
STATE of New York, Respt.

1. The State can only be sued with its own consent and for liabilities which it chooses to assume.

2. The Act of 1870, chap. 321, permits claims to be filed for damages sustained from the canals; from their use and management; or arising from a neglect of an officer in charge; or from any accident or other matter connected therewith; but does not extend to claims arising from damages resulting from the navigation of the canals.
3. The Act of 1876, chap. 444, which constituted the board of audit and gave it authority to hear "all private claims and accounts," did not in any manner change or enlarge the liability of the State.
4. The exception from the jurisdiction of that board of claims resulting from the navigation of the canals, only takes out of such jurisdiction such claims as are strictly within the terms of the exception, that is those which result from the passage of boats along and upon their waters, and does not apply to accidents or injuries befalling one not at the time engaged in navigation of the canals and which did not result from that navigation.
5. Where the master of a canal boat, on the way to his boat, in climbing up the abutment of a bridge by irons fixed therein, furnished by the State and serving as the rungs of a ladder, was injured through a loose stone falling from the wall, held, that the board of claims had jurisdiction of the claim for the damages thus sustained by the negligence of the State or that of its officers, and that the injury did not result "from the navigation of the canals."
6. The bridge being a structure built and maintained by the State to carry a highway over the canal, the proof given was sufficient to warrant the inference that the street existed for public passage when the canal was built and that the duty of maintaining the bridge had been assumed by and rested upon the State.
7. Although the berme bank of the canal where the injury happened was in no sense a public highway, yet it there served for the passage of those whose business brought them to that locality and the presence of the irons was an invitation to such persons to use them and indicated a purpose on the part of the State to permit the crossing of the bridge by such means and in such manner.

APPEAL from an award of the Board of Claims, dismissing (for want of jurisdiction) a claim for damages for injuries received through a defective bridge over the Erie Canal in the City of Syracuse. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. A. L. Johnson, for appellant:

The board of claims has jurisdiction to audit and allow the claim in question.

Section 1, chap. 321, Laws, 1870, reads as follows:

"Jurisdiction is hereby granted to and conferred upon the canal appraisers, to hear and determine all claims against the State, of any and all persons and corporations, for damages alleged to have been sustained by them from the canals of the State, or from their use and management, or resulting or arising from the negligence or conduct of any officer of the State having charge thereof, or resulting or arising from any accident or other matter or thing connected with the canals. * * * Provided, That the provisions of this Act shall not extend to claims arising from damages resulting from the navigation of the canals."

The section above quoted seems broad enough to embrace all claims for damages arising or resulting from the canals by reason of any neglect of the State or its officers having charge thereof, and should be so construed as to give effect to all its provisions.

Rosenplaenter v. Roessle, 54 N. Y. 262; Ramaley v. Leland, 43 N. Y. 539; People v. McGloin, 91 N Y. 250.

By section 2, chap. 444, Laws 1876, the jurisdiction of the canal appraisers was transferred to the state board of audit, created by that Act; and by sections 12 and 13, chap. 205, Laws 1883, amended by section 8, chap. 60, Laws 1884, the jurisdiction of the canal appraisers and of the state board of audit was transferred to the board of claims.

The evidence shows that the stone that fell upon the claimant had been loose at least a year before the accident, long enough to presume knowledge of its condition on the part of the State, and especially when the defect existed in the midst of a populous city.

Conroy v. Gale, 5 Lans. 345, 347; French v. Donaldson, 5 Lans. 293; 57 N. Y. 496; Goodfellow v. Mayor, 1 Cent. Rep. 21, 100 N. Y. 15.

The rule laid down by the modern English authorities is that "whenever it is the defendant's duty to use reasonable care to keep a bridge or other structure in repair and proper condition, as respects persons passing along a highway, and it is out of condition, and an accident happens, it is incumbent upon him to show that he used that reasonable care and diligence which he was bound to use, and that the absence of that care can be fairly presumed from the fact that there was a defect from which the accident had arisen."

And the rule as laid down in our own State is that "Where the accident is of such a nature as would not happen in the ordinary course of things, with proper care and management, the fact that it does happen affords reasonable evidence that the accident arose from the want of care."

Lyons v. Rosenthal, 11 Hun, 48; Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567; Edgerton v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 227; Hume v. Mayor, 74 N. Y. 264; Smith v. British etc. Steam Packet Co. 86 N.Y. 408; Worster v. Forty-Second Street etc. R. R. Co. 50 N. Y. 203; McCarthy v. Syracuse, 46 N.Y. 194.

Mr. D. O'Brien, Atty-Gen., for the State, respondent:

The State is not liable unless it has voluntarily assumed a liability.

Lewis v. State, 96 N. Y. 71.

The only liability ever assumed by the State for injuries growing out of the use of the canals was that assumed by virtue of the Act of 1870. The Law of 1876 did not refer to or repeal the Act of 1870.

Mark v. State, 97 N. Y. 572.

Therefore, if this injury grew out of the navigation of the canals, the State was expressly exempted from liability by the Act of 1870.

There was no negligence proved upon the part of the State, and none found by the board. The board expressly refused so to find. The board, also, expressly refused to find that there was anything in the appearance of the stone to indicate that it was dangerous. The board expressly refused to find that the stone had been loose so long that notice of its condition was to be presumed.

Upon these grounds the award may be upheld. The fact that the board gave a wrong reason for its decision, assuming that it did so, is immaterial.

Allard v. Greasert, 61 N. Y. 4; Cole v. State, 2 Cent. Rep. 884, 102 N.Y. 57.

If this injury did not grow out of and result from the navigation of the canal, then it is submitted, within the principle of Lewis v. State, supra, that it was not otherwise such an injury as the State assumed any liability for, under the Act of 1870. That statute intends only to make the State liable for injuries arising from accidents connected with and arising from the use of the canals themselves, as such, and from the negligence of the officers of the State in the use thereof, etc. The building and maintaining of bridges for the use of the traveling public, or the failure so to do, does not come within the provisions of this statute at all.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's demand against the State was dismissed by the board of claims as beyond its jurisdiction, and the correctness of that decision depends upon the meaning and construction of section 1 of the Act of 1870. The State can only be sued by its own consent and for liabilities which it chooses to assume; People v. Dennison, 84 N.Y. 281; and this has been expressly held where the cause of action alleged rested upon some misfeasance or nonfeasance. Lewis v. State, 96 N. Y. 71.

We are referred to no statute which permits a claim to be filed for such an injury as the claimant has suffered, except the Act of 1870, chap. 321. The later Act of 1876, chap. 444, which constituted the board of audit and gave it authority to hear all private claims and accounts, did not in any manner change or enlarge the liability of the State; and whoever presents a claim against it must show some statute which involves the consent of the State to be answerable before its own tribunals for such claims or those of a class to which it belongs.

The general language of the Act of 1870 is broad enough to cover the present case. It permits claims to be filed for damages sustained from the canals; from their use and management; or arising from the neglect of an officer in charge; or from any accident or other matter connected therewith. It ends, however, with a proviso that the provisions of the Act shall not extend "to claims arising from damages resulting from the navigation of the canals," and the case before us has been adjudged to be one of that character.

The claimant reached Syracuse upon a canal boat which he was navigating, at which place he stopped to discharge some portion of his freight. Having done so he went to the collector's office to obtain a clearance, his boat meantime going on in charge of others than himself. When the clearance was obtained he started along upon the berme bank of the canal to rejoin his boat. His route brought him to the abutment of the Warren Street bridge, which stood close to the water and could only be passed by one following the bank of the canal by climbing up one side and descending the other. To enable this to be done the State had provided irons fastened to the stones of the abutment and serving as rungs of a ladder. The claimant began his ascent, passing upward from one iron to another and reaching the upper iron took hold of it with his hands, but the stone to which it was attached had been insecurely fastened and become loose, and fell out of the wall under his grasp, throwing him to the ground and injuring him quite severely. For the damages thus sustained he filed a claim against the State for its negligence or that of its officers in charge.

The bridge was a structure built and maintained by the State to carry a highway over the canal. The proof is sufficient to warrant an inference that the street existed for public passage when the canal was built, and that the duty of maintaining the bridge had been assumed by and rested upon the State. While the berme bank of the canal was in no sense a public highway, yet at the point in question it served for the passage of those whose business properly brought them to that locality. The presence of the irons was itself an invitation to persons rightfully passing to use them, and indicated a purpose on the part of the State to permit the crossing of the bridge by such means and in such manner. The claimant was not a trespasser. He was rightfully upon the berme bank of the canal and, in virtue of his business and occupation, at liberty to pass along it and cross the abutment in his path. The defective stone had been loose for at least a year, and long enough for an inference that the defect had come to the knowledge of the State or its officers in charge of the canals. The Act of 1870, therefore, covered the injury sustained, unless the board of claims was right in deciding that it resulted from the navigation of the canals.

The liability assumed by the State was general; the exception special. The State could exclude what it pleased from the scope of its broad consent and could choose its own language for its own protection. Its exception therefore should take out from the broad general consent only what is strictly within its terms. The damages excluded must result from the navigation of the canals, that is from the passage of boats along and upon their waters. Damages might result from the careless management of locks, or their imperfect maintenance or construction, to the teams drawing the boats or those in charge of them, from collisions due to overcrowding or insufficient room; from sudden breaks chargeable upon unskillful or careless construction. Numerous cases of this general character were naturally to be apprehended and were intended to be excluded; and the language used in the proviso was appropriate and effective for that purpose. But it can have no just application to accidents or injuries befalling one not at the time engaged in navigation of the canals and which did not result from that navigation. The claimant for the time had abandoned his boat. Somebody else was navigating it. The former intended to resume its navigation and was walking along the bank with that view; but until he reached and rejoined his boat he would not be actually engaged in its navigation. It is quite true that in a certain broad and general sense he might be said to have been engaged in the business or occupation of navigating the canals when the injury occurred; but he was none the less away from his boat, traveling upon the land for no purpose essential to the movement of his boat upon the water, and his injury did not result from and was not occasioned by the navigation of that boat. The language used contemplates a case in which the act of navigation is one of the concurring causes of the injury so that the latter can be deemed a result.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the board of claims construed the proviso too broadly, and that its terms do not exclude the claimant's injury.

The award should be reversed, and the case remitted for a new hearing.

All concur, except Peckham, J., dissenting.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, reversing a judgment of the Kings Special Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action for an accounting and to recover possession of certain real property. Reversed.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Esek Cowen and E. Sprout, for appellants:

"Where an express trust is created, every estate and interest not embraced in the trust and not otherwise disposed of, shall remain in and revert to the person creating the trust or his heirs as a legal trust."

2 R. S. 6th ed. p. 1110, § 75.

As the trust created was for the life of Harriet Newman, and terminated June 14, 1882, the following statute applies: "Where the purposes for which an express trust shall have been created shall cease, the estate of the trustee shall also cease; and the estate conveyed to the trustee or trustees and not granted or conveyed by him or them, shall revert to the grantor or grantors, his or their heirs, and to the same effect as though such trust estate had not been created."

2 R. S. 6th ed. p. 1110, § 80.

The general term, like the court of appeals, does not reverse a judgment rendered by a referee or judge without a jury, for a mere omission to find a fact, as to which no request is made by the defeated party.

Prior to the adoption of the present Code of Civil Procedure, the remedy both before and since the former Code was by motion to the court for an order directing the referee to pass upon such omitted fact, and not by appeal from the judgment.

Curtis v. Staring, 4 Wend. 199; Cafferty v. Keeler, 12 Wend. 291; Stafford v. Bacon, 6 Hill, 264; Church v. Erben, 4 Sandf. 691; Renouil v. Harris, 2 Sandf. 641; Van Steenbergh v. Hoffman, 6 How. Pr. 492; Hulce v. Sherman, 18 How. Pr. 411; Heroy v. Kerr, 8 Bosw. 194; Anderson v. West, 6 Jones & S. 441.

That this was the true practice was conclusively settled by this court in Van Slyke v. Hyatt, 46 N. Y. 259.

Since the adoption of the present Code the parties must request the judge or referee before the decision to find such facts as they deem material.

If the trial court, as in this case, omits to find a fact, proved by undisputed evidence, the presumption is that such fact is considered to be immaterial. Whether or not it is material is not a question of fact, but of law; and the proper and only way to raise the point is by request to find, and an exception to the refusal.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The proof in the case is wholly documentary, and the only question arising thereon is whether, upon a proper construction of the several instruments read in evidence, Franklin Newman retained a reversionary interest in the property thereby transferred, after the trust purposes for which he had conveyed it were satisfied. Perhaps a more accurate statement of the question presented would be whether certain real estate once conveyed by him to a trustee for specific purposes was exempted from the limitations and conditions of the trust by a subsequent deed and agreement between the same parties.

The case shows that prior to the year 1864 Newman and his wife lived unhappily together, and were desirous of making an arrangement by which they could live separately. They were the parents of four children, who it was thought desirable should reside with and be supported by the mother. Newman had theretofore given to his wife $9,000, and, being willing to provide more largely for her support, on the 7th day of December, 1864, entered into a tripartite agreement with his wife and one John D. Neefus, as trustee, whereby he conveyed to said Neefus and his successors and assigns, thirteen and one half lots of land in the City of Brooklyn, to be held and used by such trustee for the following purposes and conditions, viz.: to sell and convey the same and invest the proceeds in bonds of the United States or of the State of New York, and pay the income thereof to Harriet Newman during her natural life for her support and that of her four children.

This deed and agreement was duly recorded in the register's office of King's County, December 9, 1864. Within a year thereafter the parties, having determined that the peace and happiness of Newman and his wife and of their children would be promoted by an absolute divorce, on April 8, 1865, entered into another agreement between each other and with Neefus, for the purpose of promoting such divorce. In this agreement it was recited that Newman desired to make still further provision for his wife and children than was made in the previous trust deed, and for that purpose (upon condition that said Harriet should faithfully perform the covenants therein contained) agreed "to quitclaim to said Neefus all his right, title and interest to and in the certain thirteen and a half lots previously conveyed to said Neefus." He also agreed upon the same condition to give to Neefus for the use of said Harriet a bill of sale of certain furniture, to pay certain bills for board of the children, to pay Neefus $300 a year for the support and education of each of two of Newman's children until they should respectively become of age, to execute and deliver his own bond for $2,000, with collateral security, for the payment of such allowances.

It is provided that "Said quitclaim deed, also said bond with collateral, and the bill of sale, all to be put in escrow (said Neefus the party) to be delivered when said Harriet faithfully performs all her covenants hereinafter contained, but to be returned to said Newman if not so performed." Certain covenants are then made by Harriet that she will facilitate the proceedings for a divorce, by all means in her power; that out of the provisions heretofore and herein made she will support herself and her children, and that neither by herself nor the children will she run up bills or incur debts in Newman's name.

It was further provided that in case Harriet should fail to perform her several covenants, the agreement should be declared null and void, and Neefus should deliver back to Newman the quitclaim deed, bond and collateral, and bill of sale; but in case Harriet performed her covenants to faciliate such divorce, then said papers delivered to Neefus in escrow "shall become operative and in full force and effect."

It is then further provided that "The furniture taken, together with the several valuable properties heretofore conveyed to said Harriet, or caused to be conveyed, or in trust for her and children's benefit, shall be and hereby is taken in full satisfaction and bar of and to all or any claims whatsoever on said Newman, whether for her said Harriet's own or children's account."

A quitclaim deed, dated April 17, 1865, from Newman to Neefus and to his heirs and assigns of the thirteen and one half lots of land, was also put in evidence. This deed was duly recorded in the clerk's office of Kings County, on April 18, 1865.

The next instrument, in chronological order, put in evidence was a warranty deed, dated April 18, 1868, from Mary Jarvis and David R. Jarvis, her husband, of a house and lot on Jefferson Street, Brooklyn, to "John D. Neefus, as trustee by and under a deed of trust from Franklin and Harriet Newman," for the consideration of $6,500.

Next follows an agreement made on January 18, 1872, between Franklin Newman of the first part, Harriet Newman of the second part, John D. Neefus of the third part, and Franklin Newman, Jr., of the fourth part. This agreement embraces the following recitals: "Whereas, by a certain deed of trust made between the parties hereto of the first, second and third parts, bearing date the 7th day of December, 1864,  the said party of the third part received certain real and personal property in trust for certain purposes therein mentioned; and whereas, such property so received in trust by said party has been sold and the proceeds thereof have all been invested in a house and lot in Jefferson Street, near Ormond Place in the said City of Brooklyn, and in four United States 6 per cent bonds of $1,000 each; and whereas, at the request of the said parties of the first and second parts, and with the consent of the said parties of the third and fourth parts, the said party of the fourth part is to be substituted as trustee in the place and stead of the said party of the third part subject to all the covenants and conditions in said trust deed contained; and whereas, the said party of the third part has conveyed to said party of the fourth part, by deed bearing even date herewith, the house and lot in Jefferson Street, and has also simultaneously with the execution hereof, delivered to said party of the fourth part the said four United States bonds for $1,000 each, being all the property, money or proceeds in the hands or possession of said party of the third part under and pursuant to said deed of trust;"—in consideration of the premises it was then provided that the parties of the first and second part should release and discharge the party of the third part from all claims and demands whatsoever. The party of the third part did thereby also in consideration of the premises "transfer, assign and set over to said party of the fourth part, the said Jefferson Street house and United States bonds and all and every right, claim or demand which he may or shall have for or by reason of said deed or trust; and the said party of the fourth part, in consideration of the conveyance to him of the said house and lot and of the delivery of said bonds, did "consent and agree to take said house and lot and bonds, and hold the same as trustee, pursuant to the covenants and conditions in said trust deed contained, in the place and stead of the said party of the third part."

On the same day "John D. Neefus individually and as trustee, by and under a deed of trust from Franklin and Harriet Newman," and Mary Ann, his wife, conveyed by quitclaim deed all of the estate, right, title and interest, both in law and equity, of, in or to the house and lot on Jefferson Street to "Franklin Newman, Jr., as trustee in place and stead of said John D. Neefus, under said deed of trust" and to his successors and assigns forever.

From this time forward it would seem that Franklin Newman, Jr., acted as trustee under the original trust deed, until the death of Harriet Newman, which occurred in July, 1882.

Harriet Newman left a will by which she demised all of her property to her daughter Mary and her son Franklin, and appointed her son Franklin sole executor of her will. On December 9, 1882, Franklin Newman, claiming to be the reversionary owner of the property held by Franklin Newman, Jr., conveyed it to the plaintiffs; and this action was brought by them to recover possession of the same.

The effect of the deed and trust agreement of December, 1864, was to create a valid power in trust to convert the land into money and invest the proceeds in securities in which Harriet Newman was to have a life estate only. Belmont v. O'Brien, 12 N. Y. 395.

The reversionary interest in the land, not having been conveyed by such instrument, remained in the creator of the trust, and upon the death of Harriet Newman reverted to him under the provisions of the statute. 3 R. S. 7th ed. p. 2182, § 62.

It is also quite clear that the limitations and conditions of the attempted trust followed the property into which the estate was converted, and that it became subject to the same rules of reversion which pertained to that originally conveyed. Belmont v. O'Brien, supra.

These propositions were assumed to be correct by both the general and special terms in their consideration of the case, and may be regarded as conclusively settled.

It was, however, held by the general term that Franklin Newman by the execution and delivery of the quitclaim deed of April 17, 1865, transferred to Neefus his reversionary interest in the trust fund, and that it then became vested absolutely in Neefus, and still remains in him or the trustee, Franklin Newman, Jr., who was substituted in his place. The defendants' answer alleges impliedly, if not directly, that this reversionary estate was held by the trustee for the benefit of Harriet Newman, and upon her death descended or was distributable to her three children and the issue of the fourth who had died. This contention is hardly sustainable in view of the fact that Harriet Newman left her property, by will, exclusively to two of said children; and any reversion to which she was entitled is apparently controlled by its provisions.

This result is claimed to be produced by the provisions of the agreement of April 8, 1865, which, it is argued, created a trust in the reversionary estate for the benefit of Harriet Newman.

We are of the opinion that no trust was created by that agreement, and that under it Neefus acquired a mortgage interest only, which became satisfied in 1871 by the performance of the obligation and the arrival of Franklin and Mary at maturity and the termination of the period for paying annuities for their support.

The case was considered at the general term, upon the theory that its determination depended solely upon the effect to be ascribed to the quitclaim deed, unaffected by the cotemporaneous agreement, and as thus viewed might afford some reason for doubt as to its true solution.

A careful consideration of the provisions of that agreement, however, leads to the conviction that there was no intention on the part of Newman, or his wife, to vest any personal interest in the property in Neefus. It was conveyed to him indeed, but it was conveyed for a purpose which it is the duty of the court to discover and enforce, if consistent with the rules of law. This purpose is clearly disclosed by an examination of the provisions of the agreement. Among other things it appears therefrom that the sole consideration for the deed was furnished by Harriet Newman, and its object was declared to be "to make still further provision for said wife and four children." It was also provided that Neefus should reconvey the property to Newman in case the said Harriet "should fail to comply or perform in good faith her part of the covenants herein contained," and finally it was declared, that "said quitclaim deed, also said bond with collateral and the bill of sale, all to be in escrow (said Neefus the party) to be delivered when said Harriet faithfully performs all her covenants hereinafter contained."

The delivery here spoken of was a delivery to Neefus, to take the place of the conditional delivery there made, because it obviously was not intended that Harriet Newman was to take Franklin Newman's bond, or the judgment assigned as collateral thereto, or the bill of sale of the furniture transferred "for her use," which are therein spoken of in connection with the quitclaim deed.

The idea that the property was to be conveyed to Newman if Harriet failed to perform her contract is inconsistent with the theory of any personal interest in Neefus, while it was essential to the performance of his trust, as well as the enforcement of the security, that he should have the title of the property with the power of converting it. On the other hand, if the reversion had been intended to be given to Neefus in trust for Harriet Newman, the legal estate would have vested immediately in her by force of the forty-ninth section of the statute, and the life estate and reversion uniting in the same person the former would have merged in the latter, thus destroying the trust. That this was not intended is shown by the repeated declarations of the parties as to the continued existence of the trust of 1864. It matters not whether the provisions of the agreement were all valid or not, for when the object of the inquiry is to ascertain the interest of the parties in making a contract, their meaning is as much revealed by the expression of invalid as of valid provisions, and the court will avail itself of every lawful means and ascertain and give effect to the intention of the parties, if not contrary to the law.

It seems quite clear therefore that the object of the deed was simply to furnish additional security to Harriet Newman that Franklin Newman should promptly make the additional payments of income which he became liable to pay by the agreement.

It certainly was not intended that Neefus should take the reversionary interest for himself, and there is no color of a provision in the agreement by which Harriet Newman was entitled to take it. Neefus received the property in question simply as a security for the performance of Newman's agreement, to be returned to Newman when the object of the transfer had been satisfied. The practical construction given to this conveyance and agreement, by the subsequent dealings and conduct of the parties and the various contracts executed between them, is quite controlling as to their real intention in making it.

The thirteen and one half lots were converted into money, amounting presumably to about $9,000. Of this sum $6,500 was invested in the house and lot on Jefferson Street, the title to which was taken to Neefus as trustee under the trust deed of 1864, and the balance in 4 per cent United States bonds. By the agreement of January 18, 1872, it was recited that the properties were held by Neefus as trust property under the trust deed of 1864, and he thereby agreed to convey them to Franklin Newman, Jr., as substituted trustee, subject to the conditions and limitations of the said trust; and the said Franklin Newman, Jr., received them solely as trustee under such instrument. The quitclaim deed from Neefus to Franklin Newman, Jr., conveys all of the interest in the property held by Neefus, either individually or as trustee, to the grantee therein named as trustee under such trust deed.

Whatever effect, therefore, may be ascribed to the deed of April 8, 1865, all of the interest thereby conveyed was reconveyed to Franklin Newman, Jr., and by the agreement of January 18, 1872, executed by all of the parties having an interest in the subject and which was recorded in the register's office of King's County January 19, 1872, the trust was redeclared and the entire proceeds of the whole property were reconstituted a trust fund, subject to the limitations and conditions of the deed and contract of December 9, 1864.

It follows that upon the death of Harriet Newman the corpus of the trust estate reverted to Franklin Newman and passed to the plaintiffs, under the conveyance from him to them.

Other questions made in the case become immaterial in the view which we have taken of the questions raised.

The order of the General Term should be reversed and the judgment of the Special Term affirmed, with costs to the plaintiffs in the court below and in this court.

All concur.

v.
Francis B. BALDWIN, County Treasurer of Queens Co., Respt.

Chapter 226, Laws of 1878, did not authorize the Treasurer of Queens County to collect from the trust funds in his custody the fees allowed upon sales of lands to the several towns in the county for unpaid taxes, without the audit of the town board; and such action on his part being illegal, an action for the prevention thereof was maintainable by a taxpayer, under chapter 531, Laws of 1881.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Queens Circuit dismissing the complaint in an action to restrain the alleged illegal official act of a county treasurer. Reversed.

Reported below, 35 Hun, 334.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Francis M. Scott, for appellant:

The plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action.

Chapter 571 of the Laws of 1881 authorizes action by taxpayers against officers of counties, towns and municipal corporations, to prevent illegal official acts on the part of such officers.

Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222.

The County Treasurer's fees and expenses of advertising on lots struck off to the town are town charges in the sense in which those words are used in the Revised Statutes.

1 R. S. *p. 358; People v. Haws, 34 Barb. 69; Brady v. Supervisors, 2 Sandf. 460; Bright v. Supervisors of Chenango Co. 18 Johns. 242.

If the County Treasurer's claim for fees and expenses is a town charge, it must be audited by some competent body before it can be lawfully collected.

Laws 1840, chap. 305, § 1; Bell v. Town of Esopus, 49 Barb. 506 and cases cited; People, Thurston, v. Town Auditors of Elmira, 20 Hun, 150, affirmed in 82 N. Y. 80; People, Bentley, v. Whalen, 15 N. Y. Week. Dig. 410.

The board of the town auditors is the only body having authority and jurisdiction to audit the County Treasurer's claim against the town for fees and expenses.

1 R. S. p. 367, part 1, chap. XII, title 2, § 4, paraphrased from chap. 49, Laws 1813, § 2; R. S. part 1, chap. XI, title 4, art. 5, § 46, compiled from 2 Rev. Laws, 280, § 31; 1 Rev. Laws, 290, chap. 78, Laws 1813, § 28; 2 Rev. Laws, 138, chap. 49, Laws 1813, § 2; chap. 305, Laws 1840, Potter, Dwar. Stat. p. 156; Wood v. Wellington, 30 N. Y. 218; Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 497; Columbian Mfg. Co. v. Vanderpoel, 4 Cow. 556; Livingston v. Harris, 11 Wend. 329; Dexter & Limerick Plank Road Co. v. Allen, 16 Barb. 15–18; Daviess v. Fairbairn, 3 How. 636 (44 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 760).

Even the board of supervisors had jurisdiction to audit town accounts; the mere submission to that board at its annual meeting of all accounts of the County Treasurer would not constitute a sufficient audit of the Treasurer's claim against the town.

Laws 1845, chap. 180, § 24, as amended by Laws 1847, chap. 490, § 2.

Mr. H. E. Sickels, for respondent:

The plaintiff is not authorized to maintain this action.

Section 1925 of the Code provides for the cases in which a taxpayer may bring an action such as this, viz.: where the action is to obtain a judgment preventing waste or injury to the estate, funds or other property of the county, city or town.

There is no waste or injury alleged in the complaint for which the plaintiff is entitled to any judgment.

By the terms of the Act the defendant is obliged to publish the list returned by the town receiver with the description "as contained in the assessment roll of the town."

Laws 1878, chap. 226, § 1.

In the case of Thompson v. Burhans, 61 N. Y. 62, it was held that the comptroller must sell by lots and description as sent to him and as assessed.

The validity of the assessment cannot be determined in this action; it can only be done in a direct and appropriate proceeding for that purpose.

Swift v. Poughkeepsie, 37 N. Y. 511; Western R. R. Co. v. Nolan, 48 N. Y. 513; Susquehanna Bank v. Supervisors, 25 N. Y. 312.

The Act is imperative, in regard to lots struck down to the town.

"On the day fixed for said sale, should no bids be made for any of the lots or parcels that may be offered for sale, the County Treasurer shall strike off such lots or parcels to the town in which such lands are located and assessed, for the term of one thousand years."

Laws 1878, chap. 326, § 4.

The same section also provides that the County Treasurer's fees and expenses of publication for "all lots or parcels struck off to any town shall be a charge against such town."

Section 5 of the same Act declares that "in case of sale the Treasurer may charge and receive for each lot and parcel separately assessed and sold, the sum of $1.50, besides the sum paid for publication."

By the terms of the Act, the town is bound to pay to the Treasurer the sum allowed by law, for the lots and parcels of land sold by him to the town.

By the decision of the court of appeals in People, Canajoharie Nat. Bank, v. Supervisors, 67 N. Y. 109, it would seem that the Acts of 1872, 1879 and 1880, as to suits by taxpayers, are unrepealed.

The Act of 1881, chap. 531, does not alter the provisions of the Code as "to waste" or "injury" but allows the action to be maintained in order "to prevent any alleged illegal official act."

There is nothing alleged here that is illegal; in fact everything done by the Treasurer is in strict accord with the statute.

The County Treasurer is entitled to charge and receive the fees allowed him, whenever and as soon as he performs the duty for the performance of which he is allowed compensation.

People, Weekes, v. Baldwin, 19 Hun, 308.

Independently of this consideration, the spirit and intent of the Act shows that the Treasurer is entitled to his compensation at once.

Laws 1878, chap. 229, § 2; Act 1878, § 4; 1 R. S. 3d ed. § 141, p. 892; § 2, subd. 3, p. 861.

In view of the fact that the law, under which the Treasurer is proceeding, says that for all lots sold he is entitled "to charge and receive" certain fees and expenses, which are fixed by the statute, there is nothing left for the board. They have no power to alter or change the same.

People, Downing, v. Stout, 23 Barb. 338; Morris v. People, 3 Denio, 381.

There is a clear and specific method prescribed for the adjustment of the Treasurer's accounts; the case is not within the provision of the Code or the Act of 1881, as to suits by taxpayers.

Lutes v. Briggs, 64 N. Y. 404.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Act of 1878, chap. 531, expressly authorizes a taxpayer to maintain an action for the prevention and restraint of "any illegal official act" on the part of the officers of any county, town, or municipal corporation; and if the intended and threatened act of the defendant as County Treasurer is illegal, the plaintiff is entitled to sue and to prevent the meditated violation of law, irrespective of the consequences of such violation. The statute assumes that any illegal official act is or may be injurious to the corporation when done by its servant, and allows him to be restrained simply because of the illegality.

The complaint here is that the County Treasurer has been in the habit of paying himself out of the trust funds in his possession the fees allowed by law upon sales of land for unpaid taxes, without previous audit of his claim, and alone determining the amount of the debt due from himself as trustee to himself as officer. He stands here upon his right, not denying his past habit or future purpose, but insisting that his conduct is not illegal, and so his action should not be restrained.

The sale of lands for unpaid taxes in the County of Queens is the subject of a special statute. Laws 1877, chap. 268; Laws 1878, chap. 226.

Under its provisions the receivers and collectors of taxes are required to report to the county treasurer all such taxes; the latter is directed to examine the list, and, having rejected therefrom such as cannot be lawfully enforced by reason of imperfect description or otherwise, to advertise them for sale. Pending the notice, owners or parties in interest may pay the taxes with charges and expenses; and the lands thus freed from liability must be withdrawn from the proceedings. The balance are to be sold by the treasurer at public auction for the shortest term of years for which any person will take the premises and pay the taxes with percentage, interest and expenses. In case no bids are made the Treasurer is commanded to strike off the land to the town in which it lies for a term of one thousand years, and in all cases of sales is to execute and deliver the proper leases.

The Act allows the county treasurer as fees for his service $1 for every lot or parcel assessed which has been released by payment before sale; in case of sale $1.50 for each separate lot and parcel assessed and sold; where a lease is given, $1 to be paid by the person receiving it; and for making and certifying a search $3.

There is no difficulty and no dispute about these fees when actually paid by purchasers other than the town. Such fees belong to the treasurer and may be received by him and appropriated to his own use. They never become town or county funds or a part of the trust money in the officer's hands. But the situation is quite different where he strikes off the land to a town. In that event no money is paid or received, and the taxes and fees become purely matters of account. The statute provides that in such case the fees and expenses of publication shall be a charge against said town. They become a debt due to the treasurer, and are (when earned and expended) a claim in his favor against the town. Until it pays the charge the fees and expenses do not come to him as such or become his money. If he takes their amount from the trust funds in his custody without audit or direction, he simply collects his own debt against the town out of moneys already devoted to other specific purposes, and fixes for himself the amount of the debt which he assumes to collect. The statute provides that all claims against the town must be audited by the town board (Laws 1840, chap. 305), and for that purpose must be presented in items and verified by the oath of the creditor. Laws 1847, chap. 490, § 2.

The officer repudiates the need of this audit. But the Act is broad and general, and admits of no exception unless as the product of some special legislation. Such exception cannot fairly be reasoned out of the Act of 1878. Its permission that the treasurer may charge and receive the fees allowed implies that somebody is to pay and is satisfied by an application to the cases in which the fees are paid as such. It is said there is no need of an audit because the amount is fixed. But the number of sales may be incorrectly asserted or the expenses unduly increased, and the auditing board has a right to be satisfied that the fees claimed have all been earned.

It is suggested that the treasurer must collect his fees at once in order to correctly perform his duties, since on a sale he must make a certificate stating the amount of tax with interest and expenses added, so that one coming to redeem may know what to pay; and since the town may assign its certificate for the amount of bid, expenses and treasurer's fees with 12 per cent interest from the date of sale. In each case the fees of the treasurer are fixed, although he is not paid, and his duty is easily and may be correctly performed. Whether the town assigns or does not is its own concern, and does not affect its liability to the treasurer for the fees that he has earned. It is added that his accounts are annually subjected to the examination of the board of supervisors; but when they are, his voucher for a claim against the town should be the audit of its board.

The Act of 1884 (chap. 484), now specifically requires such audit and makes certain for the future what was disputed in the past. It is easy to see the evils which might result from a contrary rule, and we deem it our duty to hold that the Act of 1878 did not authorize the Treasurer to collect from the trust funds the fees in question without the audit of the town board.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

All concur.

COMMISSIONERS of Department of Fire and Buildings OF City of BROOKLYN, Respts.

1. Where a writ of certiorari was issued, directed to the commissioners of a department of a city, reciting that A, a duly appointed and acting detailed fireman of such department was, on a day named, removed from such position by such commissioners and commanding them to make return to the writ, and the affidavit states that he was removed without cause; and the commissioners return thereto only their resolution that A, "inspector of kerosene oil, be dismissed," such return is an admission that while A occupied the position of a detailed fireman in the department, he was summarily dismissed by such resolution.
2. Under section 2138 of the Code, where the return to a writ of certiorari meets all the allegations of fact contained in the writ and the papers on which it was granted and traverses them, then the hearing must be confined to the facts stated in the return.
3. But where the return admits the facts stated in the writ or the papers on which it was granted, or is silent as to them, then such facts become important, and must be considered and have effect upon the hearing.
4. Before any conviction can be had under section 14 of the Brooklyn Charter Act, the member of the department proceeded against is entitled to notice of the charge made against him, and to a hearing and trial; he cannot be arbitrarily dismissed without a charge, hearing or trial.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of the Kings Special Term in favor of respondents in a certiorari to review the action of the Commissioners of the Department of Fire and Buildings in the City of Brooklyn, in dismissing plaintiff from the office of kerosene inspector. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Edward F. O'Dwyer, for appellants: The appointment of the relator became a vested right, of which he could only be deprived (devested) upon charges, trial and conviction; and the right to such charge, trial and conviction is provided for by section 14 of title 13, chapter 863, Laws 1873, and is a substantial one, capable of execution, and cannot be disregarded.

People, Munday, v. Fire Comrs. 72 N. Y. 445.

Section 14 implied judicial powers; and the word "conviction" implied a trial with sworn testimony and legal proof.

People, Folk, v. Board of Police, 69 N. Y. 408; People, Smith, v. Fire Comrs. 4 Cent. Rep. 774, 103 N. Y. 370.

Relator, being a detailed fireman, was a member of the Department.

Pennie v. Brooklyn, 97 N. Y. 654; People, Smith, v. Fire Comrs. supra.

It was his duty to render such services as the Commissioners should direct him to perform.

It certainly cannot be contended that. having been appointed a member ot the department and detailed as an inspector of kerosene oil, in obeying the directions of his superior officers, relator ceased thereby to be a member of the department. If he had refused to act as an inspector of kerosene oil as directed, he could have been dismissed for disobedience of orders.

People v. Comrs. 27 Hun, 615.

Mr. Almet F. Jenks, for respondents:

There was no provision of law at the time of the removal of the relator which prohibited the dismissal of any member of the department of fire and buildings, whatever his position.

Section 14 of title XIII, chap. 863, Laws of 1873, on which admittedly the appellants wholly rely, is a punitive statute. To preserve discipline a trial is provided for, and certain punishments prescribed which may be meted out.

Does it follow that because a punitive statute provides dismissal as one of the punishments which may follow conviction for certain offenses, such provision amounts to giving a life tenure to those firemen who have not been convicted and punished by dismissal?

Because dismissal is named as a punishment, for certain offenses, does that in terms deprive the appointing board of the general power to remove? The power to appoint implies the power to remove.

People, Sims, v. Fire Comrs. of N. Y. 73 N.Y. 439.

Section 14 has not been changed or altered. The relator's inferential argument that this section prohibited removal, except on trial, is squarely met by the positive provision that they may be removed by said Commissioners. This I think is conclusive as to the contention that section 14 merely provided removal as one of the punishments that might be inflicted after conviction, and nothing more.

Laws 1873, §§ 9, 14, chap. 580; Laws 1874, § 20, chap. 337; Laws 1880, § 7.

The petitioner presented to the supreme court a verified petition in which he represented that he was, and had been for a long time a member of the Department of Fire and Buildings of the City of Brooklyn; that on the 15th day of September, 1879, he was a duly appointed and acting detailed fireman of that Department, having been appointed by the Commissioners of that Department; that on that day the Commissioners, irregularly, illegally, and without authority or jurisdiction, and without cause, removed him from his position; and he prayed for a writ of certiorari, directed tô the Commissioners, commanding them to certify and return to the court all proceedings had before them in reference to his removal.

Thereupon a writ of certiorari was granted, directed to such Commissioners reciting that Isaac W. Peck, a duly appointed and acting detailed fireman of the Department of Fire and Buildings of the City of Brooklyn was, on the 15th day of September, 1879, removed by the Commissioners of that Department from such position, and commanding them to make return to the writ. In obedience to that writ the Commissioners returned, simply, that at a meeting of the Board of Commissioners, held September 15, 1879, they adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, that Isaac W. Peck, inspector of kerosene oil, be dismissed."

The return did not deny that Peck, at the time of his dismissal, was a member of the Department of Fire and Buildings of the City of Brooklyn, or that he had been duly appointed and was then acting as a detailed fireman of that department as alleged in his affidavit. Neither did it deny the allegation in the writ that he was a duly appointed and acting detailed fireman of the department. It did not allege that Peck was appointed inspector of kerosene oil, or that that was the official position which he occupied in the department. Consistently with the facts alleged in the affidavit and the writ, he was a fireman, detailed at the time of his dismissal as an inspector of kerosene oil. Indeed, nothing is returned, except the fact of Peck's dismissal.

The return therefore is a plain, unambiguous admission that while Peck occupied the position of detailed fireman in the Department of Fire and Buildings of the City of Brooklyn he was summarily dismissed by the resolution returned.

The practice prior to the adoption of the present Code required that the hearing upon the return to a writ of certiorari, should be solely upon the return. People, Sims, v. Fire Comrs. 73 N. Y. 437.

But by section 2138 of the present Code it is now required that the hearing upon the return to a writ of certiorari must be had "upon the writ and return and the papers upon which the writ was granted." Under this section where the return meets all the allegations of fact contained in the writ and the papers upon which it was granted and traverses them, then the hearing must be confined to the facts stated in the return. But where the return admits the facts stated in the writ or the papers upon which it was granted, or is silent as to them, then such facts become important, and must be considered and have effect upon the hearing. People, McCarthy, v. French, 25 Hun, 111.

Therefore, looking at these papers, the affidavit, writ and return, it appears that, without any trial or hearing, the Commissioners summarily dismissed the relator from his position as a detailed fireman and member of the Department of Fire and Buildings of the City of Brooklyn. The case, therefore, as it appears in the record, is precisely like that of People, Smith, v. Fire Comrs. 4 Cent. Rep. 774, 103 N. Y. 370, and upon that authority this appeal must prevail.

Since writing the above, the learned counsel for the respondents has submitted an additional brief, in which he makes for the first time the point that "There was no provision of law, at the time of the removal of the relator, which prohibited the dismissal of any member of the Department of Fire and Buildings, whatever his position;" and he claims that the point was not decided in the case of People, Smith, v. Commissioners, because it was not there made, and that it was there assumed after convictions. We think it clear that the point is not well taken.

The Brooklyn Charter Act, chapter 863 of the Laws of 1873, title 13, section 14, provides as follows: "It shall be the duty of said Commissioners to make suitable regulations under which the officers and men of the department shall be required to wear an appropriate uniform and badges, by which, in case of fire and at other times, the authority and relation of such officers and men may be known; and the Commissioners shall have power, in their discretion, on conviction of a member of the department for any legal offense, or neglect of duty, or violation of rules, or neglect or disobedience of orders, or incapacity, or absence without leave, or any conduct injurious to the public peace or welfare, or immoral conduct, or other breach of discipline, to punish the offending party by reprimand, forfeiting or witholding pay for a specified time, or dismissal from the department; but no more than ten days' pay shall be forfeited and withheld for any offense."

This section standing alone specifies the cases in which and the causes for which dismissals may be made; and the plain implication is that they cannot be made in any other cases, or for any other causes. The Latin phrase Expressio unius exclusio alterius furnishes the rule of construction which must be applied. By well settled rules, applicable to such cases, before there can be any conviction under this section the member proceeded against is entitled to notice of the charge made against him and to a hearing and trial. It would, therefore, be quite absurd to hold that a worthy and competent member of the department who was guilty of no offense or delinquency of any kind, could be arbitrarily dismissed without a charge, hearing or trial, but that a member guilty of some of the offenses or delinquencies mentioned could be dismissed only after a trial and conviction.

But it is claimed that section 9 of the same title throws some light upon the meaning of section 14, and that section as originally enacted in 1873, was as follows: "The said Commissioners shall have power to select a secretary, chief and assistant engineers, and as many officers, clerks, firemen, engineers, drivers, inspectors and bell ringers as may be declared necessary by the common council; and the same shall at all times be under the control of said Commissioners, and perform such duties as may be imposed upon them by the said Commissioners, and may be removed by said Commissioners."

But the conflict between that section and section 14 having probably been perceived, the Legislature, the next year, by section 20 of chapter 589, amended section 9 to bring it into harmony with section 14, so as to make it read as follows: "The said Commissioners shall have power to select a secretary, chief and assistant engineers, and as many officers, clerks, firemen, engineers, drivers, inspectors and bell ringers, as may be necessary; Provided, that the salaries of such employees, in the aggregate, shall not exceed the amount annually raised by the proper officers for such purpose. The said employees shall at all times be under the control of said Commissioners, and perform such duties as may be imposed upon them by the said Commissioners."

The omission from the section, of the absolute power of removal, is quite significant and leaves no doubt as to the proper construction of section 14.

The last paragraph of section 7 of the Act, chapter 377 of the Laws of 1880, passed after the dismissal of the relator, made no new provision, but applied the prior law to the new state of things.

The orders of the General and Special Terms, and the proceedings of the Commissioners of the Department of Fire and Buildings of the City of Brooklyn, should be reversed, with costs to the relator in the Supreme Court and in this Court.

MANHATTAN R. CO. Appt.

It is the plain duty of a passenger standing on the platform of a steam railway car to go inside the car when requested so to do by a person having charge of the train; and this is so, although there may be no unoccupied seats in the car at the time.

(Decided May 10, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas of New York City, affirming a judgment of a trial term on a verdict for plaintiff for $535.43 damages, in an action to recover damages for assault and battery, etc., suffered by plaintiff, a passenger on defendant's elevated railroad, by the hands of defendant's servant. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Edward S. Rapallo, for appellant:

The charge of the court was an erroneous explanation to the jury of the rules of law regulating the duty of the defendant to passengers and particularly as to persons standing on the platforms; and especially was it erroneous to decline to give the instructions asked for.

See 1 Redf. Railways, p. 91–92; Hibbard v. N. Y. & Erie R. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 463; Putnam v Broadway & Seventh Ave. R. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 108; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 135.

Mr. L. A. Gould, for respondent:

The plain conflict of evidence made necessary a submission to the jury of the questions at issue.

At all events the court of appeals may not interfere upon the grounds of excessive damages; Peck v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 592; nor because of any alleged preponderance of evidence against the verdict.

Standard Oil Co. v. Amazon Ins. Co. 79 N. Y. 510.

The counsel for the defendant requested the court to charge the jury that although there were no seats inside the car and people were standing therein, yet if there was room for the plaintiff, he was bound to go there. The court refused to charge as requested, and to this refusal the counsel for the defendant excepted. We are of opinion that the defendant was entitled to this instruction and that the exception was well taken.

It appears from the plaintiff's testimony that he boarded a train going north, at Houston Street, at about 6 o'clock Sunday evening. The car at the time was crowded and the plaintiff with other passengers stood on the platform. When the train reached Thirty-Fourth Street the brakeman requested the plaintiff and the other passengers on the platform to go inside the car, but as there was no room in the car at that time the plaintiff did not do so. Passengers got out of the car at Forty-Second Street, and on the train leaving that station the conductor requested the plaintiff to go inside, but he declined to do so. The conductor or brakeman then pushed the plaintiff inside the car. When the train reached Forty-Seventh Street the plaintiff, as he testifies, passed from inside the car on to the platform for the purpose of leaving the train at that station, and when he reached the platform the conductor took hold of him and pulled him off the car, and a struggle ensued between the plaintiff and the conductor, the details of which it is unnecessary to state.

The plaintiff on the trial testified to the act of the brakeman in pushing him into the car, and to the subsequent assault at the station, and relied upon both acts as constituting grounds of recovery.

Both of the transactions were litigated without objection and were submitted by the court to the jury and they rendered a general verdict. The request to charge related to the first assault; and if it should have been granted, the error cannot be disregarded. The counsel for the defendant on the argument sought to justify the act of the brakeman in pushing the plaintiff into the car, on the ground that his standing on the platform was a dangerous act and interfered with the proper management of the train, and that the brakeman was authorized to use necessary force to compel the plaintiff to go inside the car if there was standing room, although all the seats were occupied.

This question is not, we think, open to the defendant on this record. The court charged the jury that the brakeman had no right to force the plaintiff inside the car upon his refusal to go inside, and that the only remedy was to eject the plaintiff from the car on reaching the next station. The counsel for the defendant did not except to this ruling, but by his silence acquiesced in its correctness; and it must be regarded as the law of the case. But assuming that the law in this respect was correctly stated, as to which there is, it seems to us, room for serious doubt, nevertheless we think the court should have charged the proposition requested.

Whether on the plaintiff's refusing to comply with the request of the brakeman to go inside the car, the latter was authorized to use force to compel him to do so, is a distinct question. It is a matter of common knowledge that it is considered unsafe for passengers to ride on the platform of a running train. By so doing they expose themselves and the other passengers to unnecessary danger. The law exacts of carriers of passengers the highest degree of care for their safety. The control of trains is necessarily placed in the hands of employees. It is impossible to foresee all the exigencies which may demand prompt action on their part, to avert danger or accident. The safety of passengers on railroads requires that they should comply with reasonable regulations and acquiesce in reasonable directions of the persons to whom the management of the train is committed.

It is obvious that the crowding of passengers on the platform of a steam railroad car may seriously embarrass the trainmen in the performance of their duties; and it is, we think, the plain duty of a passenger standing on a platform, to go inside the car when requested so to do by a person having charge of the train.

The request to charge was material, as bearing upon the question of damages, assuming that the use of force by the brakeman was not justified. Although the brakeman may have been mistaken as to his authority to enforce a compliance with the request made to the plaintiff, yet it was the duty of the plaintiff to comply; and his refusal tends to mitigate and explain the conduct of the brakeman and to show that the assault was not wanton or malicious.

The fact that there were no unoccupied seats in the car did not, we think, change the duty of the plaintiff to go inside. If he had any well founded complaint against the Company for not providing adequate accommodations for passengers, this did not, we think, release him from the duty of leaving the platform and going inside the car, although there was standing room only. The car was crowded when the plaintiff entered it at Houston Street. He placed himself immediately in a position where he was compelled to submit to some inconvenience, and he was not freed from the obligation to obey the reasonable directions of the trainmen, made with a view to the general convenience and safety, because there was no vacant seat.

For the error in the refusal to charge, the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted.

The owner of two adjoining city lots, Nos. 141 and 143, conveyed lot No. 143 to defendant's grantor, by metes and bounds, as being twenty-two feet wide, "with the buildings and improvements thereon," "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging." The said original grantor being still the owner of lot No. 141 brought ejectment for the said five feet of lot No. 141, covered by the house which extended over the line from lot 143. Held, that judgment for plaintiff should be affirmed; that said deed conveyed only that part of the house occupied by defendant which is on the land described therein; and that no easement exists for the extension of the house upon the land not conveyed. (Decided June 7, 1887.)

Reported below, 36 Hun, 337.

The defendant Edward A. Morrison is the principal defendant, the other defendants being his tenants.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. James J. Thomson, for appellants:

The maxim "To whomsoever anyone grants a thing he grants with it also that without which the thing itself could not exist," applies to this case.

Broom, Legal Max. marg. p. 479.

In the condition of the property granted the easement in question was appurtenant to the respondent's grant.

Rogers v. Sinsheimer, 50 N. Y. 646; Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 506; Huttemeier v. Albro, 18 N. Y. 51; Doyle v. Lord, 64 N. Y. 437: Goddard, Easements, 71; Root v. Wadhams, 35 Hun, 57.

This right to maintain and enjoy the exterior walls of the house carries with it the right to occupy the space between the boundary of the lot and the exterior wall of the building.

Rogers v. Sinsheimer, 50 N. Y. 648.

This easement in the land and in the cottage wall to serve as an interior wall continues so long as the wall shall endure.

Id.; Reiners v. Young, 38 Hun, 335.

The easement in question is not only created by grant, but it is an apparent and continuous easement, and would pass as incident to the grant without the word "appurtenances."

Parsons v. Johnson, 68 N. Y. 66; Rogers v. Sinsheimer, 50 N. Y. 648.

The action for the possession cannot be maintained; the appellants enjoy an easement in the land in dispute wholly inconsistent with actual occupation by respondent.

Wilklow v. Lane, 37 Barb. 247; Rogers v. Sinsheimer, 50 N. Y. 649.

Mr. S. Jones, for respondent:

Defendants have no rights of easement. There is no actual necessity of the walls in question for the support of the remaining part of the structure on defendant's lot. Actual necessity is the controlling element.

Ogden v. Jennings, 62 N. Y. 526, 531.

By the clear terms of the deed this space and so much of the building as was on it were not granted or intended to be so.

These walls are not directly necessary to the proper enjoyment of the thing granted; and, therefore, they will not pass as incident or appurtenant thereto. Id.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The deed from plaintiff to defendant's grantor conveyed the lot No. 143 by metes and bounds, as being twenty-two feet wide on Forty-Ninth Street, and the same width in the rear, and 100 feet and 4½ inches deep. This description confessedly does not embrace the five feet in question, which are within the area of lot 141 on the east. The defendant, however, claims to have the right, in the nature of an easement, to retain the possession of this strip, although not embraced in the above description, because the house on the rear of his lot was built and extended these five feet on the lot adjoining it on the east, by the person who was at the time the owner of both lots.

For this house, thus extended towards the east, there never was a separate and exterior eastern wall, but its front and rear walls were simply extended five feet over the line until they met the western wall of a house built on that adjoining lot, but not up to the western line of the lot within the said limit of five feet and some inches. The front and rear walls above mentioned were not keyed into this western exterior wall, and the timbers of the house did not rest in such wall but were supported by piers. This wall was thus made the east wall of the house, the largest part of which was built on the lot now owned by defendant, and the plastering was placed upon or directly against it. The house had a hallway through its centre with rooms on each side, and the eastern rooms, of course, had this wall for their eastern boundary. Under these circumstances the plaintiff sold to defendant's grantor a piece of land described as above, "with the buildings and improvements thereon," "together with all and singular, the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging."

Unless the defendant has the right to retain the possession of the five feet and the right to use the exterior wall above described as a wall to his building so long as the wall shall endure, the plaintiff has established her right to the premises; and the judgment awarding her possession thereof must be affirmed.

The defendant claims to have established his right under the language of the deed last above quoted.

The description in the deed of the amount of the land conveyed is minute and definite, even to a half inch, and the deed conveys "the buildings and improvements thereon." Does this language include the right to retain possession of this five feet in controversy while that western extension wall endures and to use such wall as the eastern extension wall of the defendant's house? It is the building and improvements on the land, which is most accurately and minutely described, that are conveyed.

There is no suggestion of mistake of measurement in the amount of land intended to be conveyed; and yet a piece of land five feet in addition to that which was actually conveyed and out of a total of only twenty-two feet, is thus called for to furnish this easement to defendant's premises. We think that the language conveys only that part of the building which is on the land described, and that no right such as is claimed by the defendant exists upon or in relation to the land not conveyed and which belongs to plaintiff. Such we think is the clear intention to be deduced from the language used and from the situation of the parties.

The defendant can easily build up a wall on the easterly side of his premises which will then keep the building thereon in good condition, although the effect of course will be to somewhat diminish the size of the whole building as to width. The defendant will still have all that was conveyed to his grantor, viz.: the building and improvements which were on the land actually conveyed.

But the defendant claims that his right can be founded upon the other clause of the deed which conveys the land thus specifically described, "together with all and singular, the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining." It is claimed that this right to use the western extension wall as long as it endures, and also the space for the front and rear walls, is an easement which is appurtenant to the grant of the twenty-two feet of land "with the buildings and improvements thereon," which building defendants say cannot exist as a building, unless the front and rear walls are permitted to stand, and they cannot stand unless permitted to occupy the land on which they stand.

It must be remembered that the parties have respectively granted and received all of the land that was intended. There has been no mistake made about the quantity thereof. The grantee received and the grantor conveyed only twenty-two feet in width, each of course knowing that five feet of the width of the building ran over and upon land not conveyed. If there had been any thought of conveying that portion of the house which stood on land not conveyed, or of erecting any easement upon the land not conveyed, in the nature of a right of support for the walls of the building, I think language would have been used which would have made it plain that such was the intention. By the word "appurtenances" incorporeal easements or rights or privileges will alone pass, and of these only such as are necessary to the proper enjoyment of the estate granted. Ogden v. Jennings, 62 N. Y. 526.

I think the estate granted was a lot of land twenty-two feet wide, and such building as was on that lot; but the estate did not extend to any portion of that building which was outside of and beyond such lot. It was not necessary, in order to enjoy the estate granted, that there should exist an easement in the shape of an appurtenance to such estate, which was not directly necessary to its proper enjoyment, and was no more than a mere convenience, and in effect simply an enlargement of the grant. By building the extension wall on his own land the defendant can have the full enjoyment of every thing that has been conveyed to him. He cites as the main authority for his contention the case of Rogers v. Sinsheimer, 50 N. Y. 646.

But the cases are clearly distinguishable. In the Rogers Case the original owner had built two houses on two lots with a party wall eight inches thick between them, which served as a support for the beams of each house. On the same day he sold the houses by two deeds to two different parties, conveying the easterly lot to A., the plaintiff's grantor, and the westerly lot to B., the defendant's grantor, the deed to the latter by a description which located the division line so as to throw the party wall and two inches of land on the westerly side thereof within the plaintiff's lot. The plaintiff recovered a judgment which was reversed at general term and such reversal affirmed here. It was placed upon the ground that as it was a party wall, which at the time of the conveyance served as a support for the beams of the house erected on the lot then belonging to defendant, the premises were obviously charged with the servitude of having the beams of the house rest in the wall, and the wall remain as an exterior wall for defendant's house so long as the building should endure. Thus we have the fact of a party wall and an actual existing support therein for the beams of each house, and the right to the use of it as an exterior wall. Again; there was a space of but two inches beyond the party wall which plaintiff claimed, and that space was so short as to prevent the idea being formed that there was an intention by such conveyance to terminate the character of the wall and the right of defendant to rest his beams upon it. Such right of support existing carried with it, of course, the right to occupy this space of two inches between the easterly boundary of defendant's lot and the wall, with the timbers which were to be supported in the wall.

In the case at bar there was no party wall, and no support and no right of support for the beams of defendant's house. The exterior wall of an existing house had simply been utilized as being partition enough between the houses, and no part of it was used for a support of any of the timbers of the house in question, and this wall was five feet from the line of the premises which were actually conveyed to the defendant.

The character of the easement claimed by defendant, in effect, does not differ from the claim of the fee to the five feet, for the right to occupy the space with the front and rear walls and to have the western wall of the other building serve as the eastern exterior wall of defendant's, requires in its exercise the actual and exclusive possession of that amount of land, although it was never conveyed to defendant. There is no intention to make a conveyance of any such right expressed in the deed, and there is nothing in the Rogers Case which compels or authorizes us to imply such an intention. We have looked at the other cases cited by defendant's counsel, but they plainly have no application.

What has been said in regard to the claim of defendant as to the five feet, applies with stronger force to the alleged easement for the maintenance of the privy, hydrant, etc. This alleged claim is plainly untenable, as not being in any sense an appurtenant to the land conveyed, not necessary to its enjoyment, and scarcely even more convenient.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Circuit on a verdict for plaintiffs in an action to recover landing and wharfinger's charges under a bill of lading. Affirmed.

Statement by Andrews, J.:

The plaintiffs were owners of certain wharves, piers and warehouses at the foot of Joralemon Street in the City of Brooklyn, within the Port of New York, erected on land under water within the boundaries mentioned in chapter 156 of the Laws of 1848, and chapter 318 of the Laws of 1860. The defendants were owners and consignees of certain cargoes of sugar, imported from Havana by Ward's line of steamers between November, 1880, and November, 1882, which, upon the arrival of the vessels transporting the same were landed by the carrier upon the plaintiffs' wharves, and were, within twenty-four hours thereafter, delivered by them to the defendants.

The sugars were transported from Havana to New York under bills of lading by which the carrier agreed to carry them from Havana to the Port of New York, "to be there delivered within reach of the steamship's tackles, unto Messrs. Havemeyer & Elder, or his or their assigns," upon payment by the consignees of the freight and primage specified.

This primary clause in the bill of lading was followed by a provision out of which and the action of the carriers thereunder, arises the present controversy. That provision is as follows: "It is expressly stipulated that the articles named in this bill of lading shall be at the risk of the owner, shipper or consignee thereof, as soon as delivered from the tackles of the steamer in the aforesaid Port of New York (steamer has option of discharging cargo at New York or Brooklyn, consignees of cargo to pay charges thereon as expressed in the margin) and they shall be received by the consignee thereof, package by package, as so delivered," etc. In the margin of the respective bills of lading is this printed notation: "Landing and wharfinger's charges, including storage on wharf not exceeding six days, 17 cts. per hhd., 15 cts. per t'ce., 8 cts. per box and 4 cts. per bag, commencing immediately upon delivery from steamer."

The vessels on which the sugars were shipped carried general cargoes, and on reaching New York stopped in the first instance at the regular pier of the company in New York, at the foot of Wall Street, and there discharged light cargo other than sugar, and thence proceeded, under the option reserved in the bill of lading, to the wharves of the plaintiffs in Brooklyn and there delivered the sugars. The defendants were ready with lighters to receive the sugars from the vessels, and demanded that they should be delivered directly into the lighters. They were, however, delivered upon the wharf, and not directly into the lighters, for the convenience of the steamers in sorting the defendants' sugars from other goods and sugars on the vessels, the cargoes in most cases including other sugars than the defendants'.

This action is brought to recover the landing and wharfinger's charges, at the rate expressed in the bills of lading.

Mr. John E. Parsons, for appellants:

The bills of lading compelled the vessels to transport the sugar to the Port of New York. They required them to deliver the sugar there, within reach of the vessel's tackle, to the consignees. This is provided in express terms. It is the language of the instruments. There is no doubt or uncertainty about the provision. It admits of no question.

New York Cent. etc. R. R. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 20 Hun, 39; Rowland v. Miln, 2 Hilt. 150; Goodwin v. Baltimore etc. R. R. Co. 58 Barb. 195; Redmond v. Liverpool etc. Steamboat Co. 46 N. Y. 578.

For rendering this service the bills of lading provided in direct terms that the consignee should pay freight at a fixed rate, "with 5 per cent primage and average accustomed, payable in United States currency." The rate is stated in the margin. It is called "freight," and 5 per cent primage is added.

Freight is one thing; landing and wharfinger's charges are something entirely different.

As the defendants were entitled to their sugar, ex necessitate, it was not a service rendered to them or for which they were required to pay that the vessels should deliver it to them or should be provided with a berth at the plaintiffs' wharf to permit it to be landed there.

By the terms of the bills of lading the payment of the freight entitled the defendants to have the sugar delivered to them within reach of the vessel's tackle.

No wharfage, storage or protection was asked or given to the sugar. It passed at once into the defendants' lighters.

It was for the convenience of the steamers in sorting from other lots that the sugar went upon the wharf at all. The defendants were ready with lighters to receive it from the vessels, and demanded that it should be delivered directly into lighters, which lay alongside.

If it were possible for the plaintiffs to recover upon the ground that the defendants were liable arbitrarily, and without reference to whether the plaintiffs should or should not render any service, they could not recover in this action.

The bills of lading did not confer upon the vessels the option of discharging cargo both at New York and at Brooklyn. The option is to discharge at one place or the other. As the vessels did discharge in New York and the defendants were ready to receive and insisted upon receiving their sugar there, the vessels lost any right which may be claimed to have been conferred upon them by the bills of lading to land in Brooklyn, and thus to subject the defendants to the disputed charge.

The Act of 1872, chap. 320, § 2, as amended by the Act of 1875, chap. 405, § 2, permitted the defendants to use the wharves in question not to exceed twenty-four hours without compensation. None of the sugar remained on the plaintiffs' wharves as much as twenty-four hours.

The Act of 1872 fixes the rates of wharfage to vessels within the Cities of New York, Brooklyn or Long Island City.

In enacting that it shall be lawful for pier owners to make the permitted charge, the Legislature by implication has provided that no greater charge shall be imposed upon commerce.

The plaintiffs are the owners of a pier within the City of Brooklyn. They come within the direct description contained in the Act.

The plaintiffs contend that this Act does not apply to what are called private piers, i. e., piers owned by individuals instead of those which are the property of the corporation of the City of New York.

Wharfage, in a sense of compensation for the use by a vessel of a pier and for the right to discharge cargo, has always been recognized as the subject of legislation.

See Acts of May 6, 1870, April 23, 1872, May 21, 1875, April 16, 1879.

Shipping interests concern the public. The regulation of matters which affect such interests is with the people represented by the Legislature. Commerce, the carriage of passengers or transportation of merchandise, are subjects in reference to which the whole world is entitled to protection against the unlicensed action of individuals.

Vanderbilt v. *Adams, 7 Cow. 349; Comrs. v. Clark, 33 N. Y. 251; Munn v. Ill. 94 U. S. 113 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 77); Taylor v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 37 N. Y. 275.

If it be assumed that the defendants became liable, it is not a liability to the plaintiffs, or a liability which can be enforced by them. The plaintiffs are not parties to the bill of lading. There is no obligation in the bills of lading which runs to or in favor of the plaintiffs either in name or by description. The bills of lading are single and entire contracts; the parties are the owners or consignees of the cargo of the one part and the owners of the vessels of the other. It is not within the power of the vessel owners either to give a right of action to the plaintiffs or to split up a right of action which belonged to themselves.

Pardee v. Treat, 82 N. Y. 385; Root v. Wright, 84 N. Y. 72; Seward v. Huntington, 94 N. Y. 104; Merrill v. Green, 55 N. Y. 270; Simson v. Brown, 68 N. Y. 356.

Mr. S. P. Nash, for respondents:

The defendants are liable for the charges specified in the bills of lading, notwithstanding the statute regulating wharfage. "Wharfage" as regulated by statute is a charge against the vessel for lying at the wharf, and not a charge for caring for the goods.

In 1872, by chapter 320 of that year, the Legislature, for the first time, passed an Act relating to charges on goods remaining on the wharf.

If the construction of the Act is as contended by appellants and was applicable to private wharves, it would doubtless be held to transcend the constitutional power of the Legislature.

Munn v. Ill. 94 U. S. 127 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 85).

The plaintiffs' wharves are not public wharves leased by them, but they are private property and are built on land under water within the boundaries mentioned in chapter 156 of the Laws of 1848, and chapter 313 of the Laws of 1850, in neither of which Acts are any rights of dockage or wharfage reserved.

The "owners or lessees" of public wharves may have no right, as such, to make any charge to the owner of goods which a vessel has a right to land upon their wharves; nor have they any responsibility for such goods. The wharves and piers in the City of New York, for example, are but public streets; and the only right of the lessee or owner is the privilege of collecting wharfage of the vessels making fast to them.

Comrs. v. Clark, 33 N. Y. 251; Taylor v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 37 N. Y. 275.

But as goods lawfully landed upon a public wharf may incumber and obstruct it for an unreasonable time, the section of the statute allowing a charge upon the goods after twenty-four hours, was passed to enable the owner of the wharf to compel the removal of the goods.

Story, Bailm. § 453.

The statute in question has no application to the owner of a wharf who has the right to use it for storage purposes, and who holds himself out as a warehouseman and wharfinger and renders services for and about the goods.

This is the case in respect to the plaintiffs, and their wharves and the Brooklyn wharves generally, as distinguished from the wharves in New York.

As regards the former the public has no absolute right to use them, either with or without paying wharfage.

Wetmore v. Atlantic White Lead Co. 37 Barb. 70; Wetmore v. Brooklyn Gas Light Co. 42 N.Y. 384.

The construction of the bill of lading is clear, and both plaintiffs and defendants are bound by it.

Whitworth v. Erie R. Co. 87 N. Y. 413; Morse v. Pesant, 2 Keyes, 16; S. C. Abb. App. Dec. 321; The Delaware, 81 U. S. 579 (Bk. 20, L. ed. 779).

Sufficient privity of contract between plaintiffs and defendants arises upon the bill of lading, and what was done under it, to enable the plaintiffs to sustain the action.

Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268.

There is nothing in the contention that the condition contained in the bill of lading of which the vessel availed itself is contrary to public policy or the principles of justice.

In the case of a general cargo the different consignments must be properly separated and during the time required for this purpose the carrier's risk continues.

The Eddy, 72 U. S. 481 (Bk. 18, L. ed. 486).

In such a case it is the carrier who remains the custodian of the goods on the wharf.

But the carrier may limit this liability and provide that each parcel shall be at the risk of the consignee as soon as delivered from the ship's tackle; and bills of lading containing such a limitation are binding upon the consignee.

The Santee, 2 Ben. 519; S. C. affirmed in 7 Blatch. 186.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defense to this action on the merits, if it has any foundation, rests upon the assertion by the defendants of the right to disregard and repudiate their written contract contained in the bills of lading, to pay landing and wharfinger's fees at the rate specified in the margin of the bills, although the carriers exercised their option to discharge the sugars in Brooklyn. It is manifest that this defense cannot be maintained upon the ordinary and general rules applicable to contracts. The option reserved by the carrier, to discharge the sugars in Brooklyn, contemplated a delivery upon a wharf in case the option was exercised, as is shown by the notation in the margin of the bills.

It is inferable from the agreed facts that the option was reserved by the carriers for their convenience in unloading and assorting cargo. At all events the shippers by the bills of lading assented to this mode of delivery; and they had no right to insist that for their convenience the sugars should be delivered from the side of the ship. The parties to the contract not only made a special agreement as to the mode of delivery, but they fixed by the same agreement the amount which the shipper or consignee should pay for landing and wharfinger's charges in case the carriers elected to discharge the sugars in Brooklyn. It is plain that this agreement also was within the general competency of contracting parties and was binding upon the defendants, unless they are freed from liability to perform their contract upon some special ground.

It is claimed that, assuming that the contract was valid and enforceable between the carriers and the defendants, there was no privity between the plaintiffs and defendant which will support an action by the plaintiffs to recover the stipulated compensation. It is unnecessary to invoke the doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, in order to support the judgment below; and it is not important to consider whether the doctrine of that case is applicable.

The plaintiffs came into possession of the sugars through a delivery by carriers duly authorized by the shippers and consignees to make delivery on such wharf in Brooklyn as the carriers might select, subject to the payment by the consignees of wharfinger's fees at a specified rate. The receipt of the cargo on the wharf was in legal effect a service rendered by the plaintiffs for the defendants, upon the employment of the carriers duly authorized to contract in behalf of the defendants for the service at the rates agreed upon in the bill of lading.

The defendants were parties to the bills of lading. The plaintiffs received the goods under the terms expressed therein and thereby became entitled to enforce the contract made for the benefit of such wharfinger as should render the contemplated service. In general a bill of lading is binding upon and protects all persons who by means of or under it become the owners or custodians of the goods. See Whitworth v. Erie R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 413; Morse v. Pesant, 2 Keyes, 16, and The Delaware, 81 U. S. 579 (Bk. 20, L. ed. 779).

But the defendants mainly rely for their defense upon the Act, chapter 320, of the Laws of 1872, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act in Relation to the Rates of Wharfage and to Regulate Piers, Wharves, Bulkheads and Slips in the Cities of New York and Brooklyn, Passed May 6, 1870."

The first section of the Act prescribes the rates of wharfage and dockage, within the Cities of New York and Brooklyn. "Wharfage" is a charge against a vessel for lying at a wharf, and is not a charge for caring for the goods. The plaintiffs are not seeking to recover wharfage, and the first section of the Act has, therefore, no direct bearing upon the present controversy. But it is claimed that by the second section the defendants had the right to have the sugars remain on the plaintiffs' wharf for a period not exceeding twenty-four hours without charge. The second section is as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the owners or lessees of any pier, wharf or bulkhead within the Cities of New York and Brooklyn, to charge and collect the sum of five cents per ton on all goods, merchandise and materials remaining on the pier, wharf or bulkhead owned or leased by him for every day, after the expiration of twenty-four hours from the time such goods, merchandise and materials shall have been left or deposited on such pier, wharf or bulkhead, and the same shall be a lien thereon."

It will be observed that the section does not in terms prohibit wharfingers from entering into special contracts for the use of their wharves, for the storage or deposit of goods thereon during the first twenty-four hours. It simply declares it to be lawful for owners or lessees of wharves or piers to charge the rate specified, upon goods remaining thereon more than twenty-four hours.

The public wharves in New York and Brooklyn are in general extensions of public streets, and the second section of the Act may have been enacted for the protection of wharfingers on the public wharves against the annoyance and obstruction which might be occasioned by the accumulation of goods, merchandise and materials thereon, and to furnish a motive to the owner of property for its prompt removal.

This view is quite consistent with the course of legislation and the decisions. But, however this may be, we think the statute cannot be construed to prohibit the owner of a private wharf from entering into a contract for the landing and deposit of goods upon his wharf, upon such terms as may be agreed upon between himself and the owner of the goods; nor can it be construed as requiring him to store goods for any period of time without compensation. Assuming that such a regulation would be within the competency of the Legislature, as to which we express no opinion, nevertheless the intention of the Legislature to exercise such an exceptional power cannot be inferred from the language of the Act of 1872. The Act can have scope and effect without imputing to the Legislature the design attributed to it by the defendants. See Wetmore v. Brooklyn Gas Light Co. 42 N. Y. 384.

We think the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the action, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment entered in Onondaga County on report of a referee in an action to recover on a promissory note, for a balance on a running account and for board furnished. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Louis Marshall, for appellant:

A bill of particulars is treated by the authorities as an amplification of the pleading to which it relates, and is to be construed as forming a part of it and has the effect to restrict the proofs and to limit the recovery to the matters therein set forth.

Matthews v. Hubbard, 47 N. Y. 429; Higenbotam v. Green, 25 Hun, 216; Bowman v. Earl, 3 Duer, 694; Melvin v. Wood, 3 Keyes, 535, 536; Brown v. Williams, 4 Wend. 368; Starkweather v. Kittle, 17 Wend. 201; Dwight v. Germania Life Ins. Co. 84 N. Y. 506.

A failure to serve a bill is to be treated in the same manner as a default in pleading.

Gross v. Clark, 87 N. Y. 276.

It is a rule of evidence elementary in its nature that the party who explicitly admits by his pleading, that which establishes the right of his opponent, will not be permitted to deny its existence, or to prove any state of facts inconsistent with that admission.

Paige v. Willet, 38 N. Y. 28; Tell v. Beyer, 38 N. Y. 161; Fleischmann v. Stern, 90 N. Y. 114; Donovan v. Bd. of Ed. of N. Y. 55 How. Pr. 176; Thomas v. Austin, 4 Barb. 265; Robbins v. Codman, 4 E. D. Smith, 315; Crosbie v. Leary, 6 Bosw. 315; White v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 418; see also, People v. Van Rensselaer, 9 N. Y. 291, 319.

In this case the referee utterly disregarded the admission contained in the plaintiff's bill of particulars: that the defendant had furnished the plaintiff with board and performed labor for him, and that he was liable therefor.

White v. Smith, 46 N. Y. 418.

Where a referee thus disregards an admission contained in the pleading of a party, his decision (based upon such omission to consider conceded facts in the case) is error which must lead to a reversal.

Bridge v. Payson, 5 Sandf. 210.

The effect of an express and particularized admission cannot be destroyed by a subsequent formal general denial. The ambiguity, if any is created by such a method of pleading, is occasioned by the conduct of the pleader who adopts such eccentricity; and the consequences must fall upon him, and not upon the party who had a right to rely upon his explicit concession. It is the duty of a party to an action to present a clear and unequivocal statement of his cause of action or defense; and when a material statement is susceptible of two meanings, the one most unfavorable to the pleader must be taken.

Clark v. Dillon, 97 N. Y. 370; Bates v. Rosekrans, 23 How. Pr. 98; Moores v. Lehman, 20 Jones & S. 283.

If the pleadings and bills of particulars in this action had been verified, the plaintiff could not have been convicted of perjury for interposing a constructive denial of liability for board and lodging in the reply, when in his amplified complaint in the action he expressly admitted such liability.

Clark v. Dillon, 97 N. Y. 376.

Mr. Thomas Hogan, for respondent:

Because plaintiff stated a credit in his bill of particulars it does not follow that defendant should be allowed it, the referee having found adversely thereto and the pleadings expressly denying such credit.

Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 21 Hun, 537; Stuart v. Kissam, 2 Barb. 494; Craig v. Tappin, 2 Sandf. Ch. 78-85; Goodyear v. De La Vergne, 10 Hun, 537; Putney v. Tyng, 24 N. Y. Week. Dig. 344.

The defendant did not rely upon it at the trial, and cannot claim it now.

Smith v. Freeman, 71 Ind. 85; Bass v. Smith, 61 Ind. 72; Randolph v. Mayor of N. Y. 53 How. Pr. 68.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The pleadings in this case were very general in their form. The complaint alleged among other things that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for board furnished; to which the former answered by a denial putting the claim at issue. The defendant further answered by setting up a counterclaim for board furnished by him to the plaintiff, to which the latter replied with a denial.

On this state of the pleadings, if nothing else had occurred, either party would have been at liberty as against the other to have resisted his adversary's claim for board upon the ground that the relations between the parties, as father-in-law and son-in-law, and the attendant circumstances were such as to negative any implied contract to pay for board and require for success proof of an express agreement to pay; and if that defense failed, then to establish the amount and value of the board furnished. The two positions were not necessarily inconsistent. It might turn out in favor of either party that, while there was no implied contract, there was yet an express agreement to pay on one side and not on the other, and so respectively each party could insist upon his own claim while denying his adversary's, and neither conceded an implied contract by asserting his own right of action. But at some time each party furnished to the other a bill of particulars, and upon that served by the plaintiff the question arises, argued on this appeal. It contained a charge against the defendant for board, and a credit allowed him for similar service of a less amount; and that credit, it is claimed, admits that for board to some amount the defendant was entitled to be paid; and so the referee erred in refusing wholly an allowance for that item, and on both sides, upon the ground that in the absence of an express agreement the circumstances repelled an implied one.

We are now reminded that a bill of particulars is to be deemed an amplification of the pleadings, and that similar admissions have been held to be sufficient basis for a judgment. It may be that the credit here given was an admission of the fact that board to the amount stated was furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff, but we do not think, having reference to the form of the pleadings, and the issues raised by them, that the credit is a conclusive admission of legal liability to that amount. It is impossible to harmonize such a liability with the denials of the answer and reply; and therefore I think the bill of particulars must be construed to contain only a conditional or contingent admission framed to operate in a possible emergency.

As no item could be proved on the trial, ordinarily, unless embraced in the bill, it became necessary to name in that every charge which upon any theory at the trial might become admissible; and so the plaintiff (while resisting the defendant's claim upon a ground equally fatal to his own) might guard against the possible failure of that resistance by pleading and itemizing his own charge for board as in excess of the defendant's, and the credit given is in connection with the charge made and upon the theory that both charge and credit may by possibility prove to be a legal liability. The admission fairly requires to be treated as a concession of the fact that board had been furnished, but does not waive the right claimed by the denial on each side of contesting a resultant liability flowing from the fact admitted. It is as if the plaintiff had said: "Board was furnished so much by me and so much by my adversary; but I deny that either, for a reason which affects both, is a legal charge; yet if mine is allowed, it amounts to so much and I will prove it at that, while my adversary's is the less sum, which in that event I admit."

If this was hypothetical pleading, or the theories were in one view inconsistent, it is further to be observed that no objection was made upon the trial in any manner raising the question. The trial went, from its beginning to its end, upon an assumption that the question of legal liability for board was an open one on each side; and if defendant held the contrary, he should have objected to the evidence offered to defeat his claim and relied upon the alleged admission. The attention of the referee would then have been called to it, and he could have ruled upon it, and possibly the plaintiff might then have sought leave to amend, and obtained permission to strike out the credit as made under a mistake as to its effect and construction. A bill of particulars, like a pleading, may be amended. Melvin v. Wood, 3 Keyes, 533.

When the amendment sought is to strike out what is unessential to the bill and a needless addition, leaving the plaintiff's side of the account unchanged, it would seem quite possible to permit it. It is not the office of a bill of particulars to furnish a defendant with facts whereon to found an affirmative defense in his behalf.

Drake v. Thayer, 5 Robt. 594.

A plaintiff is not bound to furnish a statement of payments or offsets which he has voluntarily credited. Ryckman v. Haight, 15 Johns. 222; Williams v. Shaw, 4 Abb. Pr. 209.

Where he has done so in such manner as by mistake to have periled his right or made ambiguous his meaning, an amendment allowed would not be an unwarranted discretion. But in this case the defendant went to judgment without once relying upon the alleged admission, or drawing attention to it, or claiming anything under it. He sees the evidence which defeats it offered and given in silence; and not until the decision is made, when opportunity for amendment is gone, does he raise the point. We think that is too late and furnishes no just ground for a reversal of the conclusion reached.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

CROSS appeals from a judgment of Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, reversing in part a judgment of the Monroe Equity Term in favor of defendants in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given as collateral security for a certain note drawn by Charles W. Briggs, under the name of Briggs Brothers, to the order of plaintiff, and indorsed by John T. Briggs and Charles Barton for the accomodation of Briggs Brothers.

The defenses were usury and an extension of time of credit to the principal debtor, without the consent of the sureties.

The case was tried at the Monroe Equity Term before the court without a jury, who found the facts as follows:

1. That on the 14th day of December, 1876, it was agreed between the plaintiff and one Charles W. Briggs, who was engaged in business under the firm name of Briggs Brothers, that the said Briggs Brothers should execute their promissory note to the order of John T. Briggs, for the sum of $5,000, and interest from December 14, 1876, payable in nine months from date, and should procure the same to be indorsed by said John T. Briggs and Charles Barton, for the accommodation of said Briggs Brothers. And it was further agreed that the defendants, Charles Barton and Charles F. Sargent, as a collateral security for the payment of said note, should execute and deliver to the plaintiff their bond, in manner and form as set out in the complaint, to be secured by a mortgage executed by the defendants Charles Barton and Charles F. Sargent, Helen F. Barton and Esther J. Sargent, as is alleged in the complaint. And it was further agreed that upon the delivery of said papers to said plaintiff he would loan and advance to the said Briggs & Brother $3,000 in money, and should deliver to them three promissory notes of third parties of the nominal value of $1,500.

2. That said promissory notes so delivered to Briggs & Brother were not worth the said sum of $1,500, but were worth much less, which was well known to plaintiff and to Briggs & Brother.

3. That on the 15th day of December, 1876, in pursuance of said agreement, said plaintiff loaned to Briggs & Brother the said sum of $3,000, and turned out said three notes to them, and received therefor the said note for $5,000, and said bond and mortgage.

4. That said transaction was had between the plaintiff and said Briggs & Brother with the intent on the part of the plaintiff to take, and on the part of Briggs & Brother to pay, a usurious rate of interest for the loan and advance of the said sum of $3,000, and that the said Briggs & Brother did pay and the said plaintiff did receive for the loan and advance of said $3,000, the sum of $500, and the difference between the actual and nominal value of the said notes, in addition to the rate of 7 per cent yearly.

5. That at the time of the indorsement of said note and of the execution of said bond and mortgage, said Barton signed a certificate that said note was valid business paper, and was made for a full consideration, and was not made for the purpose of raising money, and that there was no defense thereto for want of consideration, usury or otherwise.

6. That said statement was not true, and was known by plaintiff not to be true, and he did not rely upon it when he took the note.

As conclusions of law the court found:

1. That the notes indorsed by the defendant Barton, and the said bond and mortgage, are usurious and void.

2. That the defendants, Charles Barton, Helen F. Barton, Charles F. Sargent and Esther J. Sargent, are entitled to judgment that the complaint of the plaintiff be dismissed, and that they recover their costs against the plaintiff.

Judgment was entered accordingly.

Upon appeal by plaintiff to the general term the judgment was affirmed as to the defendants Sargent and wife and Mrs. Barton, but was reversed as to Charles Barton, and a new trial awarded; whereupon, plaintiff and defendant Charles Barton appealed to this court.

Mr. J. E. Roe, for plaintiff:

Usury is an affirmative defense and must be clearly proved.

Valentine v. Conner, 40 N. Y. 252; Morris v. Talcott, 96 N. Y. 107.

The transaction was not, and it was not proven to be, a loan of money, but a sale of commercial paper, accompanied with a collateral bond and mortgage as a pledge or security for its payment.

Tyler, Usury, 118–130, § 91; Ingalls v. Lee, 9 Barb. 647; Rapelye v. Anderson, 4 Hill, 472, 481; Sutherland v. Woodruff, 26 Hun, 411; Cobb v. Titus, 10 N. Y. 198, and cases cited.

This is not an action upon the note, but upon Barton's indorsement upon it; or, rather, upon defendants' guaranty or undertaking to see it paid. A contract of indorsement is one independent of the note.

See Morford v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 481, 485 and Archer v. Shea, 14 Hun, 493.

The defendants were shown to have themselves received the avails of this transfer through McFaul, their agent; and the mortgage in evidence expressly admits its receipt by them.

Dauber v. Blackney, 38 Barb. 432.

Barton was estopped by his affidavit from saying that his contract of indorsement on the note was invalid.

Mason v. Anthony, 3 Keyes, 609; Erwin v. Downs, 15 N. Y. 575; Morford v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 481, 485.

The other parties are bound by the oral representations of the parties who procured the loans.

Platt v. Newcomb, 27 Hun, 186; Ahern v. Goodspeed, 72 N. Y. 108; Littauer v. Goldman, 72 N. Y. 507; Ross v. Terry, 63 N. Y. 613.

Was not this mortgage security, or guaranty, executed directly to the plaintiff, by the other defendants, equivalent to an indorsement of the note by them, and this even aside from the mentioned representations?

Brown v. Curtiss, 2 N. Y. 226; Allen v. Rightmere, 20 Johns. 365.

Having guarantied the note, were they not estopped from saying it was invalid?

Dauber v. Blackney, 38 Barb. 432.

By reason of the oral as well as written representations, all of the defendants were estopped.

Platt v. Newcomb, 27 Hun, 186; Ahern v. Goodspeed, 72 N. Y. 108; Littauer v. Goldman, 72 N. Y. 507; Union Dime Sav. Inst. v. Wilmot, 94 N. Y. 225.

Where the principle is estopped, the surety is estopped also. Briggs as well as Barton represented the paper as business paper, and as belonging to Barton at the time of its transfer.

Brandt, Suretyship, 518–521; 1 Greenl. Ev. 186; Mc Williams v. Mason, 31 N. Y. 298, 302; McNaught v. McClaughry, 42 N. Y. 22; Western N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Clinton, 66 N. Y. 326, 331; Howe Machine Co. v. Farrington, 82 N. Y. 126.

These authorities hold that even if the principal had distinctly misrepresented the character of the note to the surety, this would not avail them as a defense as long as plaintiff did nothing to mislead them. Their remedy would be against the one who had deceived them. It was not necessary that the plaintiff seek and make inquiries of the surety.

Mc Williams v. Mason, 31 N. Y. 302.

No allegation of the complaint is controverted. The answers deny "each and every allegation of the complaint,"—except what? The answers do not in any way point out or say what, but simply go on with a statement more or less in conflict with the complaint. They do not even state that they deny such allegations as are not thereafter admitted or modified; and even such form is held to put nothing in issue.

Thierry v. Crawford, 33 Hun, 366; McEncroe v. Decker, 58 How. Pr. 250.

That it does not constitute a general denial is also equally evident, for the obvious reason that it does not deny all, but denies all except a statement more or less in conflict with the complaint; and hence, it in no way points out what is or what is not controverted, and hence, does not controvert anything, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment under section 522 of the Code, against all the defendants, upon his motion, and the ruling denying it was error.

Clark v. Dillon, 97 N. Y. 370, 373, 15 Abb. N. C. 261, note; Fleischmann v. Stern, 90 N. Y. 110, 113; Paige v. Willet, 38 N. Y. 28; Miller v. McCloskey, 9 Abb. N. C. 303.

Mr. George Yeoman, for defendants:

The trial court was right in not finding Charles Barton estopped from defending upon the ground of usury, and its decision will not be reviewed here.

Sherwood v. Hauser, 94 N. Y. 626; Baird v. Mayor, 96 N. Y. 576–577.

It is submitted that the general term was in error if it reversed upon the facts.

But since it does not appear, except from the opinion, that the court reversed upon the facts, the question here is: Was there any evidence sufficient in law to sustain the judgment?

Kane v. Cortesy, 1 Cent Rep. 245, 100 N. Y. 132; Sheldon v. Sheldon, 51 N. Y. 354; Weyer v. Beach, 79 N. Y. 409.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the answer sets out with sufficient distinctness and accuracy the transaction constituting the alleged usury as proved on the part of the defendants, and that there was no essential variance. It alleges in substance that Briggs Bros., the maker of the note to which the mortgage in question was collateral, applied to the plaintiff for a loan of $5,000, for nine months, and that it was thereupon agreed between them that the plaintiff would loan to Briggs Bros. $3,000, for the time stated, and transfer to them three notes he then held against third parties, amounting in the aggregate to $1,500, upon receiving the note of Briggs Bros. for $5,000, payable in nine months, with interest, and that the transaction was consummated as proposed between the plaintiff and Briggs Bros., and the note of $5,000, given, indorsed by the defendant Barton and by John T. Briggs for the accommodation of the makers, and that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was a further security to the plaintiff for the loan.

The answer also alleges that the transaction was usurious and in violation of the statute. There is some lack of precision and certainty in the averments in the answer, but the plaintiff could not have been misled in respect to the defense intended, or as to the circumstances relied upon to support it. The usual rule for the construction of pleadings applies as well to an answer of usury as to one setting up any other defense. Nat. Bank of Auburn v. Lewis, 75 N. Y. 516.

The claim that there was no sufficient denial in the answer of the averments in the complaint, if well founded, furnishes no ground of error. The defense of usury was not inconsistent with the admission of the averments in the complaint; and as the case turned wholly upon that defense, it is unimportant that the defendants may have admitted what but for the existence of the usury would have constituted a cause of action. On the merits the evidence was conflicting. The plaintiff was sworn as a witness in his own behalf. He admitted that he advanced only $3,000 in money and $1,500 in notes, for the note of $5,000 and the mortgage.

It was not disputed on the trial that the note of $5,000 had its inception on its transfer to the plaintiff, nor that the defendant Barton was an accommodation indorser for the makers. But the plaintiff testified in substance that he bought the $5,000 note as business paper at the time that it was such, and that he took it in reliance upon the credit of the parties to the paper and the mortgage of Barton, and also upon the certificate of the makers and indorsers of the note and the affidavit of Barton, the mortgagor, executed cotemporaneously with the note, that it was business paper, and was given for a full consideration, and was subject to no defense of "want of consideration, usury, or otherwise."

On the other hand, evidence was given on the part of the defendants tending to show that the plaintiff, when he took the note and mortgage, had notice that the note was accommodation paper.

Upon this ground the learned judge at special term held that the certificate and affidavit of Barton constituted no estoppel against his setting up the defense of usury against the mortgage. This was manifestly right, upon the basis of the facts which the evidence of the defendants tended to establish.

But the general term, as appears from their opinion, reversed the judgment of the special term in favor of the defendant Barton, on the ground that the preponderance of evidence was in favor of the contention of the plaintiff that he took the note, supposing it to be business paper, and without notice that Barton was an accommodation indorser, and that therefore Barton was estopped by his certificate and affidavit from defeating the mortgage on the ground of usury.

But in the posture of the case on the appeal to this court, we cannot regard the reversal below as having been made on the facts, because this does not appear from the order of reversal; and we are bound to presume that the reversal was on questions of law only. On looking at the exceptions, we find none upon which the order of reversal can stand.

The question of pleading has already been considered. Exceptions were taken to findings of the trial judge that the transaction in its origin was a loan from the plaintiff to Briggs Bros. upon security of the note and mortgage, and that the plaintiff, when he took the note and received the certificate and affidavit of Barton, knew his relation to the note, and did not rely upon the truth of the representations contained therein, and various exceptions were taken to the admission and rejection of evidence.

There was evidence, we think, to support the findings excepted to; and we can find no exception to the admission or rejection of evidence, which presents any material error. Dealing with the case, therefore, as we must, as one involving questions of law only, our conclusion is that the order of the General Term should be reversed, and the judgment of the Special Term affirmed.

Robert SALOMON, Respt.

1. The clause in chapter 672 of Laws of 1886, amending section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that "No person shall be imprisoned within the jail liberties of any jail for a longer period than six months upon any execution or other mandate against the person," refers only to final process issued after the amount due from the person so imprisoned has been adjudged, and does not apply to a person imprisoned within the jail liberties under an order of arrest issued before a recovery has been obtained.
2. An order of general term affirming an order of special term discharging a defendant from the jail limits and from arrest under a preliminary order of arrest, upon the ground that he was entitled to discharge under said clause of said Act, is appealable to the court of appeals.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming an order of the Special Term discharging defendant from the limits and canceling his bond. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Wales F. Severance, for appellants:

The order is appealable to this court. It affects a substantial right, i. e., the right of a creditor to hold his debtor in arrest for the satisfaction of his debt, and possibly the right to prosecute the limit bond and realize his claim in such proceeding.

The Act of 1886 does not apply to cases where the defendant is held on an order of arrest.

The effect of the construction contended for in the court below is this: that in actions involving less than $500, the plaintiff, in order to avail himself of the remedy of execution against the person, must recover judgment and issue execution within three months in the one case, and six months in the other.

Defendant has twenty days to answer, fourteen days' notice of trial, execution against property sixty days, before execution can issue against the person, in all ninety-four days, which exceeds the three months limit by four days, leaving the plaintiff no time whatever to bring the action to trial, although in New York County no action can be reached on the calendar for trial in less than six months after issue joined, and in sixteen counties of the State there are but two circuits a year. The Legislature never could have intended this; and the court will not construe a statute so as to produce an unjust, absurd and grotesque result.

Potter, Dwar. Stat. p. 189, 197, 207; 10 Civ. Proc. Rep. 170.

The word "mandate" used in the Act was not intended to cover mesne, but only final process.

Warshauer v. Webb, 10 Civ. Proc. Rep. 170.

The words, other mandate, refer to some other mandate of the same character as that designated by the preceding word.

In construing a statute, when a specific word is used, followed by an indefinite one, the latter is controlled by the former; and "noscitur a sociis," as is judicially expressed.

Mr. Alex. Blumenstiel, for respondent.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record shows that the plaintiffs sued to recover personal property, and on the 9th of February procured the defendant's arrest upon the ground that he had concealed, etc., a part of the chattels, to recover which the action was brought. On the same day the defendant gave a bond for the jail limits, and has since been confined within them. It may be inferred that the cause is at issue; but it has not been tried, nor has any judgment gone against the defendant. Upon an affidavit showing his arrest and continued imprisonment as above stated, the defendant procured an order requiring the plaintiffs to show cause why he should not be discharged from the limits and "from arrest herein", and the bond given by him be canceled and annulled. The motion was granted. Upon appeal to the general term the decision was affirmed, and the plaintiffs appeal to this court.

The defendant justifies the order of the court below, upon the sole ground that under the order of arrest his imprisonment had continued six months, and he was therefore entitled to a discharge under the provisions of section 5, chap. 672, of the Laws of 1886, amending section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On the other hand, the plaintiffs contend that the statute applies to an imprisonment on final process only. We are of that opinion. The general title of the Act of 1886, supra, is "An Act to Amend the Code of Civil Procedure;" and the particular portion on the interpretation of which the defendant relies is the amendment of section 111 of the Code. The original section (111) relates to the support of prisoners in Kings County. The amendment introduces new matter, as to the meaning of which nothing can be gathered from the context.

It declares in the first clause that no person shall be imprisoned within the prison walls of any jail for a longer period than three months, under an execution, or any other mandate against the person to enforce the recovery of a sum of money less than $500 in amount, or under a commitment upon a fine for contempt of court in nonpayment of alimony or counsel fees in a divorce case, where the amount so to be paid is less than the sum of $500; and where the amount in either of said cases is $500 or over, such imprisonment shall not continue for a longer period than six months; and requires the discharge of such person at the expiration of those respective periods.

Then follow these words: "No person shall be imprisoned within the jail liberties of any jail for a longer period than six months, upon any execution or other mandate against the person."

These sentences are, I think, to be read together, and so read admit of but one meaning, viz.: that no person whose condition answers the terms referred to in the first clause, shall be imprisoned either within the walls of a jail or within the jail limits for a time exceeding six months; and if the recovery for the enforcement of which the execution or other mandate is issued, or the amount required to be paid by the commitment is less than $500, then his imprisonment within the prison walls shall not exceed three months. This is the only distinction applicable under the first clause, where the debtor is in close confinement, while under the second, when as to the walls of the jail and within certain limits, he is at large, the amount of the recovery or sum to be paid is unimportant.

The respondent concedes that under the first sentence only a final process or mandate, after an adjudication fixing the amount due, is referred to, but argues that the change of language in the second clause or sentence indicates a change in the intention of the Legislature, and a design to make it more extensive in its application than the former; that although the first included only final process or mandate, the second is of wider signification, and includes all mandates against the person, and so includes simple orders of arrest issued at the time of the commencement of the action and before any recovery.

This would require us to hold that the Legislature intended to alter the description of the process, by virtue of which the imprisonment was had, rather than the description of the place of imprisonment. I find no reason for doing this. The statute, in the first place, characterizes the process as "an execution or any other mandate against the person to enforce the recovery of a sum of money;" and in the next sentence, speaking of the imprisonment in a different place, repeats the words, "upon any execution or other mandate against the person," but does not again use the descriptive or qualifying words. This may have been to avoid the repeated use of the same words. They are to be implied, for the statute relates to a single matter, the relief of the imprisoned debtor; and this would be greatly impeded if a different meaning can be given to the second phrase.

According to the respondent, the first clause includes only final process or executions to enforce recoveries. It therefore does not include mesne process. The second, he says, includes mesne process or orders of arrest. It would follow that a debtor arrested on such process, but unable to procure bail for the limits, could not be discharged because confined within the walls, while one arrested in the same manner and already outside the walls, although within the limits, could be wholly liberated. That would seem to be an absurd conclusion and not to be adopted unless necessary to give meaning to the Act. This is avoided by construing the second clause with reference to the first, and the true meaning is that which we have above ascribed to it.

The general object of the Act in question (§ 5 of chap. 672, Laws of 1886, amending § 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure) is to limit the time of imprisonment under process issued against any person after the sum due from him had been adjudged, whether the imprisonment was within the walls of a jail, or within its liberties.

If confined within the walls the amount of the recovery or the sum to be paid by the imprisoned person determines whether the imprisonment shall end at the expiration of three months or at the expiration of six months. But if he had been admitted to the jail liberties there is no such qualification, and the six months' period applies to all cases within the Act. The defendant is not an imprisoned debtor within the Act. No execution or other mandate has been issued against him to enforce the recovery of a sum of money. No recovery has been had against him, nor has he been ordered to pay any money. We think, therefore, his discharge was improperly allowed.

The order was appealable. It deprived plaintiffs of a remedy given by statute, which they might retain until the prisoner was discharged according to law.

The orders of the General Term and Special Term should, therefore, be reversed and the motion to discharge the defendant and cancel the bond given by him for the liberties of the jail denied, with costs in all courts.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term on a verdict directed for plaintiff in an action to recover the contract price for goods manufactured and delivered. Reversed.

Reported below, 19 Jones & S. 491.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. John Frankenheimer, for appellant:

By directing a verdict for the plaintiff, the court must be regarded as ruling that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, even upon the case as presented by the defendant's testimony, and in view of any inferences which a jury might legitimately draw from the defendant's testimony, or from the whole evidence in the case.

Royce v. Watrous, 7 Daly, 87; Stone v. Flower, 47 N. Y. 566; Miner v. Mayor, 5 Jones & S. 171.

There is no absolute rule of law that the buyer's failure to return or offer to return goods upon discovering their insufficiency, is to be deemed per se an acceptance of the goods; but it is a question for the jury whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the buyer's conduct is to be interpreted as a ratification of the bargain.

Story, Sales, 4th ed. § 405; 2 Smith, L. Cas. p. 36, 7th Am. ed.

In an executory contract for the manufacture of goods with express warranty, the vendee is not bound to return the goods on discovery of a breach of the warranty, but may retain and use the articles and rely on the warranty.

As no special form of words is necessary to create a warranty, it was at least a question of fact for the jury whether what passed between the parties amounted to a warranty.

Duffee v. Mason, 8 Cow. 26; Whitney v. *Sutton, 10 Wend. 418; 2 Benj. Sales, § 932, pp. 811, 813, n. 7.

Mr. Edward S. Hatch, for respondent:

The defendant's only relief in this case was by a counterclaim for damages because of a breach of warranty, expressed or implied, he having refused to return the dies after having them in his possession four days, the defects, if any, being apparent on their face.

Day v. Pool, 52 N. Y. 416; McCormick v. Pa. Cent. R. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 65.

The defendant was only entitled to nominal damages because of any breach of warranty on the part of the plaintiff, not having given any evidence of any substantial failure to perform the contract.

Hughes v. Ferguson, 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 185; J. J. Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Haven, 31 Alb. L. J. 418; Brigg v. Hilton, 1 Cent. Rep. 807, 99 N. Y. 517.

There was no issue of fact alleged in the complaint for the trial judge to leave to the jury.

There was no dispute as to the price of the merchandise, and there was no proof of any other value than the contract price; there was no dispute but that all of the dies were manufactured by the plaintiff and that they were actually delivered to the defendant, and that they were in the actual possession of the defendant at the time the action was brought; and that the defendant had never offered to return the merchandise to the plaintiff, but on the contrary had refused to recognize that the plaintiff had any right to the possession of the merchandise.

There were no other allegations in the complaint which were denied directly or indirectly by the answer, and all of the foregoing facts referred to in the complaint were either admitted in the answer or proven conclusively at the trial; and the only questions left in the case were any issues that might have been raised by allegations contained in the answer.

Brigg v. Hilton, 1 Cent. Rep. 807, 99 N. Y. 517; Kent v. Friedman, 1 Cent. Rep. 718, 101 N. Y. 616.

Per Curiam:

The plaintiff brings this action to recover the contract price for manufacturing and delivering certain dies and frames for the defendant. The answer was that the goods were not such as the contract required, and also set up a counterclaim.

The evidence given upon the trial differed very much as to the terms and conditions of the contract, the time for its performance, the quality of the articles manufactured, their fitness for the purposes intended, and as to whether the goods delivered corresponded with the articles ordered by the defendant.

It was conceded that the plaintiff manufactured and delivered goods in quantity and number corresponding with those required by his contract, and that some faults in their character and quality were alleged, by the defendant to exist when tendered in performance of the contract. It was also proved that the plaintiff received the articles back on several occasions and attempted to remedy the alleged defects, and finally redelivered the whole quantity to the defendant. It was then still alleged by the defendant that they did not correspond with the articles which the plaintiff contracted to make for him. Three or four days after this time the plaintiff called upon the defendant for payment of the amount claimed by him to be due upon the contract which was refused by the defendant. The plaintiff thereupon demanded the return of the goods and the defendant replied in substance that he would not then give them up, as he wished to consult counsel as to his right to keep them for reimbursement of the damages which he alleged he had sustained by reason of the plaintiff's failure to perform his contract.

The evidence as to what was said by the defendant at the time of the demand was somewhat contradictory, but we believe the above statement expresses the meaning substantially of the defendant's version of the transaction.

The defendant gave no evidence as to the damages claimed to have been sustained by him on account of the alleged breach of contract.

Upon this case, aside from some immaterial circumstances which do not affect the question of law presented, the trial court ordered judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of his claim, holding that the refusal of the defendant to return the goods, when requested, amounted to an acceptance of them upon the contract. The defendant excepted to this direction. He also requested to be allowed to go to the jury on "the question of fact involved in the case, upon the whole evidence, whether the defendant did accept the frame dies or the medallions as in compliance with the order as given by him," and also upon the further question "whether the defendant did absolutely refuse to return the frame dies or the medallions, or whether it was a qualified refusal."

Both of the requests were denied by the court, and the defendant excepted.

We are inclined to think the trial court erred in these decisions, and that the case should have been left to the jury to determine as a question of fact upon the requests made by the defendant. It is now quite well settled that the acceptance by the vendee of articles manufactured for him under an executory contract, after an opportunity to examine them, precludes him from raising any question as to defects or imperfections which were visible and capable of discovery on inspection, unless there is a warranty of their quality which was intended to survive their acceptance and give the vendee further time for trial and examination.

*See digested citations at close of case, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

When there is such a warranty the vendee may still retain the goods and, when action is brought for their price, may recoup such damages as he can show he has suffered by reason of the defective or inferior character of the goods delivered. He may also in such an action recover damages for a breach of contract on the part of the vendor in respect to the time of its performance, if he can prove that he has suffered loss therefrom.

But these propositions do not seem to us to dispose of the case. When one party has the property of another in his possession and refuses to surrender it upon demand, a jury is authorized to infer from these facts a conversion of the property; but such evidence raises a question of fact alone and cannot be determined as a question of law.

We think this case is analogous to the question arising in an action of trover. Here two courses were open to the defendant to adopt in case he was dissatisfied with the performance of the contract by the plaintiff, and was satisfied that he had a warranty of the goods which would survive their acceptance. He could return the goods and plead the rescission of the contract as a defense to the action for their price, or he could keep the property, relying upon his warranty to recover such damages as he could show he had suffered by its breach as a counterclaim to the plaintiff's action for their price.

These defenses are, however, inconsistent with each other and cannot both be sustained in the same action. In case of a return of the goods and proof of their defective character, or a valid offer to rescind the contract, he makes out a defense to the claim to recover their price. If he retains the goods, however, and attempts to recoup his damages for a breach of warranty he may, provided he claims an affirmative judgment in his answer, not only defeat any recovery but recover judgment for the entire amount of damages shown by his proofs which exceed the plaintiff's claim.

It is quite uncertain on the pleadings and evidence in the case what line of defense the defendant really attempted to adopt, for the evidence was about as applicable to one theory as the other. While he admitted that he had declined to give up the goods, he strenuously insisted that he had always refused to accept them, and while denying that he ever became liable for their price he claims that he was entitled to damages for the plaintiff's nonperformance of his contract.

Under these circumstances we think it was a question for the jury to determine whether the defendant's refusal to give up the goods was an election to accept them or simply a tentative proceeding to give him further time for examination and trial, or whether it was the expression of a determination to keep them and rely upon the damages which he might be able to prove, arising upon the alleged breach of warranty as to their quality, and the nonperformance of the contract in other respects by the plaintiff.

By the direction of a verdict the defendant was deprived of the right of going to the jury on the question of the worthlessness of the goods to the defendant as a performance of the contract. The evidence upon this question was quite contradictory, and the jury might well have found either way upon the question. If they had found that the goods were utterly valueless to the defendant, he would then have made out a defense and was then entitled to a verdict at their hands. If they had found, however, that the refusal of the defendant to redeliver them was intended as an acceptance, or that the goods delivered were substantially the same as those ordered, and his refusal to return was dictated by an intention to evade the payment of the contract price, after finding that they were not adapted to the purpose he designed for them, the jury would have been justified in giving a verdict for the price.

But the question as to whether such a demand and refusal, under all the circumstances of the case, was the equivalent of an acceptance of the goods under the contract, was a question for the jury to determine, and could not be decided as a question of law.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the judgments of the courts below should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

v.
MAYOR, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of NEW YORK, Respt.

The compensation of an attorney is not, in the absence of an agreement, necessarily coextensive with the taxable costs. While the costs may be a fair measure of compensation for services in an ordinary case, or in a very small number of such cases, such measure is grossly excessive when applied to a great number of cases (here, actions for penalties for violations of the excise laws), involving no complicated questions of law and only the most simple questions of fact, and, under such circumstances, the attorney is only entitled to what his services are reasonably worth.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, reversing a judgment entered upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover for professional services as an attorney at law. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for appellant: In the absence of an agreement, the reasonable and usual charge for services is, at least, the taxable costs. It is but fair to suppose that both parties knew the customary charges, and that the appointment was made and accepted upon that basis.

People v. Supervisors of Delaware Co. 45 N.Y. 196; Van Rensselaer v. Jewell, 2 N. Y. 135; Adams v. Fort Plain Bank, 36 N. Y. 255; Mygatt v. Wilcox, 45 N. Y. 306.

The determinations or findings of a referee as to the value of professional services where there is conflicting testimony should be affirmed.

Van Every v. Adams, 10 Jones & S. 126.

While parties are now at liberty to make agreements as to compensation, the rule was settled that on the employment of an attorney, nothing being said about compensation, the implied promise was to pay him the statutory costs.

Scott v. Elmendorf, 12 Johns. 315.

If the employer relies upon an agreement for a lower rate, the burden is made to show such agreement.

Brady v. Mayor of N. Y. 1 Sandf. 569.

In the absence of such agreement the taxable costs are prima facie the measure of the attorney's compensation.

Richardson v. Brooklyn City etc. R. R. Co. 15 Abb. Pr. 342.

Mr. D. J. Dean, for respondent:

The evidence is such as to necessarily imply that McKeag, plaintiff's assignor, agreed to perform all the services rendered by him without other compensation than that which he would receive from the collection of costs from the persons, against whom actions were brought for penalties.

Before a party can be made liable for services it must not only appear that the services have been rendered, but also that they were rendered in expectation of receiving wages.

Maltby v. Harwood, 12 Barb. 473, 476; Griffin v. Potter, 14 Wend. 209; Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 312; Williams v. Finch, 2 Barb. 208; Moore v. Moore, 21 How. The judgment upon the referee's report was grossly excessive and contrary to the weight of evidence.

The claim of the plaintiff is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sues as assignee of one who was appointed by the excise commissioners of New York their attorney to prosecute actions for violations of the excise laws in their county.

He was appointed such attorney in 1858, but only actively commenced his work in 1859, and from then until 1863 his whole time, he says, was taken up in this business, but more actively at the commencement of the season when the board would meet. From 1863 his services were so slight that he did not keep a book, and it was not worth making even a memorandum of the amount of costs collected by him. His active work was thus shown to have been included within about the period of four years. The amount of the work done may be thus summarized:

He commenced 14,915 actions for violations of the law by selling liquor without a license. The names of the defendants were reported to him from the commissioners of excise, with the dates of the alleged violations, and he then filled in such names and dates in blank summonses and complaints, which required only such names and dates to make a perfect writ and pleading. Five minutes spent in this business was ample to fill out each case and indorse it, etc. In 8,656 such actions the defendants appeared, a majority by one attorney, and put in answers which were simply general denials. In 1,054 of these actions judgments were taken by default on application to the court and executions issued thereon. In 1,243 of the actions notices of trial were given and they were placed on the calendar and remained thereon twelve terms, although after the trial of four or five the judges refused to try any more, and none was tried, and the evidence shows pretty conclusively that they were not necessarily on the calendar, nor did they require any attention, owing to an understanding that they were not to be moved until a test case had been decided by the court of appeals, and they never were moved.

The county paid the disbursements for printing, for county clerk's and for sheriff's fees. The whole sum disbursed by the attorney for clerk hire and every other expense amounted to between $3,000 and $4,000. There was no agreement between the attorney and the board as to compensation. He collected and appropriated to his own use, of costs and penalties in these actions, the sum of $10,000.

This is the character of the services performed by the attorney, and their amount has been thus substantially detailed, and upon this branch there was no contradictory evidence.

The plaintiff, to prove their value, called six witnesses, one of whom had been one of the commissioners of excise during the time inquired about; and they substantially said that in their opinions, in the absence of any agreement, the attorney was entitled to be compensated at the rate of the statutory costs, and that the number of the cases would not alter their view of the matter in the least; that if it was worth that sum for one case it was for fourteen thousand. One witness seemed to regard the matter much in the same light as if the attorney had discovered a gold mine and was entitled to the rewards of his good fortune. He thought that if two hundred suits were commenced in one day (in the manner above described by the mere filling in of a name and a date in blanks left for that purpose), it was worth $10 in each suit, and therefore $2,000 a day for that service would be a fair and reasonable charge against the county. He said he looked at the whole thing, "it would only occur once in his life probably." At the same time he said that an attorney capable of doing this business could probably have been hired by the year for from $1,500 to $2,000. This he subsequently explained by saying he meant one could be hired for that sum, who superadded to his clerical ability a sufficient quantity of character to entrust him with the charge of the papers in the office—not performing the "brain work," but the mere manufacture of the paper after he had been advised by the counsel in the case. The compensation which this witness would award, including $2,000 per day for the commencement of two hundred suits, and $12,000 a month for term fees, for cases on the calendar which required no attention, and other things in like proportion, the witness said he regarded as compensation for the attorney, for "him for the moments of leisure in his life spent in the acquiring of sufficient knowledge to carry on and conduct a prosecution successfully through."

Another witness who estimated the same amount of $10 for a term fee in each case, which would amount to $12,000 a month, said such amount was in his opinion fair and just, even when nothing was done in the causes, they being simply on the calendar and requiring no watching, so long as he had cases enough to make up such total at the specified sum for each. He said in regard to all the services for which he gave an opinion as to their value, that he did not regard them "as services which involve the question of ability or professional skill," and that was the reason he gave the answer he did, which was that services of a skilled nature should be compensated more liberally in the case of an experienced lawyer than another, but that for such services as their attorney performed he would make no difference in the compensation so far as regarded any reputable member of the Bar. The matter is alluded to only to show what is, indeed, otherwise perfectly plain: that even in the opinion of at least one of plaintiff's witnesses the services of the attorney were not of a high grade, certainly, of skilled labor.

The rest of the evidence for the plaintiff is substantially of a like nature and based upon the same principles and reasoning, viz.: that however large might be the difference between the taxable costs in all these causes and the amount for which such services could have been obtained, by making an agreement with a perfectly reputable and competent attorney in regard to it beforehand, yet if that precaution happened to have been neglected, such fact was entirely unimportant in forming an opinion as to the value of those services. It is to be gathered that this surprising fact was based upon the belief of the plaintiff's witnesses that, in the absence of an agreement, the attorney was entitled to be compensated for his services in any and in all cases, no matter how great their number, at the rate of the taxable costs in each case.

The defendant on its side of the case called thirteen witnesses, many of them among the leading members of the Bar in New York City, and they one and all declared that while in the ordinary run of suits of a not very intricate nature, the compensation of an attorney might be reasonably based upon the taxable costs in a case, yet in their judgment where the cases were of the simplest possible nature, and were of such an enormous number, and the labor involved was so largely reduced to that of mere machinery as in the case under discussion, the compensation under such circumstances at the rate of taxable costs was enormously extravagant, and each one gave his opinion as to the value of such services taking it as an employment by the year (as the attorney was appointed annually), and also judging of such value by considering it with reference to each suit.

The difference between the highest amount as given by the defendant's witnesses and the lowest as measured by the plaintiff's witnesses amounted to the difference between about $40,000 or $45,000, and $313,570.

The referee signed a report for the sum last named with interest, amounting in all, after deducting what the attorney had received, to the sum of $388,156.41, for which sum with costs judgment was entered. The defendant appealed and the general term of the supreme court reversed the judgment, as well upon the facts as the law, and so stated in its order of reversal. The plaintiff then appealed to this court from the order granting a new trial, and gave the usual stipulation.

The order of the general term reversing the judgment entered upon the report of the referee and granting a new trial should be affirmed. The most limited construction of our power in reviewing questions of fact, arising as they do in this case by a reversal in the general term of the findings of fact by a referee, is broad enough to permit and to compel an affirmance of the general term ordered. The result arrived at by the referee ought to shock the common sense of every intelligent man. The idea that a lawyer of respectable character could by any possibility earn over $300,000 in the space of four or five years by services of a legal nature requiring no more legal ability than was involved in making out a summons and complaint and taking judgments by default in these excise cases, is a delusion simply; and any judicial tribunal that should determine it to be a fact would be absurdly at war with the truth and the common and universal experience of mankind.

As I have said, the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses seems to have been based upon the assumed law that if no bargain were made the attorney was entitled to the taxable costs in every case.

As a mere measure of compensation for services as an attorney performed in an ordinary case or in a very small number of such cases that rule may be very well and may furnish, under such circumstances, a fair rate of compensation. But upon a question of compensation for services performed in an enormous number of cases involving no complicated questions of law, and only the most simple of all questions of fact, taxable costs granted in each case as a measure of compensation would make it most grossly excessive. I do not think there is in truth any general rule of law that, since the Code, makes the compensation of the attorney necessarily coextensive with the taxable costs in the absence of an agreement. The counsel for the plaintiff cites, to prove that there is such a rule, certain cases, and among them, Scott v. Elmendorf, 12 Johns. 315; Brady v. Mayor, 1 Sandf. 569, and some cases in the supreme court since the Code.

The cases just above cited arose under the old fee bill, and do not touch the question under the Code. In Rooney v. Second Ave. R. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 368, which was only a question as to an attorney's lien on a judgment under the Code, Harris, J., said, as a mere expression of an opinion on a subject not decided by the court, that "In the absence of any agreement on the subject I suppose the sum recovered by the party as an indemnity for his expenses would be the measure of compensation allowed to the attorney."

Comstock, J., in the same case said: "It is not important now to determine what may be the implied agreement of the client with his attorney."

There are some cases in the supreme court which say that prima facie the implied agreement is to pay at the rate specified by the statute. I assume this statement to mean that it is in the absence of every other fact which courts might think material in judging what the implied agreement was; and as thus construed no fault need be found with it as furnishing under such circumstances prima facie evidence of what is the reasonable value of the services. But this court has said substantially what the implication is in case no special agreement was made.

In People v. Supervisors of Del. Co. 45 N. Y. 196, 202, Folger, J., said: "By the Code (§ 303) the measure of such compensation is left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties. There was no express agreement between the relator and the board of commissioners of excise what should be his compensation if it became a charge against the county. He should be paid then what his services were reasonably worth; not according to what they produced to his client, but what such services, in themselves considered, were reasonably worth, looking at the labor, time, talent and skill expended in the bestowal of them."

In Van Every v. Adams, 10 Jones & S. 126, the same rule is laid down, that the attorney in the absence of an agreement is entitled to recover what his services were reasonably worth.

If this explanation of the basis for the opinion of the plaintiff's witnesses be not accepted, and their testimony is to be construed as holding that the number, simplicity and perfect similarity of cases put in an attorney's hands by his client should have no weight in determining the principles upon which compensation is to be made, or its amount in each case, then such evidence disregards the general experience of men, which teaches all of us that in all dealings between man and man, whether of a mercantile or a professional nature, the mere fact of a large number of precisely similar things sold or services rendered, is one of the most important factors in its bearing both upon the price of the commodities sold and the amount of compensation for professional services.

A lawyer who does all the business of a solvent client, where the business amounts to a great deal, will of course take such fact into account in making up his charges, and to a still greater extent where the services were all of a similar nature and almost clerical in their character. Every lawyer knows this and has a right to remember it, whether acting as a judge or referee. Looking at it in this light the evidence for the plaintiff appears to have been given under a misapprehension of the law or else in defiance of facts which are known to every intelligent man, lawyer, judge or layman. Under such circumstances the evidence on the part of the plaintiff as to value appears to be worthless and to be wholly overwhelmed by the evidence given on the part of the defendant.

The learned referee says that all the witnesses agree that in the absence of an agreement the reasonable and usual charge is, at least, the taxable costs. I have looked through the evidence very carefully and have been unable to concur in that view. On the contrary there is a singular unanimity of dissent on the part of all the witnesses for defendant, as to the existence of any such rule under the circumstances herein detailed. If the referee were at first inclined to believe that there was any such rule applicable to a case like this, yet when he saw the enormous proportions which the compensation based thereon would assume, he might well have paused and made a most thorough review of his opinion as to the existence of any rule which in the application to the case before him would lead to so unprecedented an award.

In our judgment, based upon the whole case, the evidence was overwhelming in its nature and degree in favor of the contention of the defendant as to the value of the services performed by the plaintiff's assignor.

The order of the General Term reversing the judgment in favor of plaintiff and granting a new trial should, therefore, be affirmed with costs, and judgment absolute awarded against him upon his stipulation.

All concur.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas of New York City, affirming a judgment of the General Term of the City Court of New York, which affirmed a judgment entered upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover royalties. Affirmed.

In 1867 letters patent were granted to the plaintiff's assignor for an improvement in illuminating roofs and roof pavements, and in August, 1878, a reissue of the same was granted.

By an agreement dated November 21, 1878, the plaintiff licensed certain firms to manufacture and sell, within a certain territory named, the articles covered by the patent of 1867 as reissued in 1878, and at the same time granted to each of the said parties a license in pursuance of such agreement. On the part of the plaintiff it was agreed that she would not carry on the manufacture of articles covered by the patent, and would not grant any other license without the consent of such other parties.

The license fees were to be seventy cents per square foot manufactured, but until a court should give a decision sustaining the validity of the patent only thirty cents per square foot was to be paid; and in case the decision should be adverse, which should not be appealed from within three months, the fees under the agreement were to cease.

The parties licensed under such agreement manufactured and sold the patented articles and paid royalties therefor until some time in the year 1879, when a controversy arose between them and plaintiff, and that having been settled, an agreement was entered into November 24, 1880, reaffirming the agreement of November 21, 1878, and permitting the plaintiff to license the defendant in this action upon the same terms and conditions as those contained in the agreement of November 21, 1878. Thereafter the plaintiff and defendant, on December 28, 1880, entered into an agreement wherein the Dale Tile Manufacturing Company, Limited, consented "that the said E. A. Lake Hyatt may, without prejudice to this agreement, hereafter reissue when and as often as she shall choose, the said patent of August 27, 1867, as reissued August 6, 1878."

By such agreement the plaintiff licensed the defendant to manufacture and sell articles patented within certain territory of the United States, including the territory theretofore licensed by the plaintiff to the parties named in the agreement of November 21, 1878. It was also provided in this agreement that the parties should comply and be bound by the terms of the conditions of said agreement of 1878 and the agreement of November 24, 1880. It was also agreed that the defendant should render a regular quarterly statement of the number of square feet of illuminating work sold and sent away from its place of business, the names of the persons to whom sold, etc., and that it should pay royalties therefor at such time. Defendant proceeded to manufacture the articles patented and duly accounted for and paid royalties to August, 1881, and rendered a statement pursuant to agreement for the quarter ending October, 1881, which statement showed an indebtedness of $524.55, which sum the defendant thereafter refused to pay.

On September 27, 1881, the plaintiff caused the letters patent to be issued a second time. Defendant claimed that such reissue was absolutely void and was no protection to the licensee and absolved it from payment of royalties.

The case was referred to a referee, who found for plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly. On appeal to the general term of the city court the judgment was affirmed, and was again affirmed on appeal to the general term of the court of common pleas; and defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. Edward D. McCarthy, for appellant:

All liability of the defendant to the plaintiff arises out of the contract of 1878, to which it was admitted in 1880, and of the license granted thereunder.

When, therefore, the letters patent were surrendered, which was done September 21, 1881, these letters being the sole foundation of the license, the right of action perished. The surrender was a cancellation of the letters; from and after that date they ceased to exist.

1 Black, 273 (66 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 207); 23 Wall. 364 (90 U. S. bk. 23, L. ed. 110); 70 N. Y. 383.

But the plaintiff claims an escape from this conclusion because, as she says, she reissued the same patent on the same day, and that this reissue is now in force. This argument, to avail the plaintiff, rests on two very important assumptions, both of which must concur: first, that the issued patent was not invalid and void; and second, that the reissue was with the licensee's consent; because, of course, a void patent is no patent; and probably also a reissue without the licensee's consent would not bind him; that is to say, it would not prevent him from taking a hostile position to the patent, even assuming it to be valid, and thereby putting the patentee to an action for an infringement.

The defendant is not estopped from claiming the invalidity of the reissue.

A fundamental rule controlling the doctrine of equitable estoppel is that it must repose on a consideration. An estoppel cannot be predicated upon a nudum pactum.

Saxton v. Dodge, 57 Barb. 114.

An act or an admission of a person which shall afterwards estop him from showing the truth, must be of such a nature that the promisor will get a benefit out of it; or that the promisee will sustain an injury therefrom.

"It must, moreover, be certain to every intent and not to be taken by argument or inference."

Co. Litt. 252 b.

The promise or the act on which an estoppel can be predicated must be made or done with a bad intention.

Therefore, when void letters patent are the sole consideration of a contract, whether of sale or of license, the purchaser or the licensee is not estopped from showing want of consideration.

Bliss v. Negus, 8 Mass. 48; Hayns v. Maltby, 3 Term Rep. 438; Cross v. Huntly, 13 Wend. 385.

Marston v. Swett, 66 N. Y. 206, and the cases there cited, are not in opposition, because in them a good consideration existed for the licensee's promise.

The formal admission by a licensee that the letters patent under which he held were valid would not in itself estop him from showing the truth. It would be a naked promise only, on which estoppel could not be predicated.

Mitchell v. Barclay, Law, Dig. Pat. Cas. p. 464; Burr v. Duryee, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 275.

Of course, if the licensee derived a benefit from the license, as was the fact in the case of Marston v. Swett, he would have been estopped from showing the invalidity of the letters, when sued for fees.

Taylor v. Hare, 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 260; Williams v. Hicks, 2 Vt. 36.

If the licensee received what he bargained for, it would be a breach of good faith to refuse to pay for it. Hence, the universal rule which controls between landlord and tenant. A tenant in possession is estopped from denying the title of the landlord, who has given him possession and quiet enjoyment, and to whom he has promised to surrender at the end of the term. But this rule does not obtain between vendor and vendee, although a deed of conveyance was passed.

Blight v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535 (20 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 535); Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 615 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1051).

Nor is there the least analogy between a tenant in possession, and the holder of a license. A license is nothing but a permission to make use of an invention exclusively reserved to another. If there is no exclusive right, no invention, no protection, the licensee gets nothing at all.

Neither would the principle of estoppel be applied in favor of a pretended landlord, who had never given possession, nor use, and who never had the power to do so.

Saxton v. Dodge, 57 Barb. 113.

In Marston v. Swett, the plaintiff and the defendant were tenants in common of the patent, all believing it to be valid. Each had the right to manufacture, and to license others to manufacture under it. The defendants desired the exclusive right to use the invention and hence made the agreement with the plaintiff. Under it, they actually enjoyed the exclusive right which they sought, and the plaintiff gave up all right to manufacture, or to license others to manufacture.

In the case at bar, reissued letters were not even apparently valid. They could have conferred upon licensees no privilege whatever, because infringers were almost numberless; and no action against any of them could have been or was maintained.

The defendant took no license, nor made any contract under these letters. A contract can be implied, only on the assumption that the reissue was valid and within the permission given in a former license.

The manufacture of the product of the alleged invention was free to the public. Not one element set forth as controlling in Marston v. Swett, exists in this case.

The underlying facts in Marston v. Swett were that the patent was apparently valid; that it was generally respected; and that it gave protection to its licensee; otherwise, that contract would not have been upheld.

Mr. George W. Van Slyck, for respondent:

It is well settled law in this State that in a suit upon a contract for license the validity of the patent cannot be inquired into.

Marsh v. Dodd, 4 Hun, 278; Marston v. Swett, 66 N. Y. 206; S. C. 82 N. Y. 526.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think this case is controlled by that of Marston v. Swett, reported upon two appeals to this court. See 66 N. Y. 206; 82 N.Y. 526.

The general and material features of the two cases are similar. In both there was an agreement on the part of the plaintiff to refrain from manufacturing in consideration, among other things, of the promise of defendant to pay the royalties. While continuing the manufacture under the license, the defendant ought not to escape liability to pay the royalties.

The defendant's counsel, it is true, seeks to distinguish this case from Marston v. Swett, supra, because, as he says, since the reissue of the patent in 1881, which he insists was wholly void, the defendant has had no protection from the manufacture by others, for the reason that by the surrender of the patent of 1878, and the reissue of 1881, there was no valid patent in existence; and the consideration for the promise to pay royalties had therefore wholly failed.

There was consideration enough for the promise to pay such royalties, in that the plaintiff bound herself not to manufacture, and because the defendant could not be called to account as an alleged infringer while manufacturing under the license.

If it were a question of the validity of the reissue of 1881, and a decision of that question were necessary to the decision of this case, the defendant is of course correct in his claim that a state court has no jurisdiction to determine such an issue. But within the decision of the Marston Case no such question arises. The defendant has protection enough to base its promise to pay royalties upon, as long as it so conducts itself towards plaintiff as to prevent her from treating it as an infringer.

In other words, so long as the defendant continues to manufacture under its license (the patent not having been legally annulled), and thus elects to treat the agreement as in existence, it prevents the plaintiff from treating defendant in any other light than that of a licensee. If defendant desired to repudiate any obligation under this agreement, it should have given notice to plaintiff that it refused to longer recognize its binding force, and that it would thereafter manufacture under a claim of right founded upon the alleged invalidity of the patent. Otherwise, the defendant (in claiming to manufacture under the license and in refusing to pay the royalties thereunder) would, if successful, prevent the plaintiff from recovering any thing from it. She could not treat the defendant as an infringer, because it was manufacturing under a license from her; and she could not collect the royalties under the license (although herself refraining from manufacturing, as she had agreed), because the defendant would allege the invalidity of the patent, although continuing to manufacture under cover of a license from its owner.

Such doctrine cannot stand a moment. Of course, as is said in the Marston Case, from the time that the patent is annulled by proper legal proceedings no royalties could be collected, even though no notice of a repudiation of the agreement had been thereafter served.

There is another ground upon which it seems to me this judgment might well rest. Under the clause in the agreement between the parties which provided for a forfeiture of all rights thereunder, if one party should willfully violate one of its provisions, the plaintiff gave notice of such forfeiture to defendant based upon its refusal to pay the royalties which it had acknowledged to be due for the quarter ending October 31, 1881, the very quarter in question here, an account of which it had rendered under the oath of its secretary, as provided for in such agreement. Subsequent to the service of such notice the plaintiff withdrew the same at the request of defendant, and upon its promise to pay these very royalties which it had already acknowledged to be due. A failure to carry out such promise gives, as it seems to me, a good cause of action.

The defendant says there was no consideration for such a promise because there was no patent upon which to ground a license, and the defendant therefore had no license and no protection. But the plaintiff of course contended that the reissued patent was valid, and at the request of defendant the plaintiff withdrew her notice of forfeiture of the license, and thus reinstated the defendant in its possession and freed it from the liability to be proceeded against as an infringer, and put to expense and inconvenience in the defense of such a litigation. This was saved at the request of defendant and upon its special promise to pay the royalties. Plainly, here was a good and sufficient consideration for defendant's promise.

1. As a general rule, when an appliance, or machine, or structure not obviously dangerous, has been in daily use for years, and has uniformly proved adequate, safe and convenient, its use may be continued without the imputation of culpable imprudence or carelessness.

2. A woman, in alighting from a railroad car at a station, in the night time, fell and was injured, and sued the railroad company for negligence in that the station platform was too far from the car. The evidence was that the plaintiff passed from the car to the second step of the car platform, which was two feet and two inches from the side of the station platform and about four inches lower than the top thereof, and without having hold of the iron railing, and without looking to see the station platform, she stepped out, and failing to reach it, fell. The car had a third step which was eight inches below the top of the station platform, and one foot and seven inches from the side thereof. The station platform, as then constructed, had been in use for several years, and no one had ever before been injured or inconvenienced on account of its distance from the cars. Held, that the company was not legally responsible for the accident.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Niagara Circuit on a verdict of $2,000 damages in an action to recover for injuries sustained in alighting from defendant's car. Reversed.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. George C. Greene, for appellant.

Mr. W. S. Oliver, for respondent.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff in alighting from one of the defendant's cars, and the circumstances of the accident are as follows: the train in which she was a passenger reached the station at Dayton in this State, on the 20th day of January, 1880, at 8 o'clock in the evening, and she left the car for the purpose of changing to another train at that place, and in her effort to step from the car to the station platform, she fell between it and the car, and sustained the injuries of which she complains. She alleges that the space between the platform and the car was too great, and that, in consequence thereof, when she stepped off from the car she failed to reach the platform and was thus caused to fall. There is no complaint that the platform was out of repair, or that it was improperly constructed. The only complaint is that it was too far from the car. The platform was 2¼ feet higher than the top of the iron rail, and about three feet above the top of the ground. The distance between the outer line of the car and the platform was eleven inches. There were three steps at the end of the car, and the lower one was eight inches below the top of the platform and one foot and seven inches from the side thereof. The second step was two feet and two inches from the side of the platform and about four inches lower than the top thereof. The height of the platform of the car above the iron rails was about four feet. The plaintiff passed out of the car on to the car platform and then to the second step, and without having hold of the iron railing on either side, and without looking to see the station platform, she stepped out and, failing to reach it, fell.

There was no proof that the platform was not constructed in the ordinary way, not that the space between it and the car was any greater than the exigencies of the business and the operations of the railroad required. There was no evidence that any accident had ever happened at that station before on account of the construction of the platform, or that there had ever been any complaint in reference to it. On the contrary, the evidence shows that the platform had been used for many years by men, women, and children, and that no one but the plaintiff had ever been injured or had suffered any inconvenience on account of the distance of the platform from the cars. Thousands of men, women and children must have passed from the cars to this platform in entire safety.

Under such circumstances, how can it be properly said that the defendant was guilty of any carelessness in its construction and maintenance? It was not bound so to construct this platform as to make accidents to passengers using the same impossible, or to use the highest degree of diligence to make it safe, convenient and useful. It was bound simply to exercise ordinary care, in view of the dangers attending its use, to make it reasonably adequate for the purposes to which it was devoted. In the case of a platform which had always been safe, and answered its purpose for men, women and children, in all kinds of weather, by night and by day, for many years, what was there to suggest to any prudent person any change or improvement for the purpose of making it more safe or convenient?

In the case of Dowgan v. Champlain Transp. Co. 56 N. Y. 1, the plaintiff's intestate, a passenger, slipped under the gangway rail of a steamboat, fell overboard and was drowned; and it appeared that all the boats upon Lake Champlin were constructed in the same manner, that they had been so run for many years, and there was no proof tending to show that anyone had ever before gone overboard in that way. It was held that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited. Grover, J., writing the opinion said:

"It will be seen that the only proof of negligence was the omission to inclose the space between the railing and deck so as to preclude the possibility of slipping under it. Had there been any proof tending to show that any such danger would be apprehended by a reasonable, prudent person, the evidence should have been submitted to the jury. But the evidence showed that all the passenger boats upon the lake had been constructed and run in the same way in this respect; that boats had so been run for a great number of years, and there was no proof tending to show that anyone had ever before fallen and gone overboard under the railing, or that any such danger had been apprehended by anyone. It is obvious that no such thing was likely to occur."

In Loftus v. Union Ferry Co. 84 N. Y. 455, plaintiff's intestate, a child six years old, while leaving one of defendant's boats, fell through one of the openings in the guard rails into the water and was drowned. The plaintiff recovered; and it was held that the verdict was properly set aside. Andrews, J., writing the opinion of the court said: "The law does not impose upon the defendant the duty of so providing for the safety of passengers that they shall encounter no possible danger, and meet with no casualty in the use of appliances provided for it. It was possible for the defendant so to have constructed the guard that such an accident as this could not have happened; and this, so far as appears, could have been done without unreasonable expense or trouble. If the defendant ought to have foreseen that such an accident might happen, or if such an accident could have reasonably been anticipated, the omission to provide against it would be actionable negligence. But the facts rebut any inference of negligence on this ground. The company had the experience of years, certifying to the sufficiency of the guard. That it was possible for a child, even a man, to get through the opening was apparent enough; but that this was likely to occur was negatived by the fact that multitudes of persons had passed over the bridge without the occurence of such a casualty."

In Burke v. Witherbee, 98 N. Y. 562, while an empty car was descending a mine, the hook which fastened it to the cable became detached from the car and it ran down the mine and killed plaintiff's intestate. The judgment for plaintiff was reversed because there was not sufficient proof of actionable negligence on the part of the defendants. The judge writing the opinion said:

"In this mine alone cars drawn by a hook must have made several hundred thousand passages without a single accident. What more could any reasonable or prudent man have to justify him in believing that this convenient appliance was also a safe and proper one? What greater or different tests could it have been subjected to before a mine owner could use it without the imputation of negligence? It seems to us quite inadmissible, if not preposterous, to attribute negligence to a mine owner for using an implement which had been employed in different mines, and which under varying conditions, upon countless occasions, uniformly answered its purpose without injury to anyone."

The application of these authorities to this case is quite obvious. No structure is ever so made that it may not be made safer. But as a general rule when an appliance, or machine, or structure not obviously dangerous has been in daily use for years, and has uniformly proved adequate, safe and convenient, its use may be continued without the imputation of culpable imprudence or carelessness.

On the evening when this accident happened, the evidence tends to show that it was dark, and that the platform was not plainly visible. It was somewhat lighted by light which came from the car windows, the depot windows and a lantern in the hands of the conductor; and it does not appear that it was ever lighted in any other way, or that it was usual to light such platforms in any other way. The fact that it was dark made it incumbent upon the plaintiff to take the greater care. She could have kept hold of the iron railing until her foot touched the platform and then she would have been safe. It was not the duty of the defendant to furnish some one to aid her in alighting from the car.

There was some proof that about the time the plaintiff attempted to step from the car upon the platform, there was a slight jerk, or jar of the car; but it does not appear that that had anything whatever to do with the accident.

A careful consideration, therefore, of the whole case as it appears in this record, has led us to the conclusion that the defendant is not legally responsible for the accident which befell the plaintiff. It was a misadventure; and no rule of law will permit her to charge the misfortune in whole or in part to the defendant.

The judgment should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial ordered; costs to abide event.

All concur.

1. The first count of a complaint seeking to enjoin the maintenance of a fence, alleged that plaintiff was in possession of certain hotel premises and that the fence in question, built and maintained by the defendant railroad company, was an obstruction to a public street adjacent to the hotel, and a nuisance; the second count alleged that defendant had failed to maintain an opening through the fence as it was bound to do, etc. At the trial defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, on the ground that so far as appeared therefrom plaintiff was a stranger to the whole matter and did not appear as party or privy to any contract. Held, that an amendment of the complaint, setting up a lease of the hotel premises from the owners thereof to plaintiff, was properly allowed.
2. Although the first count of the complaint, being based upon the obstruction of a highway, could not be maintained when it appeared that, by the failure of the public to accept a dedication, the land referred to was not a highway, yet the second count, based upon a claim of a right to an opening from the railroad premises into the alley appurtenant to the hotel, for the access of passengers and baggage, and stating that by erecting the fence defendant had violated that right, to plaintiff's damage, was maintainable.
3. Held, that said lessee, the present plaintiff, could not raise the question of the validity of deeds executed by his lessor, to convey certain interests to the defendant, amounting to an abandonment of all claims to the land in question as a highway.
4. The premises occupied by plaintiff and those the access to which was obstructed by defendant railroad company had originally belonged to the same person, and in the deed to defendant it was stated that "this conveyance is upon the express condition that the said railroad company, their successors or assigns, shall at all times maintain an opening into the premises hereby conveyed, opposite to the Exchange Hotel (the premises now leased by plaintiff), adjacent to the premises hereby conveyed, for the convenient access of passengers," etc. Held, from the language used and in view of the situation and use of the premises, that this provision was not intended to create a condition subsequent, but was intended to be an agreement or covenant running with the land, providing for access or right of way, so as to continue or enhance the value of the hotel property, in favor of its owner or lessee, the latter of whom has such an interest in its existence as the courts will recognize and protect; but the relief to which he is entitled is limited to the language of such covenant, viz.: an opening through the fence,—and he is not entitled to a removal of the entire fence.

APPEAL from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of Buffalo, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the erection of a fence and to abate or remove the same. Reversed nisi.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. George C. Greene, for appellant:

I. The evidence fails to establish that the strip of land, thirty feet in width, adjoining the hotel, is or was a public street or highway.

To prove a highway by dedication, three facts must be shown: first, the intention to dedicate; second, an act of dedication; third, the acceptance by the public.

State v. Green, 41 Iowa, 693; Buchanan v. Curtis, 25 Wis. 99; Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73; Cook v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 454.

Without acceptance and ratification by the public, in this case of the City of Buffalo, there was no dedication, and the public acquired no rights under the deed from Wadsworth; and until acceptance the offer to dedicate could be withdrawn, or the dedication be revoked.

40 N. Y. 442–450; 19 Johns. 186; 16 Barb. 251; 2 Abb. N. C. 386, 395, 397; 14 Barb. 328; 61 N. Y. 454; 66 N. Y. 261–269; 94 N. Y. 16.

The plaintiff's case does not show that he has any right, title or interest in the thirty feet strip, by virtue of any lease, grant, covenant or condition, or otherwise. The complaint is based solely upon his alleged right to use the thirty feet strip as a public street; and that question being decided adversely to him, his complaint should be dismissed.

II. The clause in the deeds of 1857, under which plaintiff claimed some rights on the trial, is clearly and strictly a condition subsequent, and nothing else.

The words usually employed to create a condition, are "on condition." Where the explicit words which denote the condition are used, they will not be construed into a covenant.

1 Hilliard, Real Prop. § 26, p. 381; § 27, p. 382.

A covenant by grantee, not to build except under certain restrictions, constitutes a valid condition subsequent.

2 Abb. N. C. 56.

Conditions are strictly construed.

Woodworth v. Payne, 74 N. Y. 196; 62 N. Y. 592.

Conditions subsequent are not favored in the law, but are construed strictly. They can only be reserved for the benefit of the grantor and his heirs; and no others can take advantage of a breach of them. Right of re-entry for breach of condition subsequent does not pass by a conveyance of land, and until there is a re-entry by the grantor or his heirs, for the breach, the estate is not forfeited, but remains unimpaired in the grantee, and a mere stranger cannot take advantage of it.

Towle v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, 312; Nicoll v. New York etc. R. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 131, 134, 135; 22 Wend. 201; 8 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cases, 734; 63 Mo. 68; 46 Barb. 109; 134 Mass. 82, 85; 70 N. Y. 303, 312.

III. The plaintiff has no easement in the thirty feet strip. None is granted to him by his lease, and if an easement existed and was held by his lessor, the lessor and not the plaintiff now has it. The plaintiff also claimed that his lessor is seised in fee of the ten feet strip (part of the thirty, and of an undivided half of the other twenty feet. If this be so, then no "easement" existed, because "No one can have an easement in his own land."

Huttemeier v. Albro, 2 Bosw. 546, 556.

IV. The clause in the deed of 1857 in question, cannot be construed as a covenant or a reservation.

Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 315, 322.

It is well settled that an exception or reservation to a third person, not a party to the deed, is void.

Id.; Stevens v. Adams, 1 Thomp. & C. 587–589; 34 Barb. 566; 24 Hun, 430.

The plaintiff failed to show himself entitled to recover any damages of the defendant, or that he had sustained any damages by reason of the erection or maintenance of the fence.

Mr. Truman C. White, for respondent:

I. The amendment did not introduce a new cause of action; it tended to justice, and was, therefore, properly allowed.

Fogg v. Edwards, 20 Hun, 90.

If causes of action were improperly joined, the remedy was by demurrer.

Code, § 488.

The objection, not having been taken by answer or demurrer, was waived.

Code, § 499.

II. To establish a disputed right of way it is always competent to prove user; and twenty years' uninterrupted and unqualified enjoyment of a right of way is decisive evidence of a grant.

Wiswall v. Lansing, 5 How. Pr. 77.

III. The damages awarded were only to the commencement of the action, and therefore the evidence could not have affected the rights of the defendant injuriously. Its reception, even if erroneous, is not ground for reversal of the judgment.

Lathrop v. Bramhall, 64 N. Y. 365; People v. Fernandez, 35 N. Y. 49.

While the evidence of the difference in the receipts of the hotel and restaurant in corresponding months, with and without the nuisance there, may not have been admissible definitely to fix the damage, yet it was admissible as one of the means by which the court might arrive at the proper measure of compensation.

Albert v. Bleecker St. R. R. Co. 2 Daly, 389; Wood, Nuis. § 876; St. John v. Mayor etc. of New York, 13 How. Pr. 527.

But the case shows that the court held the measure of damages to be the difference in the rental value; and so it has been repeatedly adjudged by the courts in this State.

Wiel v. Stewart, 19 Hun, 272; Francis v. Schoellkopf, 53 N. Y. 152; Jutte v. Hughes, 67 N. Y. 267.

IV. The facts establish beyond question the existence of a right of way over the alley as an easement or appurtenant annexed to the fee of the hotel premises.

Re Opening of Eleventh Ave. 81 N. Y. 436; Child v. Chappell, 9 N. Y. 246; Kings County Fire Ins Co. v. Stevens, 87 N. Y. 287; White's Bank of Buffalo v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 65; Wiggins v. McCleary, 49 N. Y. 346; Cox v. James, 45 N. Y. 557.

V. The language of the deeds in question does not constitute a condition subsequent, but does constitute a covenant.

2 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. pp. 2, 6, 7; Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 315; Bridger v. Pierson, 45 N. Y. 601; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 53; Countryman v. Deck, 13 Abb. N. C. 110.

Peckham, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff is lessee of certain premises in Buffalo which were originally divided from premises of defendant by a strip of land thirty feet wide, and running from east to west 240 feet, and thence north about 100 feet. All of the property once belonged to one James Wadsworth who in 1844 granted and conveyed a portion of it to defendant's predecessor for the purpose of a passenger and freight depot, and for no other purpose, and described this above mentioned strip of land, thirty feet wide, as thereby dedicated for the purpose of a public street.

Some question was made upon the trial as to the right of defendant to use, for the purpose of a railroad restaurant, any portion of the property thus conveyed; but the court held under the other facts in the case that defendant's right to so use it could not now be successfully questioned, and there has been no appeal from such decision, and so the question may be dismissed from our consideration.

In 1850 James Wadsworth died, leaving a will by which he devised to his children the land not theretofore conveyed to defendant's predecessor, being one quarter to each of his two sons, and one quarter to his executors in trust for his daughter Elizabeth Wadsworth, and one quarter to his executors in trust for his grandson, Martin Brimmer, Jr.

So far as the evidence in the case shows, this left the title, not only to the premises leased by the plaintiff but also to the thirty feet strip of land already mentioned, in the devisees under the will of James Wadsworth, because of the lack of any acceptance of the dedication on the part of the public authorities, which will be again referred to.

In 1853 partition of the lands now leased by plaintiff (which lands excluded the thirty feet strip) was made, by which one half of such premises was conveyed to the trustees of Martin Brimmer, Jr., and one half to Charles James Murray, who was then an infant. Both conveyances bounded the premises by the line of this thirty feet strip, called therein an "alley."

In 1857 the trustees of Brimmer and the general guardian of Murray, conveyed by quitclaim deeds to defendant's predecessor an undivided one half part of that portion of the strip in question being twenty feet wide and adjoining the lands of the said predecessor theretofore conveyed to it by James Wadsworth in his lifetime. This left the title to the remaining ten feet of such strip unaffected, while an undivided half of the interest in the twenty feet just mentioned remained in the other devisees under the will of Wadsworth, assuming that Brimmer's and Murray's trustees and guardian held title to one quarter each, and that it was conveyed to the defendant's predecessor by the deeds above mentioned.

These deeds of the twenty feet contained a provision permitting the construction of a building thereon at the discretion of the Railroad Company by a wall along the line bounding on the remaining ten feet, and with roof projecting over such ten feet strip a reasonable width for eaves trough and water conductor, such projection to be on sufferance of the grantors provided they should want at any time to build on the land. Both these deeds also contained the following language:

"This conveyance is upon the express condition that the said Railroad Company, their successors or assigns, shall at all times maintain an opening into the premises hereby conveyed opposite to the Exchange Hotel, so called," the premises now leased by plaintiff, "adjacent to the premises hereby conveyed, for the convenient access of passengers and their baggage to and from said premises hereby conveyed, which opening shall at no time be closed against such passengers and their baggage; subject, however, to all proper regulations of police and railroad discipline of persons on the said premises."

Subsequent to the execution of these deeds and in May, 1857, defendant's predecessor executed quitclaim deeds to the trustees of Brimmer above mentioned, and to the general guardian of Murray, of an undivided half of the remaining ten feet of said "alley;" although it nowhere appears that such predecessor had any title to such ten feet. By mesne conveyances in or about September, 1873, Edward R. Hammatt having become trustee for Brimmer, Jr., as such trustee became, and has ever since been, the owner of the premises now leased to plaintiff, which premises are bounded by, and do not include in the conveyances or lease, any portion of the strip of land heretofore spoken of, although plaintiff claims a right of way over the thirty feet strip dedicated for a public street by said James Wadsworth in his deed of January, 1844.

Soon after the execution of the deeds to the Railroad Company above mentioned, the Company laid its tracks along this twenty feet of the thirty feet strip which lies south of the premises leased by plaintiff, and has ever since used the tracks for running its cars into and out of its depot at the west end of such strip. It appears also that there has been, since the conveyance by Wadsworth in 1844, and upon the premises retained by him and bounded by this thirty feet strip, a hotel, which has been accessible from defendant's depot across its tracks, and which has depended largely for its patronage and custom upon the passengers arriving at and departing from such depot of defendant; and up to August, 1881, this thirty feet strip (excepting as twenty feet of it were used by defendant's tracks as above stated) has been open and used by the occupants of the hotel and by travelers as above described, and by the public. In May, 1881, the said Hammatt, as trustee of Brimmer, leased to plaintiff the hotel spoken of for three years, at the annual rent of $4,000; and the plaintiff entered into possession under such lease, and has been and is now carrying on such hotel and restaurant.

The further fact was proved that the right of way across this thirty feet strip is beneficial to the hotel and restaurant, and to the plaintiff's possession, and is an appurtenance thereto of great value.

In August, 1881, the defendant entered upon the said strip or alley and built a high and substantial fence the whole length of the strip, and on the edge of the twenty feet bordering on the remaining ten feet thereof; and such fence has been kept closed against the plaintiff and all others; and the defendant has thus wholly excluded the plaintiff, his servants, the guests of the hotel and all others from entering upon such twenty feet. The fence is thus a total obstruction in the way of any passage across such twenty feet to all persons coming from the depot to the hotel, or from the hotel to the depot, who might otherwise reach either place by traveling over this twenty feet, and in this way such obstruction has very greatly lessened the patronage of the hotel and damaged thereby the plaintiff, up to the commencement of this action, in the sum of $300 as found by the trial judge.

This action was brought to enjoin the continuance of such fence and to recover damages for the time which it had stood. The complaint contained two counts, the first one stating the facts of the conveyance to defendant's predecessor and the dedication of the strip as a public street, and that the parties to the conveyance agreed mutually that the strip should remain and be a public street, and that it was necessary for the proper enjoyment of the hotel and restaurant that this strip should remain a public street. The plaintiff then set forth the erection of the fence, and thus, as he said, defendant wrongfully excluded him from the public street; and he further alleged that such fence was a nuisance.

In the second count the strip was called an alley or public highway, and the plaintiff claimed to have an easement or right of way or access across or to the twenty feet strip in question. The plaintiff also alleged (evidently with reference to the language of the deeds to the Railroad Company in 1857) that the defendant had not, since the erection of the fence, maintained an opening into that part of the alley appurtenant to the southerly side of said hotel for the convenient access of passengers and their baggage "to and from the alley or public highway as of right it should have done and was bound to do," and that it had thereby deprived passengers and their baggage of convenient access to said alley or public highway, and thus prevented such passengers and their baggage from entering said hotel at all across or by means of said alley or public highway.

The plaintiff then alleged the tracks and the fence to be a nuisance, and asked for an injunction restraining defendant from continuing to permit its tracks to remain in the public street or alley, or from continuing the fence, etc. The answer of defendant was substantially a general denial.

When the case came on for trial the counsel for the defendant moved to dismiss the complaint because, so far as the complaint therein showed, the plaintiff was an entire stranger to the whole matter, as the only allegation on that subject was that he was in possession of the premises, and he did not appear as party or privy to any covenant or provision whatever. The plaintiff then moved to amend by, in effect, setting up his lease from the owner; to which defendant's counsel objected that the amendment was not such a one as could be made upon the trial, and that it set up a new and distinct cause of action, and one which was on contract or covenant, and which could not be joined with an action for damages for a nuisance. The objections were overruled, and the trial proceeded. The facts heretofore stated were found by the judge, who tried the cause without a jury, and a judgment was decreed enjoining the continuance of the fence, and providing for its removal and for the recovery of the damages sustained by plaintiff, being the sum of $800. The general term affirmed the judgment, and the defendant appealed to this court.

We think the amendment allowed by the court was a proper exercise of discretion. It was in no sense the introduction of a new cause of action. Upon defendant's own objection, and assuming it to be well founded, the cause of action in the complaint was defectively stated, because it showed no right or interest on the part of plaintiff to take advantage of the rights, if there were any, of the owner of the premises known as the hotel property. For the purpose of obviating that objection and to show that the plaintiff had the same rights in the property so far as to take advantage of the covenants in regard to it which its owner had, the allegation of the lease was added to the other allegations in the complaint.

The defendant's counsel now claims that it appears from the uncontradicted facts that there never was any public street over or on this thirty feet strip, because there never was any acceptance of the dedication on the part of the city authorities or any control over it ever assumed by them. He further argues that the plaintiff, under the pleadings, is not entitled to any relief, for the reason that his rights are therein based upon the alleged fact of the strip being a public street, and when that fact fails his rights fail with it.

The concession that there was no public street must be made, and for the reasons stated. It must also be conceded that the plaintiff does in his complaint allege, especially in his first count, that this strip is a public street or highway, and he alleges the fence to be a nuisance for that reason. In the second count, however, we think there are facts enough alleged, especially when the question does not appear to have been very clearly raised before, upon which can be spelled out the assertion of a right on the part of the plaintiff to have access to, and to some extent a right of way over, this strip, even if it be not to all intents and purposes a public highway.

In the second count the plaintiff speaks of there being, as appurtenant to the hotel, an easement which he describes, it is true, by metes and bounds, but which a reading of the whole count enables one to say is the allegation of an easement consisting of a right of way over or across some portion of this strip of land for passengers and their baggage, and that the defendant, having erected the fence, had left no opening therein at certain places which were appurtenant to the southerly side of said hotel which of right the defendant should have done.

This is clearly a claim founded, not upon the fact that this strip was a highway, and that as such any obstruction thereof was illegal, but it is a claim founded upon a totally different basis; a claim of a right to an opening into the alley appurtenant to the southerly side of the hotel, and for the convenient access of passengers and their baggage; and it was a statement that by erecting this fence the defendant has violated that right and has thereby prevented such passengers and their baggage from entering said hotel, to plaintiff's damage. All that was lacking in this language, to show exactly what fact the claim was founded upon, was the statement that the right of way was reserved by the deeds of Wadsworth, as trustee and guardian, executed in 1857. It might have been ground for a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain; but the claim is obviously not based upon rights arising solely from the assumption that the strip of land was at all events a public highway. If the plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to any relief on this branch of the case by virtue of the reservation in those deeds and which he could obtain on no other ground, I think it should be granted him without the necessity of a reversal of the judgment, because that ground was not specially alleged, and an application to amend his complaint by setting up that right in exact and plain language before entering upon the new trial which would be awarded.

By the failure to accept the dedication the thirty feet in question remained the property of Wadsworth, and descended to his devisees at his death. By the deeds of the trustees of Brimmer and the guardian of Murray, all the estate of Brimmer and Murray in the twenty feet of the strip in question was conveyed to the Railroad Company. Such interest was said to be the equal undivided one half part of such portion. But whatever it was, up to that amount, such estate was conveyed to the Company. The title of Murray to about one half of the property upon which the hotel stands, and which was bounded upon the said strip was substantially conveyed to the trustee of Brimmer who is the lessor of the plaintiff. Whatever rights therefore, which the other devisees under the will of James Wadsworth may have in this twenty feet of the original thirty feet strip, as tenants in common with the Company, about which we say nothing, as nothing is required to be said in this case, it is clear that the present plaintiff who claims as lessee of the lessor who executed these deeds of 1857, to the Railroad Company, cannot raise the question of their invalidity to convey the interest of the cestui que trust and infant Brimmer and Murray. They must be regarded as valid deeds and as conveying all the interests of Brimmer and Murray in this twenty feet to the Railroad Company; and such grantors must be regarded as thereby abandoning all claim to the same as a public street or highway. They are no longer tenants in common with anyone.

The sole remaining question therefore is: What rights, if any, were reserved to Brimmer and Murray by those deeds of 1857? The grantors in those deeds contemplated the possible if not probable erection of a building over this twenty feet, showing thereby a clear intent to abandon all pretense of a claim for its use as a public street or highway, even if such abandonment were not otherwise conclusively shown by the execution of the deeds.

But the deeds contained, in addition, language providing for an opening and access to this twenty feet, which language has already been quoted; and the plaintiff claims that if the deeds are valid, this language under all circumstances must be construed to be a covenant and the burden thereof as running with the land conveyed and in favor of those having a legal interest in the hotel lands, and that such covenant makes the right of access and transit to and across this twenty feet a right or easement appurtenant to the hotel premises. On the other hand the defendant claims that the language used makes a condition subsequent which cannot be taken advantage of by any but the grantor and his heirs.

We incline to the construction contended for by the plaintiff. The fact that the deeds use the language "upon condition," when referring to the conveyance by the grantors, is not conclusive that the intention was to create an estate strictly upon condition. The question is always: What was the intention of the parties? And while such intention is to be gathered from the language used, yet its construction may frequently be aided by reference to all the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of the execution of the deeds, because the court is thus enabled to be placed exactly in their situation, and to view the case in the light of such surroundings.

From the language of the first deed from Wadsworth to defendant's predecessor, in which the land is conveyed to it for the purpose of a passenger and freight depot only (taken in connection with the fact of the existence of a hotel and restaurant at that time on the land retained by him), and looking at the further fact that from 1844 to 1857 this strip in question had been kept open, and full access to the depot and the hotel on Wadsworth's property was had over this strip by passengers, guests and the public in general, and that the patronage of the hotel was largely dependent upon the traveling public coming to and departing from said depot—all these facts would lead one to the unhesitating conclusion that the language used in those deeds in 1857 was for the benefit of the hotel property and was not meant to create a condition subsequent, which courts regard with no very friendly eye, upon a failure to perform which the estate was to be forfeited, and which none but the grantor or his heirs could take advantage of. It was intended to be an agreement or covenant between the parties running with the land, providing for this access or right of way so as to continue or enhance the value of the hotel property by providing for such easy access to it from defendant's depot for passengers and baggage. See Stanley v. Colt, 5 Wall. 119 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 502]; Countryman v. Deck, 13 Abb. N. C. 110.

Courts frequently in arriving at the meaning of the words in a written instrument construe that which is in form a condition, a breach of which forfeits the whole estate, into a covenant on which only the actual damage can be recovered. See Hilliard, Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 526, § 13; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. chap. 14, subd. 3, p. 3 et seq.

It is asserted, however, that if this language be treated as a covenant, still the plaintiff cannot take advantage of it, as he is not a party or privy to it.

The grantors in these deeds were also the owners of the hotel property, and the easement provided for in the deeds for the transit of passengers and their baggage over this twenty feet must be construed as reserved, not for their benefit in any sense, but as an easement reserved for the benefit and in favor of the grantors being owners of the remaining hotel property, and as appurtenant to it, and fairly necessary for its full and proper enjoyment. It therefore runs with the hotel property and in favor of its owner or lessee, the latter of whom has such an interest in its existence as courts will recognize and protect.

As the rights of the plaintiff are in our view dependent upon the deeds of 1857, the judgment must be in accordance with their terms. The courts below erred in not limiting the relief granted to plaintiff by the language of such deeds. As the judgment provided for a full and entire destruction of the fence in question, it must be reversed and a new trial ordered, or else it must be modified so as to provide for an opening into the strip through that or any other fence or obstruction, of a size reasonable, proper and fit, which shall be opposite to the hotel and adjacent to the premises conveyed by the deeds, and large enough for the convenient access of passengers and their baggage to and from the said strip, which opening must at no time be closed against such passengers and their baggage, and which access must be subject to all proper regulations of police and railroad discipline of persons on the said premises.

We shall order a reversal of the judgment, although a modification as above stated could be easily provided for, unless the plaintiff consents to waive the damages he recovered in the courts below. We do this because we are greatly dissatisfied with the evidence upon which the recovery as to the damages was based. It was exceedingly vague and loose, if not, to some extent, guess work.

It seems also to have been made, to some extent at least, upon a mistaken view as to the defendant's rights and liabilities under its deeds from Wadsworth to the trustee and guardian. Evidence seems also to have been offered and received upon assumption of the right of the plaintiff to a totally unobstructed access to and transit across this whole thirty feet in controversy at all times, ignoring the limitations of the right, as contained in the deeds of 1857, to the Railroad Company. Some portion of the damages may also have been awarded on account of the restaurant in defendant's depot, and its consequent effect upon the patronage of plaintiff's restaurant, and upon the rental value of plaintiff's hotel, which the learned judge thought after all was the criterion for the damages sustained by plaintiff.

Under these circumstances we are disposed to order a new trial for the errors as to the general rights of the parties contained in the judgment appealed from, so that upon a new trial with those rights plainly defined, the evidence on the subject of damages may be more direct and confined within smaller limits than it was upon the trial. This reversal, however, may be avoided in the discretion of the plaintiff by his consenting to waive the damages. If the plaintiff choose, he may consent to waive and remit his recovery for the past damages which he alleges he has sustained, and in that case we will then modify and affirm the judgment as modified in accordance with this opinion, and after striking out the amount recovered for damages.

The order will, therefore, be that the judgment of the court below is reversed and a new trial granted, unless plaintiff stipulates to waive the damages contained in such judgment, in which case the judgment will be modified as already stated in this opinion, and as modified, affirmed without costs to either party in this court.

All concur.

v.
Thomas J. EVANS et al., Appts.

1. A claim to recover back property which has been fairly sold and paid for at its full value, and the consideration of which has accrued to the benefit of the plaintiffs, without offering to one who, honestly believing himself to be its lawful owner, expended large sums in its improvement (which constitutes its greatest value) is unjust and inequitable.
2. The purchase price originally paid for the land and the value of the improvements to the extent that they have added to its permanent value, constitute an equitable claim; and even if plaintiffs should establish an equitable right to the property it would not entitle them to judgment therefor, except upon the condition of refunding the amount so expended.
3. A court of equity, called upon to settle the equitable rights of the parties, may charge remaindermen with the reimbursement of moneys actually and honestly expended for the benefit of their estate, and which they were legally liable to pay.
4. When a person in peaceable possession under claim of lawful title, but really under a defective title, has in good faith made permanent improvements, the true owner who seeks the aid of equity to establish his own title will be compelled to reimburse the occupant for his expenditure.
5. Where the deed from executors apparently conferred the legal title under the power of sale contained in the will, the purchaser is under no responsibility for any misapplication by the executors, of the consideration paid by him for the land, and is entitled to rely upon their apparent power given to them by the will.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Special Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action to vacate and annul certain deeds and for a conveyance and accounting. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. George H. Starr, for appellants:

The plaintiffs have no equity to maintain this bill. The inheritance was not injured, but received a large pecuniary benefit and was saved from loss, by the sale of the two lots, and there was no fraud or bad faith shown.

Greenleaf's Cruise, Real Prop. title 15, chap. 4, § 55; New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127; Austin v. Munro, 47 N. Y. 366.

As the price paid was entirely adequate, and the avails went directly to the benefit of the estate in remainder, the bill should be dismissed.

Osgood v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. 22-29; Morse v Royal, 12 Ves. 355; Cobb v. Hatfield, 46 N. Y. 585.

The deed was not void, and should not be held voidable, because of the investment that was made of the proceeds. The will conferred upon the executors a valid power in trust over the proceeds of any real estate sold, to continue during the life of the life tenant. It was not a mere naked power of sale.

Osgood v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. 1, 20-22; Clark v. Clark, 8 Paige, 152, 160, 161; Livingston v. Murray, 68 N. Y. 492, 498; Tyson v. Blake, 22 N. Y. 561, 562; Smith v. Van Ostrand, 64 N. Y. 281, 282; Champlin v. Haight, 7 Hill, 245.

The proceeds of sale were personal assets in the hands of the executors for the payment of debts and legacies, and for general purposes of administration.

Lent v. Howard, 89 N. Y. 176-178; Bogert v. Hertell, 4 Hill, 492, 508; Meakings v. Cromwell, 5 N. Y. 142.

Had there been any debts, an imperative power of sale would have been implied for the purpose of paying them; as the will, by devising the residue only, after payment of debts, charges the real estate. It would have been the executor's duty to sell the real estate for that purpose.

Perry, Trusts, § 570; Greville v. Browne, 7 H. L. Cas. 689; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 16 N. Y. 259; Erwin v. Loper, 43 N. Y. 525, 526.

Although not trustees of the proceeds in a strict sense, the terms of the power coupled with the law imposed the same duty as if they were.

Even in England, where money has been expended to put the estate in remainder into or to restore it to a tenantable condition, for the benefit of both life tenant and remainderman, such investments have been upheld.

Re Skingley, 3 Macn. & G. 221, 228; Re Barrington's Settlement, 1 Johns. & H. 143; Harris v. Poyner, 1 Drewry, 182; Gregg v. Coates, 23 Beav. 33-39.

Uniformly in the United States, where investments upon real estate security are sanctioned, the application of some of the corpus of the personal estate to the restoration or protection of the real estate in remainder, has been sanctioned as a proper investment, unless it appears that a discretion has been improperly exercised; and executors or trustees are presumed to have acted in good faith, unless the contrary is shown.

Although it is held that they cannot bind the estate upon executory contracts of their own, although beneficial to the estate, yet they can make such contracts an express charge upon the estate when within their discretion and they appear to be for its benefit.

New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 129; Noyes v. Blakeman, 6 N. Y. 567, 579-580; Randall v. Dusenbury, 39 Superior Ct. (7 Jones & S.) 174; 63 N. Y. 645.

Where there are no funds in hand, they can make a charge that will bind future funds or income.

It is a rule of equity that trustees may safely do what the court would direct them to do; e. g., where great loss might occur to estates unless they exercised rights of absolute ownership.

Perry, Trusts, § 476; Inwood v. Twyne, 2 Eden, 152; Caldecott v. Brown, 2 Hare, 146.

In Moseley v. Marshall, 22 N. Y. 202, the rule is stated to be that where an existing incumbrance binds the whole estate and there are no special equities between remaindermen, the life tenant must keep down the interest and the remainder pay off the principal.

The above rule is where the incumbrance is to stand. Where it is to be paid off at once, and the life tenant and remaindermen are called upon to contribute, the above rule is applied as respects the tenant for life, by ascertaining from Northampton tables the probable duration of life, and the aggregate amount of interest payable on such duration, which sum must be contributed by him, and the balance by the remaindermen.

The statute provides for such case that in event that either fail to contribute, a bill may be brought for a sale of the lands to satisfy the incumbrance.

R. S. part 1, 6th ed. chap. 13, title 3, §§ 149-158.

In this case the executors, having the funds in hand, applied the same rule in another way, viz.: as respects the assessments (the life tenant being entitled to the interest if the fund had been otherwise invested), by the paying off of the assessments, he got the use of the premises free from the liens as an equivalent for his interest.

House v. House, 10 Paige, 158; Stilwell v. Doughty, 2 Bradf. 311-317, 318.

The bill, to avoid a sale, such as the one to Evans, must be brought within a reasonable time.

The power to sell, and the control of the question of the propriety of the sale to Evans, was vested in the executors; and the discretion was properly exercised, and a sale to him was as valid as to another, unless there are facts to show that he owed some duty to the cestui que trust inconsistent with his making a purchase. It is mainly a question of fact. The executors had their reasons for desiring to sell, which they deemed for the best interests of the estate as a whole; and if they could secure as large or a larger price by a sale to him than to another we can imagine no reason, resting upon any duty owing by him toward the remaindermen, that would prejudice his right to purchase.

Howard v. Ducane, 1 Turn. & Russ. 81; Dicconson v. Talbot, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 32; Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves. 51; Ten Eyck v. Craig, 62 N.Y. 419-427; Nellis v. Lathrop, 22 Wend. 121; McGuire v. McGowen, 4 Desaus. (S. C.) 486; Sugden, Powers, chap. 19, § 1 subd. 79, 80, pp. 867, 868; Sugden, Vendors, chap. 20, § 2, subd. 15, p. 692.

The application of the proceeds to pay off the assessments, and to pay Evans' bill for improvements, did not render the sale voidable.

If the sale is to be avoided, defendant should be allowed the amount of the purchase money, and the costs of the improvements put upon the two lots, with interest from the date of Mrs. Evans' death, May 16, 1878, and the property should be put up for resale.

The allowance to the purchaser in this class of cases of all moneys expended upon the purchase and for permanent improvements seems to be placed upon two principles or doctrines of equity, to wit:

1. That a purchaser who buys and puts improvements upon the land upon the supposition that he acquires a good title, is to be protected to the extent of his outlay; as in Putnam v. Ritchie, 6 Paige, 390, 402–406; Mickles v. Dillaye, 17 N. Y. 80; Benedict v. Gilman, 4 Paige, 58; and Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story, 478.

2. On the broader principle, that he who comes into court and asks equity must do equity, and must restore what he has received; as in Madison Ave. Bap. Ch. v. Oliver St. Bap. Ch. 73 N. Y. 82, 98; Ford v. Knapp, 3 Cent. Rep. 411, 102 N. Y. 137–143, and cases cited.

Mr. William G. Cooke with Mr. William C. Wallace, for respondents:

Under the will the widow took a life estate.

Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 236–237.

The devise to the children was of a vested remainder in fee, limited upon the particular estate in the widow, and subject only to the proper execution of the power of sale conferred upon the executors.

Morse v. Morse, 85 N. Y. 58; Manice v. Manice, 43 N. Y. 304.

The fact that after a sale of the land the executors are to have the handling and investment of the proceeds does not make the authority conferred upon them any the less a naked power.

Crittenden v. Fairchild, 41 N. Y. 289; Hetzel v. Barber, 69 N. Y. 1; Prentice v. Janssen, 79 N. Y. 479.

In the absence of an express declaration to that effect, an intent to create an express trust will not be presumed, where the whole design of the instrument can be accomplished under a power conferred.

Heermans v. Robertson, 64 N. Y. 332.

The conveyance by the executors to Swackhamer was not a lawful execution of the power of sale. A power of sale, contained in a will, can be exercised only in the manner and for the precise purpose contemplated by the testator.

Allen v. DeWitt, 3 N. Y. 276; Roome v. Philips, 27 N. Y. 357; Russell v. Russell, 36 N. Y. 581; Hetzel v. Barber, 69 N. Y. 1.

No question can arise as to the rights of bona fide purchasers. The defendant Evans devised the whole scheme, in pursuance of which the property was conveyed to Swackhamer and finally to him.

As to the defendants Scofield, there is no pretense that they paid a dollar for the property conveyed to them; it is admitted that the conveyances were intended as gifts.

It was not necessary as a condition of recovery in the action that plaintiffs should restore to defendant Evans the amount he paid for the land; nor has he any equitable lien for the value of his improvements.

Evans married the widow in 1841. Her life estate thereupon vested in him by the common law.

2 Kent, Com. 134; Wood v. Wood, 83 N. Y. 575.

This right was not affected by the Married Woman's Act of 1848.

Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202; Ryder v. Hulse, 24 N. Y. 372; Wood v. Wood, 83 N. Y. 579.

Upon him, then, rested all the obligations to the remaindermen, which the law imposes upon life tenants:

To preserve the estate from waste.

4 Kent, Com. 76, 77, 81.

To pay all taxes laid upon the land during the tenancy.

Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 312; DeWitt v. Cooper, 18 Hun, 67.

To keep down the interest on incumbrances.

1 Washb. Real Prop. 123, 4th ed.

As life tenant he cannot charge the remainder with the cost of his improvements. Id.

But he claims to occupy the position of one who has purchased, paid for and improved land, supposing that he had obtained a good title.

It is not pretended that he has any absolute legal right to reimbursement or a lien; but that a court of equity will not permit plaintiffs to take the land with the improvements, and suffer an innocent defendant to lose all benefit of his expenditures upon it.

There is no inflexible, or even well defined rule, upon which the courts proceed in determining whether or not a party shall be so reimbursed, but each case will turn upon its own natural right and justice.

Madison Ave. Bap. Ch. v. Oliver St. Bap. Ch. 73 N. Y. 96.

Two things, however, must always exist before the court will entertain such a claim:

1. The party must have honestly believed that he had a good title.

Moore v. Cable, 1 Johns. Ch. 387; Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 382, 397.

2. It must, of course, appear that otherwise the party will be injured by having made the improvements.

The defendant Evans was not a bona fide purchaser; he had actual notice and positive knowledge that the sale to him was void. He was familiar with the will, in which it was written, as plain as words can speak, that a sale should be made only for the purpose of investment. He knew that one object of selling was to pay him for having made improvements upon the estate, of which he was to have the benefit as long as he lived.

But he will sustain no damage by being denied compensation. It was plainly to the interest of the life tenant to make the improvements and he has been more than reimbursed.

The purchase price of the land was $2,000, the cost of the building $6,000; in all $8,000. According to his own testimony he must have received at least $30,000 from the rents of these houses.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1841, Thomas Thomas died, leaving him surviving Catharine Thomas, his widow, and four children, aged respectively three, five and six, and Sarah Thomas, who has since died intestate. At the time of his death Thomas owned in fee eight small city lots in Williamsburgh, six of which were situated on South First, and two of lesser value on South Second Street and with the exception of two lots on South First Street were vacant and unimproved.

So far as appears from the case Thomas had no other property, real or personal; and such as he had he devised to his widow for life with remainder to his four children. By the will he appointed his wife executrix and John L. Bulkley executor of his estate and authorized them to "sell the whole or any part of his real estate when they may deem best for those interested therein, either at public or private sale, and invest the proceeds in bonds and mortgages or other securities as they may believe best." He also appointed his wife guardian of all of his children.

In December, 1841, the widow intermarried with the defendant Evans and lived with him as his wife until the year 1878, a period of thirty-seven years and nearly twenty years after all of the children had arrived at maturity.

It is conceded that by the will the widow took a life estate in the property of her husband, and that upon her marriage with Evans he became entitled to the enjoyment of her interest therein, and that the four children took a vested estate in remainder in such property. Between the years 1841 and 1850 the defendant Evans made considerable improvements upon the property on South First Street, and rendered some of it productive which before was a burden and expense to the estate. For the purpose partly of paying the liability of the estate to Evans for these improvements and partly to raise money to meet anticipated assessments upon the property the executors, in 1850, sold and conveyed to Evans for the agreed price of $1,000 the two vacant lots on South Second Street. Of this sum $350 was applied as a payment to Evans for the expenses incurred by him, and the balance of $650 was secured by a mortgage upon the property, given by Evans to the executors. The price paid was a fair consideration for the land, and all parties then supposed that Evans acquired a valid title under the power of sale contained in the will. Subsequently, however, upon attempting to raise money upon the lots for building purposes, Evans was advised that by reason of his relationship with one of the grantors, his title was defective; and thereupon he consented to institute an action to have such title declared void and to reinstate the power of sale in the executors. Such proceedings were thereupon had in the supreme court that judgment was rendered declaring the conveyance from the executors to Evans null and void, and reinstating them, with the interest attempted to be conveyed.

Between 1850 and 1854 heavy assessments were levied upon the property of the estate for municipal improvements, and the executors had no means to pay them. These assessments were mainly levied upon the lots on South First Street. At the request of the executors Evans advanced some money to pay them; but the estate was still unable to meet the other burdens upon the property. Under the circumstances the defendant Evans, under an agreement with one Swackhamer that he would repurchase the property and repay him its cost and such money as he should expend upon it with a bonus of $500 for his risk and trouble, induced Swackhamer to enter into a contract of purchase of the two lots on South Second Street, with the executors, for the price of $2,000.

In 1858 the executors conveyed the property to Swackhamer, receiving therefor $300 in cash, Swackhamer's note for $700, and a release by Evans to the executors of their indebtedness to him for money advanced and expended for assessments and improvements upon the property. The price paid was more than the value of the property, and the Thomas estate received the full benefit thereof.

It does not appear that the executors had any knowledge of the agreement between Evans and Swackhamer, or that any of the parties had any doubt but that Swackhamer acquired a valid title to the property by the conveyance. Upon receiving his deed Swackhamer executed a mortgage upon the property to third parties for the sum of $4,500, which sum was wholly expended in erecting three substantial brick dwellings upon the two lots. In 1856, in accordance with his agreement with Evans, Swackhamer conveyed the property to him, receiving in payment therefor the sum of upwards of $7,000. Immediately upon receiving his deed Evans caused it to be placed upon record, and from that time forward claimed to be the absolute owner of the property.

Since Evans' occupation of the lots he has continued to make additions to and improvements upon them, the value of which, including the original cost of the houses, as found by the trial court, exceeded $9,000 at the time of the trial. In 1879 Evans conveyed to each of the two other defendants Catharine J. Scofield and Jessie E. Scofield, one of the houses erected on the two lots on South Second Street, as a gift, out of consideration of love and affection for them as his daughters.

This action was brought by two of the remaining children of Thomas, the other one refusing to join therein as a plaintiff, in April, 1881, for the purpose of vacating and annulling the deed given by the executors to Swackhamer, and all subsequent conveyances of the property, and having it adjudged that the two lots with their improvements were the property of the plaintiffs, and requiring the defendants to release and convey the property to them, and that the defendant, Thomas J. Evans, render an account of all of his transactions with the estate of Thomas Thomas, and be decreed to pay to the plaintiffs such sums as might be found due upon such accounting. The right to relief was based exclusively upon the allegation in the complaint that the defendant Evans obtained title to the property from the executors "for the purpose of enabling the executors more conveniently to manage the said estate through the defendant, Thomas J. Evans, and with a view to increase the revenue for the said real estate and to put the title thereof in the said Thomas J. Evans as trustee for the said Catharine Evans and the children of the said Thomas Thomas, deceased."

Upon the trial no proof was offered by the plaintiffs of the existence of the trust and agreement alleged in the complaint; but the action was sustained, upon the ground that the conveyance by which the land was transferred from the executors of Thomas to Swackhamer was not a valid exercise of the power of sale given to them by the will of Thomas, and constituted a cloud upon the title of the true owners which should be removed. The decree also denied to the defendant the right to compensation for the improvements made to the property by him. The ground upon which this conclusion was reached is stated to be that Evans was not a bona fide purchaser of the premises. This conclusion was based upon the finding of law made by the trial court: that neither Evans nor the other defendants were bona fide purchasers of the land.

It is not entirely clear what the trial court meant by this finding of law; but if it was intended to convey any other idea than that it was simply a legal deduction from the assumed fact that the conveyances to Swackhamer and Evans were void by reason of the alleged invalidity in the execution of the power of sale, it is contrary to the findings of fact made by the court, and is unsupported by any evidence in the case.

It was found by the trial court that from 1856 Evans always claimed to be the absolute owner of the property; and that this claim was known to and acquiesced in by the plaintiffs appears from the allegations of the complaint. It is therein averred that "The plaintiffs have all been for many years of full age, and have not requested the transfer of said title to them because of the positive assurance they all had from the said defendant and from the said testatrix in her lifetime, that the same was held for the estate, and because their mother, the said testatrix, was entitled to the income of the same until her death." This excuse so far as it alleges any assurance from the defendant Evans, or his wife, of the existence of a trust, is not, as we have seen, supported by the evidence.

It also appears that some, if not all, of the surviving children of Thomas, after their majority, had knowledge of the expenditures that the defendant Evans made, not only upon the property in dispute but also upon the other real estate remaining unsold, and so far from making any objection thereto, actually requested them to be made.

A careful perusal of the evidence in the case shows us that Evans, in the right of his wife, came into the possession of the eight lots in 1841; and although both he and the estate were destitute of means to improve it or to pay the taxes or assessments levied thereon, it was so managed as to make it more valuable and productive and to preserve for the remaindermen the greater part of the estate. In the meanwhile he provided a home for the widow and children of Thomas, and educated and supported the children, not only until their majority but some of them until long after that time. Under these circumstances it is not strange that the remaindermen have hesitated so long to assert any rights to the two lots in question, and that one of them refused altogether to become a party to the proceeding.

A claim to recover back property which has been fairly sold and paid for at its full value and the consideration of which has accrued to the benefit of the plaintiffs, without offering to render compensation to one who, honestly believing himself to be its lawful owner, expended large sums in its improvement, and which now constitutes its greatest value, seems to be unjust and inequitable. We are of the opinion that the purchase price originally paid for the land, and the value of the improvements (to the extent that they have added to its permanent value) constitute an equitable claim, and that even if the plaintiffs should establish an equitable right to the property, it would not entitle them to judgment therefor, except upon the condition of refunding to the defendant Evans the amount so expended.

It was found by the trial court that the purchase price was mainly paid in relieving the land from the assessments imposed upon it. These assessments were a charge upon all of the land, and the interest of the remaindermen, as well as that of the life tenant, was liable to be sold therefor. It is provided by statute, in the case of real property in which several persons have successive interests incumbered by taxes and assessments rendering it liable to sale therefor, that upon the application of any of the parties interested the court may order a sale of the fee or a part thereof for the purpose of discharging the liens upon the remainder. Laws 1841, chap. 341; Laws 1855, chap. 357; Jackson v. Babcock, 16 N. Y. 246; Dikeman v. Dikeman, 11 Paige, 484.

Thus the property of the plaintiffs was legally liable for the payment of these assessments. Although the method provided by statute was not pursued, we see no reason why a court of equity, called upon to settle the equitable rights of the parties, should not charge remaindermen with the reimbursement of moneys actually and honestly expended for the benefit of their estate and which they were legally liable to pay.

The general rule applicable to the relation of life tenants and remaindermen does not authorize the former to charge the latter with the cost and expense of permanent improvements put upon the property by him during the life tenancy. Dent v. Dent, 30 Beav. 363; Moore v. Cable, 1 Johns. Ch. 385.

This rule is founded upon principles of justice having reference to the rights and interests of remaindermen, and should not be inconsiderately impaired or evaded.

It is also the general rule that municipal assessments for permanent improvements upon land are apportionable between the life tenant and the remaindermen, according to the circumstances of the case and their respective interests in the property; Stillwell v. Doughty, 3 Bradf. 359; Peck v. Sherwood, 56 N. Y. 615: while the ordinary taxes of government are properly chargeable to the life tenant alone. Deraismes v. Deraismes, 72 N. Y. 154; Cairns v. Chabert, 3 Edw. Ch. 312.

Such are the rules applicable to those relations, when they are open and acknowledged and no special circumstances exist authorizing the application of principles of equity to reimburse one who in good faith has increased the intrinsic value of the property by expending his own means in making permanent erections and valuable additions thereto under the belief that he was its lawful owner. Such circumstances are held to exist when a trustee or mortgagee in possession, supposing in good faith that he has acquired title in fee to the property, goes on and deals with it as his own and makes improvements which are of permanent benefit to the property. Putnam v. Ritchie, 6 Paige, 390; Mickles v. Dillaye, 17 N. Y. 86.

In the Putnam Case the chancellor laid down the rule, as expressed in the head note, that "Where industrial accessions have been made to property in good faith by a person who has the legal title to the property, so that the real owner is compelled to resort to the court of chancery to assert his equitable title to such property, this court acts upon the civil law rule of natural equity, and compels the complainant to compensate the adverse party for such industrial accessions, or improvements, as a condition of granting the equitable relief asked for in the suit."

That was the case of a guardian in socage, of infants having a leasehold estate in fee in certain lands, which lease during the infancy of the wards was, for a good consideration, surrendered by such guardian to the heir of the lessor. It was held that a guardian in socage has no right to surrender a lease in fee belonging to his wards, but that when the legal title is in a trustee or when the guardian of an infant has complete legal control over the property so as to place it fully within the power of the chancellor, as the general guardian of infants, the court may sanction the acts of the trustee or guardian, although not strictly legal, if the same are done in good faith and for the benefit of the estate of the infant.

In Mickles v. Dillaye, 17 N. Y. 86, the rule was applied to a mortgagor who attempted to redeem from a mortgagee in possession under a voidable sale; and the rule adopted is expressed in the head note of the case as follows: "When valuable and permanent improvements have been made in good faith by a person standing upon the legal footing of a mortgagee in possession, but who supposed himself to have acquired the absolute title, and such mistake was favored by the omission of the owner (for several years before and after the improvements) to assert any interest in the premises, the mortgagor, on asking the aid of equity to redeem, will be compelled to allow the value of the improvements though exceeding the rents and profits received."

In Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story, 478, lands had been sold by an administrator; but the sale was void because he had not given security according to the statute. The heir sued the purchaser and recovered possession of the land. The purchaser then filed his bill in equity to recover from the heir the value of certain improvements, including the cost of building a large dwelling house which he had in good faith put upon the premises while occupying them. Judge Story referred the case to a master to take an account of the enhanced value of the premises, with a strong intimation that the plaintiff was entitled to recover that expense, but postponed the final decision of the question until the coming in of the master's report.

Judge Denio, citing this case in Mickles v. Dillaye, entertained some doubt whether it could be sustained here, except upon the principle of estoppel against one fraudulently standing by and seeing another expend money upon his land, although he expressly approved the rule laid down by the chancellor in Putnam v. Ritchie.

In the same case he also approved of the doctrine laid down by Judge Hand in Wetmore v. Roberts, 10 How. Pr. 51. In that case the defendant had bought the premises from one who had purchased them upon a sale on a prior mortgage in the foreclosure of which a junior mortgagee had not been made a party. Upon a foreclosure of the junior mortgage it was held that the premises should be sold and the defendant should be paid from the purchase money, not only the amount due on the elder mortgage but also for improvements made by him during his occupation of the property.

In Miner v. Beekman, 50 N. Y. 345, it was said by Grover, J., that "When a plaintiff has permitted his right to satisfy a mortgage to remain dormant for nearly thirty years, during which others have paid the assessments and taxes and made improvements in the belief that they had title under a foreclosure of the mortgage, he cannot complain that, as a condition of regaining possession, he is compelled to account for and pay such taxes, assessments, and for such improvements, according to the just and enlightened principles of courts of equity."

Pomeroy, in a note to section 1242 of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, states the rule as follows: "When a person in peaceable possession under claim of lawful title, but really under a defective title, has, in good faith, made permanent improvements, the true owner who seeks the aid of equity to establish his own title will be compelled to reimburse the occupant for his expenditure."

Many authorities are cited in support of the proposition.

In Ford v. Knapp, 8 Cent. Rep. 411, 102 N. Y. 135, the principle is laid down that in an action by a cotenant out of possession for a partition of the premises, upon which the other tenants in common have paid taxes and made improvements in good faith, which have largely increased the value of the property, the amount of such taxes and improvements shall, in case of a sale of the property, be first deducted from the gross sum received, and paid to the improving tenants, and the balance only divided among the parties according to their respective interests. The case was decided upon the rule that "One who seeks equity must do equity;" and that the tenant out of the actual occupation, who seeks a court of equity to award him partition, is entitled to relief only upon condition that the equitable rights of his cotenant shall be respected.

We think the circumstances of this case bring it within the principles of the cases above cited.

Previous to the year 1860 all of the remaindermen had arrived at years of maturity, and were aware that the defendant Evans claimed to be the absolute owner of the property in question. For over twenty years they not only neglected to dispute such claim but permitted the defendant to go on in apparent security as to his title, and make improvements upon the property and deal with it as his own. There seems to exist here the natural equity which entitles a party who has in good faith, with his own means, improved the property of another to reimbursement by the parties benefited thereby; but this equity is strengthened by the conduct of the owners who stood by and saw such party without notice or objection incur expense under the belief that he was improving his own property.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the trial court should have imposed, as the condition of any relief to the plaintiffs, the reimbursement by them to Evans of the original price paid by Swackhamer for the lots, and also of such sums as were expended by Swackhamer and Evans in their improvements, so far as they have increased the value of the land; and in case Evans is charged with the rents received from the property since the death of the life tenant he should be allowed interest on the amount payable to him.

The plaintiffs have sought their remedy in equity, and that course seems to have been requisite as the condition of a right to the relief demanded. The deed from the executors to Swackhamer apparently conferred the legal title under the power of sale contained in the will. The purchaser was under no responsibility for any misapplication by the executors of the consideration paid by him for the land and was entitled to rely upon their apparent power to receive such consideration and to convey the land given to them by the will. 3 R. S. 7th ed. 2138, § 66.

We have altogether refrained from discussing the question as to whether the conveyance by the executors to Swackhamer was a valid execution of the power of sale.

There seems to be much reason for saying, under the peculiar condition of this property, its unproductive character and the want of means in which the testator left his family, the liability of the property to be sold for taxes and assessments for municipal purposes, that the real limitation intended to be put by the testator upon the power of sale, was contained in the words that it should be sold when his executors "may deem best for those interested therein" and not in the language by which they were directed "to invest the proceeds in bonds and mortgages or other securities as they may believe best." Some diversity of opinion, however, exists among the members of the court upon this question; and we therefore refrain from determining it, believing that the point decided will substantially dispose of the case upon a retrial.

The judgments, both interlocutory and final, of the courts below are reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

v.
Cecelia CUMMINGS et al., Appts.

1. Ejectment cannot be maintained against defendants who are not in possession of the premises sought to be recovered and who do not claim any title to or right to the possession of the same.
2. Defendants, who did not appear by the pleadings or evidence to have been in possession of the premises or to have claimed title thereto, as remaindermen or otherwise, at or before the commencement of the action, are entitled to a dismissal of the complaint.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

Reported below, 35 Hun, 22.

The facts bearing upon the question decided are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wayland F. Ford, for appellants:

Against the infant defendants the plaintiff proved no cause of action. They were not in possession of any land and claimed no right to the possession of any; they had never interfered with this land and claimed no title to the same or right to its possession.

To maintain the action of ejectment it would be necessary to show defendants in possession, exercising acts of ownership, or that they claimed the title.

Redfield v. Utica etc. R. R. Co. 25 Barb. 54; Abeel v. Van Gelder, 36 N. Y. 514; Banyer v. Empie, 5 Hill, 48; Lucas v. Johnson, 8 Barb. 244; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1502, 1503.

There was no proof that defendants had done any act to make them tort feasors as was done in Abeel v. Van Gelder, 36 N. Y. 514.

Mr. D. O'Brien, for respondents:

The infants were properly made parties defendant. They interposed an answer denying plaintiffs' right to recover, and contested the same upon the trial. They claimed to own the land to high water mark, and denied the right of plaintiffs to recover below that line; and they have successively appealed to the general term and to this court.

Being the owners of the land, the title to the property in question could not be finally determined without their presence as parties; and it is now the policy of the law to have all the persons made parties that are necessary to a final determination of the questions involved. Upon these facts the infants were not only proper but they were necessary parties defendant.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1502, 1503; Stewart v. Patrick, 68 N. Y. 450, 455; Martin v. Rector, 30 Hun, 138.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We deem it unnecessary to decide the interesting questions argued at the Bar, respecting the construction of a grant by the State, of lands bordering on the River St. Lawrence above the ebb and flow of the tide, which bounds the granted premises by the margin of the shore of the river, and whether under such a description the title of the grantee extends to the margin of the water at its low stage, or only to high water mark.

We are of opinion that the judgment against the infant defendants, who are the only appellants here, must be reversed upon a preliminary question. Assuming that the plaintiffs' title under the Macomb patent extended to the line of low water, and that they established title to the water front and to the land under water to low water mark, lying southwest of and adjoining the premises embraced in the deed of July 5, 1861, from John W. Fuller to David and William Woodworth, under which the defendants claim, we think, nevertheless, the appellants were entitled to a dismissal of the complaint, on the ground that it did not appear on the trial by the pleadings or evidence that they were in possession of the demanded premises, or claimed title thereto as remaindermen or otherwise at or before the time of the commencement of the action.

Upon the death of Ellen Cummings, January 31, 1875, the title to the Woodworth lot descended to her two children, the infant defendants, subject to a life estate in Peter Cummings, the husband, as tenant by the curtesy. Ellen Cummings acquired title to the lot by deed from David Woodworth, November 10, 1871, subject to a reservation (so called) to Fuller (the original grantor of the Woodworths), contained in the original deed from Fuller to them, of "all his rights to the land now under water and to the water front beyond or southwest" of the southwest line of the lot conveyed. She entered into possession under her deed from Woodworth and occupied the lot and the house upon it, with her husband and children, until her death.

The premises in controversy are those embraced in this reservation. It neither appears that Ellen Cummings ever entered upon or that she claimed any right or interest in the premises in question. There is evidence that, subsequent to her death, Peter Cummings, her husband, one of the original defendants in the action, entered upon the premises in dispute, and built a hog pen and privy thereon, and tore down a wharf constructed by the defendants, between the lot conveyed to Ellen Cummings and the river.

It may be admitted that enough was shown to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain ejectment against Peter Cummings. He has submitted to the judgment below and has not appealed, and his rights are not now in controversy. But the case discloses no ground upon which a judgment against the infant defendants can be supported. There is no pretense of any act on the part of the infants by way of assertion of title in themselves to the premises in question, nor is there any evidence that they have ever questioned or disputed the title of the plaintiffs.

The complaint alleges that the defendants, after the death of Ellen Cummings, wrongfully entered into possession of the real estate described and wrongfully withheld the same from the plaintiffs, and that the defendants, "or some of them," claim to own the same and deny the plaintiffs' title thereto. These allegations are not admitted by the infant defendants in the answer, but are denied; and they expressly aver that they have no interest in any lands except those of which their mother Ellen Cummings, was seised at the time of her death, to wit: the lands embraced in the Woodworth deed, and they insist that the action cannot be maintained against them.

It is clear, we think, that the infant defendants are not bound by the acts of their father, the tenant for life. It is true that both his rights and the rights of the infants in the land conveyed to Ellen Cummings are derived through her. But as we have said, the deed to Ellen Cummings carried no part of the premises in dispute, which lie wholly outside the boundaries in the deed. The evidence also tends to show that Peter Cummings, in entering upon the land in controversy, was asserting a supposed right as riparian owner to use the shore between high and low water mark, adjacent to his land. But his acts must be referred to his own interest and title, and not to the title of the remaindermen. The infants could not control his conduct, and it would be grossly unjust to make them responsible for wrongs committed by him without their sanction or authority.

The joinder of the infant defendants is not justified by section 1503 of the Code. That section authorizes any person claiming title to, or the right to the possession of, real property sought to be recovered in an action, as landlord, remainderman, reversioner, or otherwise, adversely to the plaintiff, to be joined as defendant. The infants, so far as appears, neither claimed title to, or the right to the possession of the land in controversy; nor did they do any act in hostility to the plaintiffs' title, and the complaint as to them should have been dismissed.

Judgment reversed as to the appellants and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur.

William B. HOLDSWORTH, as Master and Agent for the Owners of the British Bark "Bessie," Appt.,

v.

P. A. DE BELAMZARAN et al., Respts,

Defendants chartered a vessel, of which plaintiff was master and agent, for a voyage from New York to Cadiz and return; the charter-party provided that defendants should pay plaintiff a stipulated sum for the round trip, of which a certain amount was made due and payable upon delivery of the cargo at Cadiz, in gold coin, without credit, discount or commission. Plaintiff was instructed by defendants to consign himself to a certain firm in Cadiz who "had full instructions to serve the master in any manner concerning his vessel." At Cadiz, plaintiff received from said consignees in cash a portion of the amount there due him, and on being asked by them whether he wished to remit any portion of his charter money to his principals, replied that he did wish to remit to them through Baring Bros., London. Said consignees thereupon said that they would purchase, and thereafter said that they had purchased, a bill of exchange for said amount due, and had remitted the same to Baring Bros., and plaintiff settled with the consignees in reliance upon such statements, and sailed from Cadiz. Thereafter it appeared that said consignees had not purchased or remitted a bill as they had represented, but that they had drawn their own draft on defendants at New York, payable sixty days after sight, to order of Baring Bros., and had transmitted the same to Baring Bros. Acceptance and payment of this draft were refused by defendants, and plaintiff brought this action for the balance of the charter money due at Cadiz not paid there in cash. Held, that the facts connected with the draft did not constitute a payment of the defendants' debt, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, reversing a judgment entered upon report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover an alleged balance due under a charter of a vessel, and ordering a new trial. Reversed.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 382.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Joseph A. Shoudy, for appellant:

The order appealed from does not state that the new trial is granted upon any question of fact. It is therefore upon the law only.

Code, § 1338.

It stands admitted by the answer and proved by the uncontradicted evidence, that the vessel fully performed all the terms and conditions of the charter party, and became entitled to receive the stipulated charter money. It was therefore incumbent upon the defendants to prove affirmatively the payment of the full charter money.

Board of Education v. Fonda, 77 N. Y. 362.

There is no finding of payment in any manner or acceptance of anything in lieu of payment. The question here is whether when the creditor agrees to accept what is the equivalent of gold coin, in lieu of the coin itself, he may, by false and fraudulent pretenses, be compelled to put up with something that is perfectly worthless which he never agreed to accept.

Sandford v. *Handy, 23 Wend. 260, 266; Bennett v. Judson, 21 N. Y. 238; Hathaway v. Johnson, 55 N. Y. 96; Lee v. Sandy Hill, 40 N. Y. 442, 448; Krumm v. Beach, 96 N. Y. 398; Craig v. Ward, 3 Keyes, 387; Sharp v. Mayor, 40 Barb. 271.

In a civil suit the principal is liable to third persons for the frauds, deceits, concealments, misrepresentations, torts, negligence and other malfeasances and misfeasances of his agent in the course of his employment, although the principal did not authorize, justify or participate in, or indeed know of such misconduct, or even if he forbade the acts, or disapproved them.

Lee v. Sandy Hill, 40 N. Y. 448; Story, Agency, § 452.

The fraudulent acts of Poggio were within the scope of his authority, and were therefore binding upon the defendants.

The contention that Poggio, at some stage of this transaction, ceased to be the agent for the defendants and became the agent for the plaintiff is unfounded.

The provision in regard to the payment was for the benefit of the vessel, and might be waived without the relinquishment of any right to the charter money.

Mr. George L. Rives, for respondents:

The referee finds that Poggio Hermanos were the defendants' agents for the purpose of the charter-party, and not otherwise.

Maclachlan, Ship. pp. 180, 357.

It is the general rule of law that where payment is stipulated to be made at a particular place and in a particular manner, and the debtor puts the requisite funds in the hands of his agent at that place, if the creditor chooses not to receive payment in the manner stipulated, he does so at his own risk.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In November, 1881, the defendants chartered the British bark "Bessie" for a voyage from New York to Gibraltar and Cadiz and for its return to New York, or some other port of the United States to be named by the charterers at Cadiz. The charter-party provided that the defendants should pay the plaintiff £1,100 for the round trip, of which sum £620 were made due and payable upon proper delivery of the cargo at Cadiz "in Spanish gold coin at the rate of $4.80 to the pound sterling," "all payments to be made in cash, without credit, discount or commission."

Other portions of the stipulated sum of £1,100 were made payable at Gibraltar and at the home port, but no question arises in the case over the performance by the defendants, in that respect, of their contract obligations.

The defendants loaded the bark at the Port of New York with a general cargo, consigned to various persons at Gibraltar and Cadiz, under bills of lading in the usual form, specifying the amount of freight payable by the consignees on each parcel of goods. The full performance by the plaintiff of the obigations of the charter-party is admitted by the defendants, and their liability for the payment of the full amount stipulated according to the provisions of the charter party, follows as the necessary consequence of this performance by the plaintiff.

The only question in the case is, therefore, whether the defendants have performed their obligation by causing payment of the sum of £620 to the plaintiff at Cadiz, according to the terms of the charter-party.

Before leaving New York the defendants handed to the plaintiff a letter of instruction by which he was directed to proceed directly to Gibraltar, consigning himself to one Gomez, and, after discharging the consignments at that place, to proceed to Cadiz, consigning himself to Poggio Hermanos, who, it was stated, had full instructions to serve the master in any matter concerning his vessel. It was shown by the evidence that Poggio Hermanos paid to the plaintiff at Cadiz the sum of $528.40 of the sum of £620, leaving apparently unpaid thereon £509 18*s* 4*d*, or $2,447.60, and this is the sum in dispute in this action.

As to the transactions at Cadiz between the plaintiff and Poggio, the referee has found as follows: "That while discharging the cargo of said vessel at the Port of Cadiz, the said Salvador Poggio inquired of the plaintiff whether he wished to remit any portion of his charter money to his principals; and the master replied that he did wish to remit to his principals through the firm of Baring Brothers of London; that thereupon the said Poggio said to the plaintiff that he would purchase a bill of exchange and remit the same to the said firm of Baring Brothers, and a few days thereafter, when the cargo was about half unloaded, he represented to the plaintiff that he had purchased a bill for £509 18*s* 4*d*, at 47*d* to the dollar, and had remitted the same to Baring Brothers for the account of the master and agent of the said vessel; that said master believed the said statement and representation of said Poggio and relied thereon, and had the accounting hereinafter referred to, and settled with said Poggio upon the faith of said representation being true; that the statement and representation of the said Poggio that he had made such remittance to Baring Brothers was false and untrue, but, on the contrary, the said Poggio on or about the 16th day of February, 1882, drew his draft in the firm name of Poggio Hermanos upon the defendants by their firm name, for the sum of £509 18*s* 4*d*, payable at sixty days after sight to the order of Baring Brothers, and transmitted the same to Baring Brothers; that Baring Brothers received the same and presented it to the defendants on or about the first day of March, 1882, for acceptance, and thereafter, when the same became due, presented it for payment, and the said bill was neither accepted nor paid, but was protested for nonpayment, and has never been paid;" that the firm of Poggio Hermanos had no funds with the defendants and had no authority to draw upon them; "that the master of said vessel received no more than $2,833.40 on account of said charter-party, leaving a balance of $2,447.60, which was due and payable at Cadiz, aforesaid, according to the terms of the charter-party. No part of this sum has been paid;" that "The plaintiff never agreed to receive the said draft in payment thereof, and did not know that the same had been drawn until long after he left the Port of Cadiz, but supposed that a remittance had been made as agreed by the said agent."

Shortly before leaving Cadiz the master applied to Poggio for a final settlement of the money payable to him at that place, and Poggio rendered an account in which he charged the master with the sum of £509 18*s* 4*d*, sent to Baring Brothers February 14, 1882, and various other items of account, together with a sum paid in cash, February 28, 1882, sufficient to make up the whole amount of £620.

The plaintiff first learned of the mode of remittance attempted by Poggio, when he was at Gloucester after his voyage was completed, and never at Cadiz or elsewhere approved of or accepted the method of remittance adopted by Poggio.

We have also carefully read the evidence upon which the findings were based, and are of the opinion that they were quite as favorable to the defendants as the proof would warrant. Upon these facts the referee made a report in favor of the plaintiff upon which judgment was entered. The general term, upon appeal to that court, reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial. From that order the plaintiff appealed to this court upon the usual stipulation for judgment absolute in case of an affirmance here.

The ground upon which the defense to the action was based is stated in the answer to be as follows: "The said firm of Poggio Brothers offered to give the plaintiff, instead of cash, their draft or bill of exchange for the said last mentioned amount ($2,447.60), to which the plaintiff assented, and requested the said Poggio Brothers to draw the said bill of exchange to the order of Baring Brothers & Co., of London; that the plaintiff accepted the said draft voluntarily and for his own convenience, and did not insist upon payment in cash of the said balance of $2,447.60."

It is quite unnecessary to discuss the question of the validity of such a defense, if it had been established by proof, because in all of its material allegations it was in direct conflict with the findings of the referee and the fair and reasonable deductions to be made therefrom. The general term, however, seems to have become impressed with the idea, notwithstanding the express findings of the referee and the positive character of the testimony of the plaintiff, that the personal draft of the Poggios, payable sixty days after sight by the defendants in New York, had in some manner been accepted by the plaintiff in satisfaction of the sum payable by the terms of the charter-party at Cadiz.

The discussion of the case in the courts below has elicited not only an able opinion from the referee but also one from each of the judges of the general term of the supreme court, in which a radical difference of views, as to the merits of the case, has been shown to exist, two of the judges favoring a reversal of the judgment for the plaintiff ordered by the referee, and one favoring an affirmance. The theory upon which the majority of that court proceeded will best be presented by brief extracts from their respective opinions.

Judge Brady says: "According to the charter-party, payment was to be made at Cadiz by the agent of the defendants, and that the draft which was taken by the plaintiff in lieu of money was drawn at his request that he might make remittances, and of course without the knowledge of the defendants; and it is to be further noted that the plaintiff, relying upon the statement of the agent that the bill was drawn upon Baring Bros., made no personal inspection of it, and thus enabled the defendants' agent to practice what appears to have been a fraud."

Judge Davis, also writing for reversal, says: "The freight to an amount exceeding the sum due to the plaintiff was collected by Poggio Brothers, and was known to the plaintiff to be in their hands * * * The plaintiff had only to demand and receive them. He did receive a portion of them, but the residue he desired, for his own purposes, to remit to Baring Brothers as soon as possible. The defendants were under no obligation to do that for him, and Poggio Brothers were not their agents to make such a remission * * * The act of leaving the money due him in the hands of Poggio Brothers to purchase such draft was solely that of the plaintiff."

We think the conclusions were not warranted by the findings of the referee; and as the reversal must be deemed by us to have been based altogether upon questions of law and not upon the facts, we conclude that the order of reversal was erroneous. The argument of the learned judges writing for reversal ignores the referee's finding that the plaintiff never agreed to accept the draft of Poggio, and seems to us to have proceeded upon a misapprehension of the facts of the case, and the nature of the relations existing between the defendants and Poggio Hermanos.

It should be borne in mind that the Poggios were, for all purposes connected with the vessel and its cargo, the agents of the defendants, and, as is now claimed by the defendants, were also agents to make payment to the plaintiff of the sum due him upon the charter-party at Cadiz. The provision of the charter-party for partial payment at Cadiz was for the benefit of the plaintiff and he could waive performance of that stipulation, or any of its conditions, without injury to the defendants. Thus he could receive payment in other funds than Spanish gold coin, or could allow discount or commission, or extend credit to the agent without prejudicing the interests of the defendants. If, however, he dealt with the agent and accepted payment in any other form than that provided by the charter-party, he would act on his own responsibility, and would thereby take the risk of any loss arising out of the change in the mode of performing the contract.

By the performance of the stipulations of the charter-party by the plaintiff the defendants became indebted to him in the full sum of the compensation earned by the vessel. They then rested under an active obligation to make this payment, and could be relieved from it only by showing payment or a readiness and ability to pay by themselves or their agents at the time and place of performance. By consigning the vessel and cargo to Poggio Hermanos with authority to collect the freight payable at Cadiz they had indeed placed their agents in funds to meet their obligations; but it was also their duty to pay or offer to pay the stipulated sum, when opportunity offered, to the plaintiff. The charter money was not payable to the plaintiff until after delivery of the cargo, and he had no control over the collections for freight made by Poggio, or the defendants' funds in their hands.

Although the defendants consigned the bark and its cargo to the Poggios and authorized them to collect the freight payable by its different consignees at that place, there was no express language either in the charter-party or the defendants' letter of instructions to plaintiff, making them his agents to pay the plaintiff, or requiring him to call upon Poggio Hermanos or any other person for the amount due him at Cadiz or directing him to make demand of that sum of any person. If there was any duty resting upon the plaintiff to make demand from anyone, it arises from the fact that Poggio Hermanos were the defendants' agents and consignees at Cadiz, and the usual course of trade pointed to them as the persons through whom the defendants had elected to perform their obligation of making payment at that place.

The plaintiff had no lien upon the cargo for his charter money and no means of compelling payment of the amount due him at Cadiz, for it was payable only after delivery of the cargo, and in the natural course of things there would be no one in funds to make payment until the defendants' agents had collected freight from the various consignees of the cargo. This could take place only by the delivery of the cargo, from time to time, to its consignees and the collection of the freight money due thereon by defendants' agents. The plaintiff had no control over the collection of this freight or the defendants' money in the hands of Poggio Hermanos. He had no other means of obtaining money of the Poggios, except by asking for it; and when he had done this and had been refused or his request had been ignored or evaded, he had done all that was required of him to fix the defendants' liability. The defendants' contract was that the agents at Cadiz would pay the plaintiff £620. The plaintiff frequently made application for payment of the charter money to the Poggios; and when he asked for a final settlement the agents' reply was substantially an allegation that they had already paid such moneys to the plaintiff's principals.

It is true that the plaintiff might have denied this statement, or still insisted upon receiving his freight money, but there is no reason to suppose that the Poggios would have retracted their statement or have repaid money which they falsely, but yet deliberately, asserted they had already paid. It would have been quite ungenerous in the plaintiff to dispute the assertion of the agents to whose kind offices the defendants had commended him, and it would have been quite ineffectual if he had done so. He had no power to make them pay money, payment of which they had avoided by falsehood, and no means, except persuasion, to induce them to fulfill the obligations they owed to the defendants.

It was impossible for plaintiff then to determine whether Poggios' statement was true or not. He never had an opportunity to inspect the bill said to have been remitted, or to elect between the reception of the gold coin by himself or the remittance of the bill. The allegation that they had remitted was the excuse given by defendants' agents for not making payment according to the terms of the charter-party; and therefore he had no alternative, except to rely upon it, and in case it proved untrue to look to his charter-party for indemnity.

The plaintiff had no legal, enforceable demand or claim against the Poggios; and to require him now to accept them as his debtors and to prosecute the Poggios upon their draft, would make a contract for him to which he has never assented. The defendants' contract was to pay the plaintiff at Cadiz £620; and when the plaintiff has shown that he afforded the defendants' agents at that place an opportunity to make such payment and they declined to do so, it constitutes a breach of the contract by the defendants, rendering them liable for the sum unpaid.

The case is simply that the defendants' agents converted the money intrusted to them by their principals to their own use, and when called upon to discharge their principals' obligation falsely alleged that they had applied it to that purpose. The plaintiff had no power to prevent the fraudulent conversion of the money by the agents or to compel its lawful application. All that he did was to acquiesce in its remittance to the ship's owners after it was claimed that that had been done; and if it had actually been remitted, it would have discharged the charterers' debt. The plaintiff simply assented to a mode of payment which was not pursued, and the condition upon which this assent was given was never performed. This did not constitute in any sense a payment of the principals' debt.

It cannot be disputed that if the plaintiff had at Cadiz accepted the personal draft of the Poggios for the amount due to him, or had extended a credit to them for such sum in satisfaction of the defendants' obligation, it would have operated as a discharge to the defendants; but it is indisputable that the plaintiff never did so, and in fact never knew the mode of the pretended payment until after such knowledge was of no benefit to him.

The legal principles applicable to this case are so elementary and familiar that it needs no citation to illustrate them. In truth the main cause of difference arises over the different views of the facts taken by the learned judges writing in the court below, and not over any question of law.

The order of the General Term should be reversed and the judgment entered on the report of the referee affirmed.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

Statement by Earl, J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs as shippers against the defendants as common carriers to recover damages for breach of a joint contract for the carriage of whale oil from Panama to New York. The complaint alleged that the plaintiffs were copartners and that the defendants were corporations organized under the laws of this State; that the business of the Panama Railroad Company, among other things, was the transportation of freight from Panama by rail to Aspinwall, and there to deliver the same to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, whose business it was, among other things, to transport the freight so received by vessel to New York; that the defendants, for a single price named, entered into a joint contract to carry the oil from Panama to New York; that they entered upon the performance of their contract in the months of January and February, 1873, and delivered a portion of the oil received by them from the plaintiffs in the City of New York about the 23d of April, 1873; that owing to the negligence, delay and improper handling of the oil, and the casks containing the same, by the defendants, the oil was greatly damaged and injured, and a large part of it was lost by leakage while at Panama, on its way across the Isthmus, at Aspinwall, and also on the passage from Aspinwall to New York; and that by reason of negligence, improper conduct and mismanagement of the defendants the plaintiffs suffered damages in the sum of $20,000, besides interest.

Each of the defendants by a separate answer, among other things, denied the joint contract and the joint liability alleged in the complaint; alleged that the oil was delivered and carried under a special contract, printed and in writing, copies of which were delivered to plaintiffs, wherein the several rights and liabilities of plaintiffs and defendants and each of them (with respect to plaintiffs and to each other relative to the subject matter of the complaint) were limited, defined and determined, and that its undertaking in regard to the oil was only under such contract which it had fully performed; that it was not liable for losses accruing upon the route of the other defendant; and each defendant also alleged as a separate defense that there was a defect of parties plaintiff, and that several other persons named were then, and also at the time of the making of the contract and the transportation of the oil, jointly interested with the plaintiffs in the oil.

The action was brought to trial at a circuit, and the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for upwards of $23,000. From the judgment entered upon that verdict the defendants appealed to the general term, and from affirmance there to this court.

Messrs. George Hoadly and R. H. Griffin, for Pacific Mail S. S. Co., appellant:

By the proofs in the case there was shown to be a defect of parties plaintiff, and the plaintiffs Swift and Perry were not entitled to recover.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 56, 58; Addington v. Magan, 20 L. J. N. S. C. P. 82; Hawes v. Inhabitants of Waltham, 18 Pick. 451; Freeman, Judgments, § 161.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company had no legal authority to enter into the alleged contract.

The charter of the Steamship Company was granted April 12, 1848. It was amended April 8, 1850. The original charter authorized the ownership of vessels and their navigation in the Pacific Ocean. The amendment extended this power to the navigation of the Atlantic.

Neither of these Acts conferred on the Company the power to build, own or operate a railway, or to do business by rail or upon land, except as far as may be incidental to the business conducted by a carrier by sea; nor is any authority conferred upon the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to go into partnership with a railway company, or to conduct business jointly with a railway company. In the original charter its powers are limited to navigating the Pacific Ocean. By the amendment they are extended to navigating the Atlantic Ocean.

It must be remembered that this is not the ordinary case of a corporation receiving property and agreeing to transport it beyond its own line. The property here was received by the Railroad Company, not by the Steamship Company. As against the Steamship Company, therefore, the action is for breach of a contract, the beginning and earlier performance of which were to be by the Railroad Company.

We submit that there is a difference of substance, and not of form, between the two cases.

We do not contend that a railway corporation may not by special contract receive goods upon its own line, and lawfully contract to transport them over all or any part of it, and forward them further, or even deliver on the line of another carrier. It must be admitted that the uniform holding, except in Connecticut, is to this effect.

The supposed joint contract of the Railroad and Steamship Companies, upon which the judgment below is founded, was not established.

The fact that Bellows, who made the contract on which plaintiffs recovered, was vice president of both Companies, does not help plaintiffs' position. Before there should be a judgment against the defendants, jointly, as upon a joint contract, such contract should be clearly made out.

Mr. William G. Choate, for Panama R. R. Co. appellant:

I. There was no prior parol contract on the part of this defendant, the Panama Railroad Company, to carry the oil through from Panama to New York, and there was no evidence on which the jury could find such a contract on its part.

The rule of law is well settled that although a railroad corporation may contract to carry beyond its own line, yet it requires an express contract so to bind it. Such contract is not to be inferred from its sharing in a through freight, nor from its receiving and transporting the goods over its line in the course of a continuous passage under an agreement for a through freight. And these are the only facts in this case on which to base the liability of this defendant.

Root v. Great Western R. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 530; Faulkner v. Hart, 82 N. Y. 422; Condict v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 54 N. Y. 500.

A contract whereby the liability of the company is sought to be extended beyond its own line will not be inferred from loose and doubtful expressions, but must be established by clear and satisfactory evidence.

Myrick v. Mich. Cent. R. R. Co. 107 U. S. 102 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 325).

II. The bills of lading were the only contracts between the parties.

These written agreements, when issued and received without objection, superseded the prior parol agreement, if there was one.

Hill v. Syracuse etc. R. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 351; Germania Fire Ins. Co. v Memphis etc. R. R. Co. 72 N. Y. 92.

There was nothing in the prior negotiation and understanding inconsistent with that provision of the bills of lading, stipulating for a restriction of liability of this defendant to its own line. And this restriction was fairly within the contemplation of the parties, even if the parol agreement was not superseded by the bills of lading.

Mr. Austin G. Fox, for respondents:

I. The uncontradicted evidence established a contract between the plaintiffs and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the oil through from Panama to New York, and it would have been proper for the court to direct a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs against that defendant. The letters that passed between the plaintiffs and Bellows established such a contract.

Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 139; Ogdensburg etc. R. R. Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 123 (89 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 827); Peck v. Vandemark, 99 N. Y. 29.

But there was also evidence of an oral acceptance of the terms of carriage offered by Bellows.

The oil was received for transportation under the contract contained in the letters. For damages resulting from a default in the performance of this contract the Pacific Mail Steamship Company is liable as a common carrier, even if it made the contract solely on its own behalf.

Maghee v. Camden etc. R. R. Transp. Co. 45 N. Y. 514, 518, 519; Root v. Great Western R. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 524; Burtis v. Buffalo etc. R. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 269; Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 306; 53 N. Y. 367; Hart v. Rensselaer etc. R. R. Co. 8 N. Y. 37; Cary v. Cleveland etc. R. R. Co. 29 Barb. 35, 56; Le Sage v. Great Western R. R. Co. 1 Daly, 306; Schroeder v. Hud. Riv. R. R. Co. 5 Duer, 55.

If the Pacific Mail Steamship Company had authority to and did make this through contract for itself and the Panama Railroad Company jointly, then the latter is liable also, but the liability of the former remains.

Whether the charter of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company expressly authorizes this contract or not the defense of ultra vires is not good. It will not defeat the action for damages for breach of the executed contract.

Bissell v. Mich. South. and North. Ind. R. R. Cos. 22 N. Y. 258; 63 N. Y. 69; Buffett v. Troy etc. R. R. Co. 40 N. Y. 168; Weed v. Saratoga etc. R. R. Co. 19 Wend. 534, 537; Baltimore Steamboat Co. v. Brown, 54 Pa. 77.

The uncontradicted evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the jury that in making the through contract of carriage with the plaintiffs, Bellows acted not only on behalf of the Steamship Company, but also on behalf of the Panama Railroad Company, a corporation of which he was vice president, and which received more than one half of the freight money paid under the contract.

Wylde v. North. R. R. Co. of N. J. 53 N. Y. 156; Barter v. Wheeler, 49 N. H. 9; Case v. Baldwin, 136 Mass. 90; Gill v. Manchester etc. R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 186; Hart v. Rensselaer R. R. Co. 8 N. Y. 37; Cobb v. Abbot, 14 Pick. 289; Cincinnati etc. R.R. Co. v. Spratt, 2 Duvall, 4.

After the plaintiffs had parted with the oil and the defendants had begun its transportation, under the contract that the jury had found was made, the defendants could not abrogate or alter that contract by merely signing and mailing bills of lading which did not reach the plaintiffs until after much of the loss had occurred.

The defendants certainly gave no conclusive evidence that the plaintiffs had consented to accept the bills of lading in place of the prior contract.

II. The plaintiffs can maintain this action for damages for the breach of the contract to which they were parties.

The party to a contract of carriage could maintain an action for its breach, at common law, whether he was the owner or not.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A point is made on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action on the ground that some of the seamen on the whaling vessels were to some extent joint owners with them of the oil. It is undoubtedly the general rule in this State that an action against a common carrier for the breach of his contract, or of his duty to carry, must be brought in the name of the owner of the goods, although the contract may have been made or the goods shipped by another. Green v. Clarke, 12 N. Y. 343; Krulder v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 36.

The rule has, however, been much questioned and has some exceptions. Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281; Finn v. Western R. R. Corp. 112 Mass. 524; Arbuckle v. Thompson, 37 Pa. 170.

Where the consignor, although not the general owner, has a lien upon or a special interest in the goods and makes the contract and pays the consideration for their carriage, he may bring an action for the breach of the contract in his own name, in order that he may protect his rights. Here these plaintiffs made this contract in their own names, and with their own money paid the agreed freight, and they were both consignors and consignees. It does not appear what ownership the seamen had in the oil, if any, nor does it appear what the relations between the plaintiffs and them were. For aught that appears the plaintiffs were under a special duty to deliver this oil in the City of New York, and had a special interest to protect in the whole of the oil. As they were in control of the oil and made the contract for its transportation; being both consignors and consignees, in the absence of proof to the contrary it must be assumed that they had sufficient title and right to maintain this action and enforce their contract with the defendants; and in so holding it is believed that we are in conflict with no authority.

But the evidence does not show that the seamen were joint owners with the plaintiffs of the oil. It was simply testified that "they were interested in the oil," and that evidence was not sufficient to establish that they were either partners or joint owners with the plaintiffs. It is more reasonable to suppose from such evidence that they were simply interested in the proceeds of the oil; and such is believed to be the common arrangement between the owners of whaling vessels and their seamen, when the latter have an interest in the product of the whaling voyage. Baxter v. Rodman, 3 Pick. 435; Grozier v. Atwood, 4 Pick. 234; Bishop v. Shepherd, 23 Pick. 492.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the seamen were not necessary parties to the action.

The Panama Railroad Company was organized to construct, maintain and operate a railroad across the Isthmus from Panama to Aspinwall, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company was organized to navigate steamships on the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans. Laws 1848, chap. 266, and Laws 1850, chap. 207.

It is not disputed that the Panama Railroad Company could receive freight at Panama and contract to carry it beyond its terminus through to the City of New York, nor that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company could receive freight at the City of New York and contract to carry it to Aspinwall and thence by the railroad to Panama. It is the well settled law in this State that a carrying corporation over a portion of a continuous line of transportation may contract to carry beyond the terminus of its route, and that such a contract is not ultra vires. Weed v. *Saratoga etc. R. R. Co. 19 Wend. 534; Wylde v. North. R. R. Co. of New Jersey, 53 N. Y. 156; Root v. Great Western R. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 524; Condict v. Grand Trunk R. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 500.

Such contracts have been upheld sometimes upon the ground of estoppel, and sometimes upon the ground that they were incident to the business for which the contracting corporation was organized. While the defendants admit that such contracts could be made they contend that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company could not contract to receive goods away from its terminus and to transport them to such terminus over the route of another carrier, and thence transport them over its own route to their destination. That is, while they admit that the Steamship Company could receive goods at the City of New York and contract to carry them to Panama on the Pacific coast, they deny that it could receive goods at Panama and agree to transport them to the City of New York.

We see no reason for distinguishing between the two kinds of contracts, and for holding that the Company could make the one kind and not the other. If when it receives goods at New York for transportation to Panama it is engaged in business authorized by its charter or incident to such business, then when it procures freight at Panama for transportation to Aspinwall and thence to New York it is also engaged in promoting the legitimate business for which it was organized. It thus procures freight for transportation upon its steamships; and the business it thus does at Panama and across the Isthmus is just as legitimate as it would be to establish agencies on the Pacific coast to solicit freight for transportation from Aspinwall to New York, or to contract with newspapers there to advertise the carrying of such freight. Cannot a railroad company take freight for transportation at a point a few rods from its depot? And if it may a few rods why not a few miles? If it may have a depot for the receipt of freight one mile from its terminus, why may it not have a depot fifteen or twenty miles therefrom and transport the freight thence to its road by any means that it chooses to adopt?

The Panama Railroad Company terminated on the Pacific coast at Panama, and there it owned lighters to go out into the ocean to take freight from vessels. If it could send its lighters out one mile, why could it not send them out several miles for the same purpose to some convenient port or roadstead? The main business of the Steamship Company between Aspinwall and New York was to transport passengers and freight which came from the Pacific coast; and instead of taking the passengers and freight at Aspinwall why could it not take them at Panama? We see no reason for holding that it might not do so in the prosecution of its corporate business and as incident thereto. Then again, if when the Steamship Company receives goods at New York under contract to carry them to Panama it is estopped from denying its authority and power to make the contract, why when it receives goods at Panama under contract to be carried to New York should it not be equally bound by estoppel?

We think, therefore, that it is clear upon principle and authority that both defendants were competent to enter into contract to carry this oil from Panama to New York. And as each was competent to contract alone it cannot be doubted that they were competent to make a joint contract to do it. They could even become partners in the transportation business between Panama and New York; and so far as we have discovered, the power of corporations thus to become joint carriers has never been denied but has frequently been recognized. Aigen v. Boston & Maine R. R. Co. 132 Mass. 423; Block v. Fitchburg R. R. Co. 139 Mass. 308; Gass v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 99 Mass. 220; Hot Springs R. R. Co. v. Trippe, 42 Ark. 465; St. Louis Ins. Co. v. St. Louis etc. R. R. Co. 104 U. S. 146 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 679]; Barter v. Wheeler, 49 N. H. 9; Wylde v North. R. R. Co. of New Jersey, supra; Hutchinson, Carr. § 160.

The right of a corporate carrier to go beyond its terminus to procure freight and passengers, and to transport them to its terminus for carriage over its route, is not absolute and unqualified, but has some limitations. What those limitations are it is not possible in a general way to define. The New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. could not establish a line of steamers between Liverpool and New York to carry passengers and freight from Liverpool to New York in order that it might secure the business of transporting such passengers and freight over its route to Buffalo; but it might run ferry boats from Staten Island, or from the New Jersey shore for the purpose of securing passengers and freight for transportation over its route. The right to go beyond its terminus to procure passengers and freight for transportation over its route, by a corporate carrier, must be exercised within reasonable limits and under such circumstances that it may fairly be said to be incident to its legitimate corporate business; and our holding is that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company engaged in transportation upon both the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, did not go beyond reasonable limits in contracting to take freight at Panama and transport it over the Panama Railroad for delivery to its steamships at Aspinwall, its main business being to take freight coming to it over that railroad.

The plaintiffs claim that the contract for the carriage of this oil was made in the City of New York between them and one Bellows, who was the vice president and general agent of both defendants at that place, and that it was made by correspondence with Bellows and a personal interview had with him. On the other hand the defendants claim that the contract was contained in and evidenced by the bills of lading signed at Panama by one Corwin, who was the agent of both defendants at that point, which bills of lading expressly stipulated that the defendants should not be jointly liable for any loss or damage to the oil; that neither of them should be liable in any event for any loss or damage accruing upon the route of the other, nor accountable for leakage arising from improper or defective casks, nor for damages of any kind to articles perishable in their nature, nor for unavoidable detention and delay. The trial judge submitted all the evidence bearing upon the contract to the jury, and instructed them to find whether it was made with Bellows as claimed by the plaintiffs, or whether it existed in the bills of lading as claimed by the defendants; and he also instructed them to find whether the contract was the joint contract of the defendants or the individual contract of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; and he charged them that if they found the contract existed in the bills of lading they should render a verdict in favor of the defendants; but that if they found it was made with Bellows as claimed by the plaintiffs, and that it was the joint contract of both defendants, they should then render a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs against both defendants. The jury must, therefore, have found that the contract was made with Bellows as claimed by the plaintiffs and that it was joint; and the only further inquiry is whether there was any evidence to authorize their finding.

There was no proof that Bellows was not authorized to contract for both defendants; nor was there any positive proof that the defendants were not engaged jointly in the business of transportation between New York and Panama. Both defendants had the same agents at Panama and Aspinwall. Bellows was vice president of both and appears to have acted for both in the City of New York. Both had officers there in the same building, and the interview between Bellows and the plaintiffs took place in the office of the Steamship Company. He corresponded and held the interview with the plaintiffs in reference to through freight from Panama to New York, and the receipt of the oil at Panama and the care to be taken of it while upon the isthmus without, so far as appears, consulting with any other agent or officer of either Company. It does not appear that any other person acted or was authorized to act for either Company at that time and place in making special contracts for the transportation of goods between New York and San Francisco across the isthmus. It is not disputed that he was authorized to act for and to represent the Steamship Company, whose office for the transaction of its business he occupied, and he was in the habit of making special contracts for the carriage of freight through between New York and San Francisco.

One of the by-laws of the Steamship Company provided that the vice president should be the assistant executive officer of the Company and together with the president should exercise a general superintendence over each department of business in the Company's office. Goods on the Pacific coast were brought in vessels and were taken by lighters from the vessels and carried to the docks of the Panama Railroad Company, and the through freight was divided between the two Companies as follows: compensation for the lighterage was first deducted for the Railroad Company, and the balance was equally divided, although the transportation from Panama to Aspinwall took but four hours, while the voyage from Aspinwall to New York took more than twice as many days.

The first letter written by Bellows to the plaintiffs was one dated September 18, 1871, in which he stated to them that "We will make the rate on whale oil, Panama to N. Y. 5¼ cts. gold per gal. Should you decide to send any ships to Panama with oil or bone for N.Y. you will please to give us early notice that we may be prepared to receive it." In August, 1872, the plaintiffs wrote Bellows, referring to his letter, and stating that their whaling vessels, on their way from the Arctic Ocean to Panama, would be due in San Francisco early in November, and inquiring whether there would be facilities for landing 5,000 or 6,000 barrels of oil without delay at Panama. To this letter on the 24th of August, 1872, Bellows replied by letter in which he renewed his offer to carry the oil at the rate previously stated in his letter of September, 1871, and stated that there would be no delay in landing at Panama, and closed as follows: "We feel very sure if you once try this route for your oil shipment, you will ever after have all your shipments made over it."

In the same or the following month Swift, one of the plaintiffs, went from New Bedford, Massachusetts, where he resided, to New York, and there had the interview with Bellows at the office of the Steamship Company in which he alluded to the letter which he had received from him, told him the plaintiffs accepted his proposition and had concluded to order their ships to go to Panama to land their oil, and informed him that if there was any delay in the oil on the isthmus there would be a great deal of leakage, unless it was in charge of competent coopers. Bellows said they had good coopers on the isthmus. Swift proposed to send out to Panama some coopers from New Bedford who were very competent, and said that there would be no leakage if they went out. Bellows replied that he could send coopers to Panama but they would not be allowed to do anything there; that the Company had competent workmen to take care of the oil and plaintiffs' coopers would only be surplusage and entirely unnecessary. Swift also told Bellows that if loss occurred on the Isthmus from delay there on account of the casks not being properly coopered and taken care of, the plaintiffs would hold the company liable for such loss; and Bellows replied that there would be no loss by fault of the company.

Thereafter, on the 14th of October, 1872, the plaintiffs addressed a letter to Bellows in which they acknowledged the receipt of the letter dated August 24, and stated that their three ships might get from 5,000 to 6,000 barrels of oil, and that they would be due at Panama before the first of December, and further stated:

"We shall depend upon our cargoes having the first chance, and that they will not be crowded out or delayed by oil from other ships whose freight has been engaged subsequently to ours. Please be good enough to write to us on this point and assure us that there will be no delay at Panama or Aspinwall. Can you not send the oil direct to this port (New Bedford)? We beg to ask what facilities there are at Panama to repair the cutwater of The J. Perry, which has been knocked off by the ice quite low down under water. Please state your rate of freight for supplies sent our ships from N. Y."

To this on the next day Bellows replied, saying that they would send a copy of their letter "to our agent at Panama with instructions to give your oil after arrival there the best dispatch possible. We have a gridiron at Panama on which we take up our coast steamers, and there will be no difficulty in taking up your vessel for the repairs she needs. We inclose you tariff freight rates by our line to Panama." On the 9th of November the plaintiffs wrote Bellows that they had that day learned by telegram that their three vessels had left San Francisco for Panama with 4,150 barrels of oil, and they engaged again for freight rates from New York to Panama. To this letter, on the 11th of November, 1872, Bellows replied: "We are pleased to learn that you have three cargoes of oil on the way to Panama from San Francisco, and by steamer hence tomorrow we will advise our agent at Panama that he may be on the lookout for them;" and he gave rates of freight from New York to Panama.

This correspondence, together with what was said at the interview between Swift and Bellows, made a special contract between the parties under which the plaintiffs were to deliver the oil at Panama; and the principals of Bellows were to receive the oil from plaintiffs' vessels, take it upon lighters to the docks and promptly carry it across the isthmus to Aspinwall without delay, care for the oil upon the isthmus and see to the coopering of the casks so that there would be no leakage there, and from Aspinwall transport it to the City of New York. And all this was to be done for the single price stipulated.

The contract so far as it went was complete. It was doubtless expected that bills of lading would be executed, but it could not have been expected that by them the contract so made should in any way be modified.

Under this contract all the oil was delivered in January, 1873, from plaintiffs' vessels; and the only ground the defendants have for claiming that this was not the contract under which the oil was transported is the fact that two months afterward, on the 27th of March, 1873, the common agent of the defendants executed bills of lading which were sent to the plaintiffs and received by them April 7. By some delay on the isthmus the oil did not reach Aspinwall and was not delivered on the steamships until the second or third of April. After the receipt of the bills of lading the plaintiffs did not discover the peculiar stipulations contained in them at variance with the contract which they had previously made. Upon the landing of the oil in New York the loss of the oil from leakage was discovered, and the plaintiffs paid the stipulated freight, giving notice of their claim for the loss.

Under the evidence, the main features of which we have alluded to, it was certainly competent for the jury to find that the oil was parted with to the defendants, for transportation, and that the defendants entered upon the transportation thereof, under the contract claimed by the plaintiffs. The defendants could not, therefore, abrogate or alter that contract by merely signing and mailing bills of lading which did not reach the plaintiffs until after the oil had left Aspinwall and much, if not all the loss had accrued. There certainly was no conclusive evidence that the plaintiffs consented to accept the bills of lading in place of the prior contract, and that contract must therefore control. Bostwick v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 45 N.Y. 712; Guillaume v. General Transatlantic Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 723, 100 N.Y. 491; Wheeler v. New Brunswick etc. R. R. Co. 115 U. S. 29 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 341].

It is clear that the plaintiffs did not understand that they were making several contracts for the transportation of their oil from Panama to New York; but they evidently supposed they were making a single contract with an agent who had authority to contract for the entire route. While the evidence is not conclusive, nor even very satisfactory, that the defendants contracted jointly to carry this oil, yet we think there was enough to justify the jury in finding such a contract. Here was the Steamship Company engaged in transportation both upon the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, making contracts to carry from ports upon one ocean to ports upon the other, and such contracts could be performed only by carriage across the isthmus over the Panama Railroad, and that railroad was engaged in transportation across the isthmus, of freight, almost wholly to or from vessels of the Steamship Company. The two Companies had common agents upon the isthmus and in New York. Goods were transported in all cases for a single through freight from ports on the Pacific to ports on the Atlantic, and that the freight money, after deducting compensation for lightering, was equally divided between the Companies, and the same person was vice president of both Companies. Taking into consideration all these matters, the situation of the two Companies and all the circumstances surrounding them, and the methods of their business as disclosed in the evidence, it is not an improbable nor an unjustifiable inference that they were jointly engaged in business and jointly contracted with the plaintiffs.

If the contract was made by the correspondence and personal interview with Bellows, as claimed by the plaintiffs and found by the jury, then if the defendants are not jointly liable for plaintiffs' loss, they are severally liable. The whole loss was apparently primarily due to unexplained, unjustifiable delay, and carelessness upon the isthmus while the oil was in the possession of the Railroad Company. For that delay and loss it is liable as a common carrier upon general principles. The Steamship Company made a special contract to transport the oil without delay from Panama to New York and to care for it and cooper the casks upon the isthmus, and it is liable for the loss by virtue of that special contract. Therefore the defendants are either severally or jointly liable for the loss, and whether they shall be held for the loss jointly or severally cannot be very important to them, because it is quite certain from their relations to each other that they will be able to adjust between themselves in a satisfactory manner the joint recovery.

The objection to the joint recovery, therefore, appears to be merely technical and should not prevail, unless the judgment is plainly and clearly wrong, and such we think it is not.

A careful consideration of the whole case has therefore led us to the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

Re ESTATE OF Robert SOUTTER, Dec'd.
The Duchess D'AUXY, Appt.,
v.
Timothy H. PORTER, Respt.

1. Where a decree judicially settling the accounts of an executor is made by the surrogate after all the parties interested have been cited, the presumption is that the accounts were correct and that the executor has accounted for all the property that came into his hands; and a further accounting should not be ordered unless it is made to appear that there are other matters not embraced in his former account, for which he is responsible and has not accounted.

2. Where there is alleged to be a claim due the estate which the executor has not collected, and it is not shown that his omission to collect has caused any damage to the estate, the proper remedy is, not to order a further accounting by him, but to have an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed appointed, who can proceed to collect the claim; and if it should turn out that the estate has been injured by the delay of the executor in its collection, he can then be called to account by the administrator de bonis non.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming an order of the Surrogate's Court of New York County denying an application for a further accounting by an executor. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Lewis Sanders, for appellant:

A surrogate's decree is conclusive only of the matters submitted to him for adjudication. A decree passing an executor's accounts, on his application for leave to resign a partially executed trust, is not a more effectual discharge and bar to a further accounting than any other judicial settlement of his accounts.

Section 2742 of the Code provided that a judicial settlement of the account of an executor or administrator, either by the decree of the surrogate's court or upon an appeal therefrom, is conclusive evidence against all the parties who were duly cited or appeared, and all persons deriving title from any of them at any time, of the following facts and no others: 1, that the items allowed to the accounting party for money paid to creditors, legatees and next of kin, for necessary expenses and for his services are correct; 2, that the accounting party has been charged with all the interest for money received by him and embraced in the account for which he was legally accountable; 3, that the money charged to the accounting party as collected is all that was collectible, at the time of the settlement, on the debts stated in the account; 4, that the allowances made to the accounting party for the decrease and the charges against him for the increase in the value on property are correctly made.

The right to a further accounting as to matters not embraced within the account presented has been adjudicated in favor of appellant.

Bank of Poughkeepsie v. Hasbrouck, 6 N. Y. 221; Re Hood, 90 N. Y. 515.

The true effect of a decree allowing an executor to account and resign before he has executed his trust is to transfer his unexecuted trust to his successor; but his successor could not be held liable for the loss to the estate by reason of the acts of his predecessor; it follows that the latter is liable, and he does not obtain his discharge except for such matters as he submits to the surrogate for adjudication. His proceeding is a voluntary one; if he wants a complete discharge, he must render a full account. The account rendered is the measure of his discharge and not the measure of his liability.

The general term decided a point not raised below—that the appellant was not the proper party to make the motion—that it must be made by the nonappointed and the nonexisting successor to Mr. Porter, whose appointment rested in the nonexercised discretion of the surrogate.

By not taking this objection before the surrogate it must be deemed waived; the appellant was the real party in interest, and at common law had the right, to the exclusion of the administrator de bonis non, to call the executor to account for property administered upon by him. Only the property remaining in specie or trust funds kept separate passed to his successor in office. There was none.

Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall. 540, 541 (83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 294); Wms. Exrs. 548, note 1, 783, note 1, 4th Am. ed.; 2 Redf. Wills, 91 and note.

Mr. Stewart L. Woodford, for respondent:

This motion was not made on the petition of the proper party.

This respondent's term of office had not expired by limitation; his letters were revoked; there is unadministered estate; and no one but a successor in office duly appointed can take any proceedings whatever in relation to the estate. No such person has been appointed, and this motion is therefore not properly made. The proper proceeding would be the appointment of a special administrator with the will annexed. That is the only correct practice. This moving party has no standing in court.

Only so much of a decree as is in error or was produced by fraud or deception can be vacated.

Re Ermand, 24 Hun, 1.

The matters concerning which the decree is sought to be opened or set aside and the account of the respondent falsified, or a further accounting compelled, are res judicata between the appellant and respondent.

Brown v. Brown, 53 Barb. 217; § 2742, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.; Bank of Poughkeepsie v. Hasbrouck, 6 N. Y. 221-2.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James T. Soutter died in February, 1873, leaving a last will and testament in which Agnes G. Soutter and William K. Soutter, his son, were appointed executors. The will was admitted to probate, and both executors qualified as such. In that will, among other dispositions of his property, the testator gave his son Robert Soutter one tenth thereof.

Thereafter in July, 1873, Robert Soutter died leaving a last will and testament in which he appointed the respondent, Timothy H. Porter, his executor. That will was admitted to probate and Porter qualified as executor. In it the testator bequeathed one half of his estate to his widow, the present appellant, who has since remarried and become the Duchess D'Auxy. In the winter of 1884 the respondent Porter presented his petition to the Surrogate of New York praying for a judicial settlement of his accounts as executor and as trustee under the will of Robert Soutter, and that he be allowed to resign his trust and that his letters testamentary be revoked. In pursuance of that petition citations were issued to the appellant and to the other parties interested in the estate, requiring them to appear on a day named to attend the accounting and the hearing upon the petition; and the citation thus issued was served upon all the parties named therein.

The respondent filed his account as executor, which was duly examined and considered by the surrogate, and on the 10th day of March he made his decree, in which he ordered and adjudged that the account as filed be judicially settled and allowed, and the executor was directed to make certain payments to the appellant and to the trustee appointed in his place. It was further ordered and adjudged that after making such payments the letters testamentary to the respondent should be revoked and his resignation as executor and trustee accepted.

There is no dispute that the respondent fully performed the directions contained in the decree, and that his letters thus became revoked and his resignation accepted. Afterwards, on the 31st day of March, 1886, upon the affidavit and application of the appellant's attorney, the surrogate made an order that the respondent should show cause before him on the 15th day of April, 1886, why he should not file a further account as executor of Robert Soutter's estate, and why the decree entered on March 10, 1884, should not be set aside and the account reopened. That order was served upon the respondent, and in pursuance thereof he appeared before the surrogate, and after hearing the parties, on the 15th day of June, 1886, he made an order that the application to open the decree of March 10, 1884, and to compel a further accounting be denied. From that order the Duchess D'Auxy appealed to the general term, and from affirmance there to this court.

The appellant united in her motion before the surrogate two distinct applications for relief: one to vacate and set aside the decree and to reopen the account, and the other for a further accounting. Upon the argument before us her counsel distinctly abandoned her claim to vacate and set aside the decree and to reopen the account, and contended only that the courts below erred in denying her a further accounting.

The respondent denies the appellant's right to a further accounting, upon various grounds. It is, among other things, insisted that as legatee she has no right under the provisions of the Code to a further accounting, and that the decree made March 10, 1884, absolutely binds her until it shall be vacated or set aside, and that the only person who can call for a further accounting or pursue the assets which she seeks to reach is an administrator with the will annexed, to be appointed by the surrogate.

We will, however, assume that the decree judicially settling the respondent's accounts had no greater force or effect than is prescribed by section 2742 of the Code, and that the appellant had the right upon the presentation to the surrogate of proper facts to have a further accounting.

This decree judicially settling the accounts of the executor should have some force and effect. All the parties interested having been cited, the presumption should be indulged that the account was correct and that the executor had accounted for all the property that came into his hands as such; and a further accounting should not be ordered unless it is made to appear that there are other matters not embraced in his former account for which he is responsible and has not accounted. Brown v. Brown, 53 Barb. 217.

It is not too much to ask of a party, who seeks to compel an executor who has once accounted to make a further account, to present to the surrogate a clear case before he shall be required to grant the application.

Now what are the facts here upon which the further accounting is sought? It is not disputed that the respondent accounted for every dollar that came into his hands as executor of the estate of Robert Soutter. But the facts upon which a further accounting are asked concern the estate of James T. Soutter, and are these: at the time of the death of James T. Soutter, William K. Soutter, one of his executors, and the respondent Porter, were bankers and brokers in the City of New York under the firm name of Soutter & Co., and continued to do business as such until September 28, 1885, when they failed. After the death of James T. Soutter his executors loaned and placed in their hands as a firm a large amount of the assets of the estate of James T. Soutter, and at the time of their failure they were largely indebted to that estate. By the new accounting the appellant seeks to compel the respondent to render an account in reference to the assets of James T. Soutter which thus came to the firm of Soutter & Co., and for which they were indebted.

But those assets did not come to the respondent nor under his control as executor. No part of them was set aside or appropriated as the portion of Robert Soutter under his father's will. They remained subject to the control of the executors of James T. Soutter's will, and to those executors the firm were bound to account for them; and for aught that appears those executors and that estate are abundantly able to respond to the estate of Robert Soutter for his share of the former estate under his father's will. The assets belonging to the father's estate in the hands of Soutter & Co. are still subject to administration by the executors of the father's estate; and if any share of them belongs to the estate of Robert Soutter it must come through them. The respondent cannot be held to have received any portion of those assets as executor of Robert Soutter simply because he was a member of the firm of Soutter & Co. He could not become responsible for those assets as executor of Robert Soutter until they should come into his hands as executor.

It may turn out on the accounting of the executors of James T. Soutter that no part of those assets will be needed to discharge the obligation of the estate of James T. Soutter to that of Robert Soutter. So far as it is shown in this record, if there is any further obligation on the part of this respondent as executor, it is because he neglected for so long a time to procure (from the estate of James T. Soutter) Robert's share thereof; but it is not shown that that neglect has caused any damage to the estate of Robert Soutter; and whether it has or not cannot well be known until there has been an accounting of the executors of James T. Soutter.

The proper remedy of this appellant is to have an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of her husband's estate appointed. He can call the executors of James T. Soutter to an account, and compel payment by them to him of whatever may still be due under the will of James T. Soutter to the estate of Robert Soutter, and he will have ample power by proceedings before the surrogate or by a proper action to call the proper parties to an account for the estate of James T. Soutter. It may turn out that that estate is still sufficient to pay whatever remains due to the estate of Robert Soutter, and if it is not, that the executors thereof are able to respond for whatever of that estate has been lost through their negligence or misfeasance.

If, however, it should turn out that the estate of Robert Soutter has been damaged by the delay of the respondent in collecting from the executors of James T. Soutter what was due to the estate of Robert Soutter, the respondent can then be called to an account by the administrator de bonis non. But in this proceeding, in the absence of any proof that any portion of the estate of James T. Soutter came to him as executor, or was ever set apart to the estate of Robert Soutter, or that the latter estate has been damaged by the delay, there is no ground whatever for calling him to an account.

We are therefore of opinion that the appellant did not make a case which required the surrogate to order the respondent to render a further account, and the order of the General Term should be affirmed, with costs.

v.
Louisa A. POLLOCK, Appt.

1. Where a married woman resides with her husband in a house which they occupy as a home, she does not thereby render herself liable for the rent of the house or the value of the use and occupation.
2. A statement by the husband that he has the right to sign for his wife is no evidence of his authority to bind her by hiring premises in her name.
3. The fact that the wife subsequently resided on the premises with her husband, without proof of knowledge on her part that they had been hired in her name, is no evidence of her husband's authority to hire them for her as her agent.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit entered upon a verdict for plaintiff in an action to recover rent. Reversed.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence at the trial, defendant's counsel moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff did not show that William J. Pollock was the agent for his wife, Louisa A. Pollock, to rent the premises in question, or that plaintiff regarded Mrs. Pollock as being the lessee or having anything to do with the premises. This motion was denied.

At the close of the evidence on both sides no request was made to direct a verdict for the defendant, but both parties acquiesced in the submission of the case to the jury. A verdict was returned for plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered. A motion for a new trial was subsequently overruled. Upon appeal to the general term the judgment was affirmed, and defendant appealed to this court.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. Augustus H. Vanderpoel with Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for appellant:

The fact that the defendant resided on the premises with her husband W. J. Pollock, in no way rendered her liable for the rent. As a wife she was bound to live with her husband, and his residence became her residence.

Schouler, Dom. Rel. 54.

The defendant can only be held liable for the rent, on the ground that the signing and acceptance of the receipt or agreement was the act of her duly authorized agent.

Ganley v. Troy City Nat. Bank, 98 N. Y. 487; Smith v. Fellows, 9 Jones & S. 46.

The relation of principal and agent never existed, as between W. J. Pollock and the defendant. The defendant positively denied that she ever gave anyone any authority to hire the premises in question for her. There must be positive proof to establish the agency of W. J. Pollock. It cannot be presumed.

Rodgers v. Bank of Pike Co. 8 Rep. 593; Chew v. Henrietta M. & S. Co. 9 Rep. 704; Morrison v. Thistle, 67 Mo. 601.

The mere naked assertion of W. J. Pollock, that he was authorized to act for the defendant, or the performance of such act, even if uncontradicted, without further and sufficient proof, would not create the relation of principal and agent.

Stringham v. St. Nicholas Ins. Co. 4 Abb. App. Dec. 315; Davenport v. Buckland, Hill & D. Supp. 75; Martin v. Farnsworth, 49 N. Y. 555; Nash v. Mitchell, 71 N. Y. 199; Ganley v. Troy City Nat. Bank, 98 N. Y. 487.

The statement of W. J. Pollock, at the time of hiring, that he was acting for his wife and had authority to do so, should have at once put the plaintiff on his guard; and he should have investigated the nature and extent of Pollock's authority. The very existence of the marital relation should have caused such an investigation. There is no proof before the court that this was done.

Clancy, Rights of Women, 347; Smith v. Fellows, 9 Jones & S. 46; Comstock v. Comstock, 57 Barb. 453 Hoffman v. Treadwell, 2 Thomp. & C. 57; Bank of Albion v. Burns, 46 N. Y. 170; Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 99, 100; Bates v. First Nat. Bank of Brockport, 89 N. Y. 286.

The mere living on the premises by the defendant with her husband was no ratification of his act as agent. There is no proof before the court to show that the defendant had any knowledge of the act of her husband, or had any intention to ratify such act. To prove ratification by the principal such intent must be shown.

Hayes v. Stone, 7 Hill, 128; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1097; Howell v. Christy, 3 Lans. 238; Nixon v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. 398; Brass v. Worth, 40 Barb. 648; Seymour v. Wyckoff, 10 N. Y. 213; Keeler v. Salisbury, 33 N. Y. 648; Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 87); Craighead v. Peterson, 72 N. Y. 279; Rathbun v. Citizens Steamboat Co. 76 N. Y. 376; Ritch v. Smith, 82 N. Y. 627; Whitney v. Martine, 88 N. Y. 535; Saratoga Co. Bank v. Pruyn, 90 N. Y. 250; Benninghoff v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 93 N. Y. 495.

Mr. P. H. Vernon, for respondent:

The defendant's counsel virtually admitted that there was evidence enough to go to the jury, and to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, by neither moving to dismiss the complaint after the evidence on both sides was closed, nor asking the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, and having consented to a decision by a jury, and taken his chance of a favorable verdict, he was not entitled to ask for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was without evidence or against the weight of evidence.

Rowe v. Stevens, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 389; Carnes v. Platt, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 337; Sickles v. Gillies, 45 How. Pr. 94; Barrett v. Third Ave. R. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 628, 632.

The questions raised by this appeal are questions of fact and are not reviewable by this court, there having been, as admitted, enough evidence to warrant their submission to the jury, and the judgment of the general term affirming the judgment entered on the verdict of the jury and the order denying the motion on the minutes, to set aside the verdict and to grant a new trial is final.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1337; Rowland v. Hegeman, 59 N. Y. 643; Re Ross, 87 N. Y. 514; Learned v. Tillotson, 97 N. Y. 1; Barrett v. Third Ave. R. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 628, 633; Bigelow v. Legg, 2 Cent. Rep. 877, 102 N. Y. 653.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think that the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. There was no evidence in the case which would have authorized the jury to find that the premises were hired by the defendant, or by her husband in her name by her authority. It is true that the plaintiff, on his direct examination, testified that he rented the premises to the defendant, and that she occupied them; but by his cross examination it appears that the whole matter was negotiated by her husband; that she was not present at the time of the making of the contract of letting, and that the only foundation for his statement that the letting was to the defendant, was that her husband, William J. Pollock, requested that the receipt for the half year's rent paid at the time of the letting, be made out in the name of the defendant; that this receipt contained the terms of the letting, and that William J. Pollock signed at the foot of it, "accepted, L. A. Pollock, per W. J. Pollock," and stated that he had the right to sign for his wife.

This statement was no evidence of his authority which could bind her; and there was no other evidence in the case of her husband's authority to hire the premises in her name. The fact that Mrs. Pollock subsequently resided on the premises with her husband, without proof of knowledge on her part that they had been hired in her name, was no evidence of her husband's authority; nor did it render her liable in an action for use and occupation. Where a married woman resides with her husband in a house which they occupy as a home, she does not thereby render herself liable for the rent of the house or the value of the use and occupation.

The evidence introduced after the denial of the motion for a nonsuit did not help the plaintiff's case. The defendant positively denied that she ever authorized her husband to hire the premises in her name, or had any knowledge that he had done so, until a claim was made upon her for the rent, long after the occupation had terminated; and her husband confirmed her statement. There was no evidence to the contrary, other than the plaintiff's statement on his direct examination that Pollock said he had a right to sign for his wife.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

BANK OF BATAVIA, Respt.,
v.
NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE & WESTERN R. R. CO., Appt.

1. Where the principal has clothed his agent with power to do an act upon the existence of some extrinsic fact necessarily and peculiarly within the knowledge of the agent, and of the existence of which the act of executing the power is itself a representation, a third person dealing with such agent in entire good faith, pursuant to the apparent power, may rely upon the representation, and the principal is estopped from denying its truth to his prejudice.

2. A local freight agent of a railroad company, having a right to issue bills of lading, but only upon actual receipt of property for transportation, issued bills of lading for sixty-five barrels of beans to one Williams, describing them as received to be forwarded to one Comstock as consignee, but adding with reference to the packages that their contents were unknown. Williams drew a draft on the consignee, and procured the money upon it of plaintiff bank, by transferring the bills of lading as security. It turned out that no barrels of beans were shipped or received by the railroad company, and that the bills of lading were the product of a conspiracy between Williams and the freight agent to defraud whoever could be induced to advance money upon the faith of the false bills. Held, in an action by the bank against the railroad company to recover damages for the fraudulent issue of the bills of lading, that the facts brought the company within the above rule of estoppel, and that it was liable to the plaintiff.

3. If a carrier desires to limit his responsibility on bills of lading to a delivery to the named consignee alone, he must stamp his bills "non-negotiable;" and where he does not do that he must be understood to intend a possible transfer of the bills and to affect the action of transferees thereof, and will furnish consideration for the basis of an equitable estoppel, without reference to negotiability or directness of representation.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, ordered for plaintiff on the verdict, on motion by defendant for a new trial on exceptions taken at the Genesee Circuit and ordered heard at General Term in the first instance, in an action to recover for the fraudulent issue of bills of lading by defendant's agent. Affirmed.

The bills of lading, two in number, were in the following form, differing only in the dates and number of packages, one being dated March 7, 1881, for thirty-five barrels, the other dated March 9, 1881, for thirty barrels:

"New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co.

Batavia Station, March 7th, 1881.

Received from F. C. Williams the following articles (contents unknown), in apparent good order, viz.: 35 barrels beans.

I. T. Comstock, New York.

Marked and numbered as per margin, which the N. Y. L. E. & W. R. R. Co. agrees to forward from Batavia to New York, upon the following conditions, viz.: that the shipper or owner does hereby release said Company from liability for leakage of all kinds of liquids, breakage of all kinds of marble, glass, carboys of acid, or articles packed in glass, stoves and stove furniture, casting, machinery, carriages, furniture, musical instruments of all kinds, packages of eggs, or for loss or damage on hay, hemp, cotton, or any article the bulk of which renders it necessary to be shipped in open cars; or for damage to perishable property of all kinds, occasioned by delays from any cause, or change of weather, or for damage or loss by fire while in the Company's depots; and the acceptance of this receipt by the shipper constitutes the agreement for the transportation of the above described goods or property.

P. J. Weiss, Agent."

The other facts and the questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. E. C. Sprague, for appellant:

The receipts in question not having been delivered, and no false representations having been made by the defendant to the plaintiff, this action cannot be maintained.

A shipping receipt, like those in question, from which the words "or order, or assigns" are omitted, is not a negotiable instrument within the meaning of the law merchant; such an instrument constitutes a receipt for goods, and a contract between the original parties to carry safely and deliver the goods received to the consignee. So far as it acknowledges the delivery and acceptance of the goods, it is a mere receipt. As to the rest, it is a contract. While lacking all the essential elements of a negotiable instrument, it in a certain sense represents the goods; and an assignment of the instrument transfers such title to the goods as the transferer possessed.

Hutchinson, Carriers, § 122; Daniels, Neg. Inst. §§ 1729, 1730, 1733; 1 Smith, L. Cas. 859, 896; Barnard v. Campbell, 55 N. Y. 461; Brower v. Peabody, 13 N. Y. 121; Henderson v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, L. R. 5 P. C. 253; S. C. 10 Alb. L. J. 104.

It was necessarily known to the person dealing with the agent that the acknowledgment of the latter as to the receipt of the property was false; and consequently the defendant is not bound to him by those representations.

Mechanics Bank v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 629; Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 602, 604.

An indorsee or transferee of such a fraudulent instrument takes it subject to all defenses, and stands in no better position than his assignor. This is the general rule.

Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 325; Commercial Bank v. Colt, 15 Barb. 506; Bush v. Lathrop, 22 N. Y. 535; Davis v. Bechstein, 69 N. Y. 442; Union College v. Wheeler, 61 N. Y. 88; Elliott v. Armstrong, 2 Blackf. 212; Hazard v. Fiske, 83 N. Y. 287; Wilcox v. Howell, 44 N. Y. 398, 402; Mechanics Bank v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 599, 629; The Idaho, 93 U. S. 575 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 978).

Weiss, the shipping agent, had neither real nor apparent authority to issue receipts for goods not received for transportation.

Robinson v. Memphis etc. R. R. Co. 9 Fed. Rep. 129, 137; Mechanics Bank v. New York etc. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 635; Western Bank v. Addie, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. 146.

The defendant is not estopped to deny that it received the goods in question, or to deny that it is liable for the loss sustained by the plaintiff.

The action is not in the nature of an action of conversion, but is an action for damages on account of the fraudulent act of the agent in issuing the shipping receipts without having received the property.

Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 607, 608; Daniels, Neg. Inst. § 1729; Sears v. Wingate, 3 Allen, 103.

Estoppel must be pleaded; and if a party omits to do so, and tenders or takes issue on the fact, he waives the estoppel.

Philadelphia etc. R. R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How. 307 (54 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 157); Richardson v. Boston, 19 How. 263 (60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 639); Griffin v. R. R. Co. 1 West. L. Month. 31.

An estoppel may not be based upon representations made to a third person, and not made with the purpose that they should be communicated to the one claiming the estoppel, although they are afterwards communicated to him by such third person, and he acts upon them.

The only representations made to the plaintiff were in fact made by Williams; consequently the doctrine of estoppel in pais cannot be invoked by plaintiff.

Maguire v. Selden, 4 Cent. Rep. 379, 103 N. Y. 642; Mayenborg v. Haynes, 50 N. Y. 675.

It is only when the instrument is negotiable that the representations in it may be deemed, in law, to have been made to every subsequent bona fide holder.

Farmers & Mechanics Bank v. Butchers & Drovers Bank, 16 N. Y. 137, 141; Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 602; Mechanics Bank v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 638.

Plaintiff being a stranger to the instruments in question, and they not being made "to order or assigns," the representations therein cannot be deemed to have been made to it.

Cases cited supra.

It is well established that the mere fact that a representation has been made, will not allow a stranger to whom the representation was not made to invoke the doctrine of estoppel; and a contrary rule would disregard the maxim that the assignee takes subject to all equities between the original parties.

Mechanics Bank v. New York etc. R. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 638; Reeves v. Kimball, 40 N. Y. 311; Co. Litt. 227; Com. Dig. title, Estoppel; Bacon, Abr. title, Estoppel.

To make a case for estoppel it is necessary that representations apart from the acknowledgment in the receipt should be made to the plaintiff, in which case, as said by Selden, J., in Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 607, defendant would be bound "by the verbal representations and not the representations in the receipt or there must have been gross negligence on the part of the defendant apart from the acknowledgment in the receipt."

Brant v. Virginia Coal & Iron Co. 93 U. S. 326 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 927); Shaw v. R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 565 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 894); Re Jewett, 7 Biss. 328.

The plaintiff cannot be considered in law as having advanced money, relying upon the shipping receipts as a representation by the carrier that it had received goods to the value of the advances made; his reliance upon the shipping receipt must be deemed to have been induced by the representations of Williams as to the value and contents of the packages claimed to have been delivered, and as to their having been delivered.

Miller v. Hannibal etc. R. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 430; Abbe v. Eaton, 51 N. Y. 410; Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. 283 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 989); Nelson v. Stephenson, 5 Duer, 538.

The only representation or acknowledgment in the shipping receipts is that there had been received a certain number of barrels, said to contain beans, but contents unknown.

Hoffman v. Bank of Milwaukee, 12 Wall. 181, 190 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 366, 369); Robinson v. Louisville etc. R. R. Co. 2 Lea (Tenn.) 594.

The shipping receipts did not confer upon Williams the apparent absolute ownership of the goods described therein, and the plaintiff must have relied upon the assurance of Williams as to his having a title to any beans which he could pledge.

Barnard v. Campbell, 55 N. Y. 462: Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 998).

Thus, if Williams did not own the property represented in the bills of lading, or had stolen it or procured it through fraud, the plaintiff would have no claim against the defendant.

Meyer v. Peck, 28 N. Y. 590; Mallalieu v. Hodgson, 16 Q. B. 689.

The duty of the company and the authority of the agent to give the receipts depends upon the delivery of the property for transportation, and is merely incidental to such delivery. If liability can be imposed upon the defendant in a case like this, any one of these shipping agents may, by simply signing such a receipt, render the carrier liable to any amount, to the full extent of any property, however valuable, but which has existence only in the imagination of the agent and those who participate in his fraud. So, also, any subordinate bank employee having authority to enter upon a depositor's pass book sums actually deposited could bind the bank to any amount by entering upon the pass books sums not deposited.

The following cases are relied upon as showing that defendant is not liable under the circumstances of the case:

Robinson v. Louisville etc. R. R. Co. 2 Lea (Tenn.) 594; Boucher v. Lawson, Cas. temp. Hardwicke, 200; Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665; Coleman v. Riches, 29 Eng. The criticisms to which the case of Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. (70 Eng. C. L. R.) 665, have been subjected have been on the grounds of the decision, and not of the result reached by it. It has in each case been held that the decision would be sustained if put upon the grounds upon which the defendant relies in this case.

The case of Brooke v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 1

Cent. Rep. 123, 108 Pa. 529, which also grew out of the fraudulent dealings of Weiss, is not in point. In that case bills of lading were issued directly to the plaintiff, so that the representation in a certain sense was made directly to him.

That there is no necessary conflict between the doctrine of federal courts and those of the State upon the question at issue is further shown by the fact that the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States in cases growing out of the false certification of checks by the agent of a bank is the same as that of the courts of this State.

Merchants Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. 604 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1008).

The court below, in treating the issuing of the fraudulent shipping receipt as an act done negligently or wrongfully by the agent while acting in the course of his employment, overlooked the important distinction between a conditional authority, depending upon the existence of some fact as a condition precedent to any duty arising in the course of the employment, and a limitation upon the authority of an agent when he has a duty to perform in the regular course of his employment.

Mr. H. E. Sickels, for respondent:

The question as to whether the bills of lading transferred to the plaintiff were negotiable or nonnegotiable is wholly unimportant in this case. That question can only arise as between the consignor and consignee, and it does not affect in any manner the liability of the defendant as carrier of the goods. The delivery of the bills of lading to the plaintiff with the drafts, under the circumstances disclosed in the case, had the goods been shipped, was sufficient to vest all the interest Williams would have had in the property for the purpose of security for the payment of the drafts. This proposition is elementary in commercial law, and is sustained by many adjudicated cases.

Emery's Sons v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 360; First Nat. Bank v. Dearborn, 115 Mass. 219; Dows v. Greene, 24 N. Y. 638; City Bank v. Rome etc. R. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 136; Merchants Bank v. Union R.R. & Transp. Co. 69 N.Y. 373.

A corporation is liable to the same extent and under the same circumstances as a natural person for the consequences of its wrongful acts or omissions.

N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Fishkill Sav. Inst. v. Nat. Bank of Fishkill, 80 N. Y. 162.

It is submitted that the defendant is estopped, as against the plaintiff, from now asserting the invalidity of the act of its agent in issuing the bills of lading without the receipt of the goods.

N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Armour v. Mich. Cent. R. R. Co. 65 N. Y. 111; Brooke v. N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. 1 Cent. Rep. 123, 108 Pa. 529.

Nor is it necessary, in order to create an estoppel, that representations apart from the bills of lading should have been made to the plaintiff, by or on behalf of the defendant, as no privity is necessary to be established, except such as is created by the unlawful act and the consequential injury.

N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; The Eaton, Cole & Burnham Co. v. Avery, 83 N. Y. 31.

The statement printed in the bills of lading "contents unknown," with the written statement following in one "thirty-five barrels beans," and in the other "thirty barrels beans," would not change the presumption that it was barrels of beans that had been received. If it did, it would require the court to presume fraud and dishonesty instead of good faith on the part of the shipper. Such is not the law.

Hatch v. Bayley, 12 Cush. 27; Shaw v. Gardner, 12 Gray, 488.

Nor does the case of Miller v. Hannibal etc. R. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 430, change this rule.

In that case the complaint did not charge that the defendant knew of the fraud or acted in bad faith, and proof was made of the deception practiced on the carrier by the shipper; and the court held that where those circumstances appeared, the carrier was not bound by the statement of contents.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is a settled doctrine of the law of agency in this State that where the principal has clothed his agent with power to do an act upon the existence of some extrinsic fact necessarily and peculiarly within the knowledge of the agent, and of the existence of which the act of executing the power is itself a representation, a third person dealing with such agent in entire good faith, pursuant to the apparent power, may rely upon the representation and the principal is estopped from denying its truth to his prejudice. North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 262; Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 601; N. Y. etc. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Armour v. Mich. Cent. R. R. Co. 65 N. Y. 111.

A discussion of that doctrine is no longer needed or permissible in this court, since it has survived an inquiry of the most exhaustive character and an assault remarkable for its persistence and vigor. If there be any exception to the rule within our jurisdiction, it arises in the case of municipal corporations whose structure and functions are sometimes claimed to justify a more restricted liability. The application of this rule to the case at bar has determined it in favor of the plaintiff, and we approve of that conclusion.

One Weiss was the local freight agent of the defendant corporation at Batavia, whose duty and authority it was to receive and forward freight over the defendant's road, giving a bill of lading therefor and specifying the terms of the shipment, but having no right to issue such bills except upon the actual receipt of the property for transportation. He issued bills of lading for sixty-five barrels of beans to one Williams, describing them as received to be forwarded to one Comstock as consignee, but adding with reference to the packages that their contents were unknown. Williams drew a draft on the consignee and procured the money upon it of the plaintiff by transferring the bills of lading to secure its ultimate payment. It turned out that no barrels of beans were shipped by Williams or delivered to the defendant, and the bills of lading were the product of a conspiracy between him and Weiss to defraud the plaintiff or such others as could be induced to advance their money upon the faith of the false bills.

It is proper to consider only that part of the learned and very able argument of the appellant's counsel which questions the application of the doctrine above stated to the facts presented. So much of it as rests upon the ground that no privity existed between the defendant and the Bank may be dismissed with the observation that no privity is needed to make the estoppel available, other than that which flows from the wrongful act and the consequent injury. N. Y. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, supra.

While bills of lading are not negotiable in the sense applicable to commercial paper, they are very commonly transferred as security for loans and discounts, and carry with them the ownership (either general or special) of the property which they describe. It is the natural and necessary expectation of the carrier issuing them that they will pass freely from one to another and advances be made upon their faith; and the carrier has no right to believe and never does believe that their office and effect is limited to the person to whom they are first and directly issued. On the contrary, he is bound by law to recognize the validity of transfers and to deliver the property only upon the production and cancellation of the bill of lading.

If he desires to limit his responsibility to a delivery to the named consignee alone, he must stamp his bills as "non-negotiable;" and where he does not do that he must be understood to intend a possible transfer of the bills and to affect the action of such transferees. In such a case the facts go far beyond the instances cited, in which an estoppel has been denied because the representations were not made to the party injured. Mayenborg v. Haynes, 50 N. Y. 675; Maguire v. Selden, 4 Cent. Rep. 379, 103 N. Y. 642.

Those were cases in which the representations made were not intended and could not be expected to influence the persons who relied upon them, and their knowledge of them was described as purely accidental and not anticipated. Here they were of a totally different character. The bills were made for the precise purpose, so far as the agent and Williams were concerned, of deceiving the Bank by their representations; and every bill issued not stamped was issued with the expectation of the principal that it would be transferred and used in the ordinary channels of business, and be relied upon as evidence of ownership or security for advances. Those thus trusting to it and affected by it are not accidently injured, but have done what they who issued the bill had every reason to expect. Considerations of this character provide the basis of an equitable estoppel, without reference to negotiability or directness of representation.

It is obvious also upon the case as presented that the fact or condition essential to the authority of the agent to issue the bills of lading was one unknown to the Bank and peculiarly within the knowledge of the agent and his principal. If the rule compelled the transferee to incur the peril of the existence or absence of the essential fact it would practically end the large volume of business founded upon transfers of bills of lading. Of whom shall the lender inquire? And how ascertain the fact? Naturally he would go to the freight agent, who had already falsely declared in writing that the property had been received. Is he any more authorized to make the verbal representation than the written one? Must the lender get permission to go through the freight house or examine the books? If the property is grain, it may not be easy to identify; and the books, if disclosed, are the work of the same freight agent.

It seems very clear that the vital fact of the shipment is one peculiarly within the knowledge of the carrier and his agent, and quite certain to be unknown to the transferee of the bill of lading, except as he relies upon the representation of the freight agent.

The recital in the bills that the contents of the packages were unknown would have left the defendant free from responsibility for a variance in the actual contents from those described in the bill, but is no defense where nothing is shipped and the bill is wholly false. The carrier cannot defend one wrong by presuming that if it had not occurred another might have taken its place. The presumption is the other way: that if an actual shipment had been made, the property really delivered would have corresponded with the description in the bills.

The facts of the case bring it, therefore, within the rule of estoppel as it is established in this court and justify the decision made.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.
All concur.

PENNSYLVANIA.

SUPREME COURT.

Margaret DISBROW, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Township of ULSTER.

In an action to recover for a death caused by the negligence of defendant, held, that evidence that the deceased, a short time before his death, said that he was tired of life and did not care nor want to live; that his life had been a failure, and evidence tending to show that he was a habitual drunkard, had such a bearing on the value of the decedent's life to his family, and of his probable care for its preservation, as to be admissible, and to be considered by the jury on the question of damages.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 28, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Bradford County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff for $100 damages in an action to recover for a death of plaintiff's husband alleged to be caused by the negligence of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the charge to the jury given below.

At the trial the defendant offered to prove that deceased, a short time before his death, said in effect that he was tired of life and didn't care how soon nor how he would leave this life; that, on being reprimanded for careless driving, his reply was that he did not care nor want to live, or words to that effect; that his life had been a failure and his family was a failure. This offer was made for the purpose of showing recklessness and carelessness on his part. It was objected to by plaintiff, because not competent to prove such facts between parties to this action. Objection overruled. Offer admitted. Exception noted.

The court refused to admit evidence of previous accidents on the road in question similar to the one in which Disbrow met his death.

The court overruled objections by plaintiff, and admitted evidence tending to show that the deceased was a habitual drunkard, such evidence consisting of narrations of particular instances.

MORROW, P. J., charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

The undisputed evidence shows that O. H. P. Disbrow died on the night of the third of June, 1883, at the age of fifty years, leaving to survive him Margaret Disbrow, his widow, the present plaintiff, and two children, Theodore and Lois. His family had resided in this borough for many years, and he kept a hotel in the first ward, and for a year or more before his death had spent a considerable portion of his time on his farm in Ulster Township, frequently passing over the road in question, going to and returning from his farm. On the afternoon of Sunday, June 3, he came to Towanda and started back to Ulster in the evening, and some time after 11 o'clock that night his dead body was found lying in the ditch on the west side of the railroad by the track walker, Mr. Carroll. A dead horse and some fragments of a wagon were found lying near by.

It was subsequently ascertained, from an examination of the ground, that in going along the road called the Ulster Narrows he had gone off at a point indicated by the evidence, where the mountain is very steep and precipitous on the lower side of the road, the distance from the highway where he went off to the railroad where he was found being in the neighborhood of 300 feet or more. It is not disputed that Mr. Disbrow was killed by going off from the east side of the public highway and falling down this mountain side; and this action is brought by his widow, Margaret Disbrow, for the benefit of herself and the two children, against the Township of Ulster, to recover damages which she alleges the family has sustained by reason of the negligence of the township authorities in not maintaining sufficient guards or barriers along the road at the point where Mr. Disbrow went off, which negligence, it is alleged by the plaintiff, was the sole cause of her husband's death; and this negligence is the foundation of the plaintiff's right to recover.

If there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover. And even if there was negligence upon the part of the township officers, and the jury should find that the road was insufficiently guarded and unsafe at the point where this accident occurred, still the plaintiff cannot recover if there was any negligence on the part of Mr. Disbrow which in any degree contributed to the accident. Therefore the plaintiff's right to recover depends upon two facts: first, the existence of negligence on the part of the township authorities, and second, the absence of negligence on the part of Mr. Disbrow.

It was the duty of the Township to keep the road in question in a safe condition for persons to pass over the same by night or by day, and to keep it, at all seasons, clear of all impediments for the easy and convenient passing of travelers. And, the road being along the face of a steep mountain, there should have been sufficient guards or barriers along the outside, to prevent travelers from driving or falling off. By reason of the proximity of this road to this precipice, it was the duty of the road commissioners to take extra precautions in order to secure the safety of the traveling public; and their omission to do so would constitute negligence on the part of the defendant.

The highway must be kept in such condition and repair that even skittish animals may be employed without risk or danger, and it is not enough that even by careful driving an accident may have been avoided. So that if the jury find that this road was not protected by a guard or barrier along the outside sufficient so that it was safe to be traveled at all times, then it was negligence on the part of the township officers and the plaintiff may recover, provided there was no negligence on the part of Mr. Disbrow himself which contributed to the accident resulting in the loss of his life.

On the part of the plaintiff they have called witnesses to show the condition of the road, and they claim that there were some stones thrown up as a guard or barrier on the outside, but that at the point where the horse went off the earth was merely raised a few inches and some loose stones piled on that little rise of ground on the outside.

On the part of the defense they have called witnesses to testify that at the point where the horse went over this wall was about two feet thick and one foot high, and that a horse to go over there at all must have been forced over, and they claim that this could not have occurred except through the act of Mr. Disbrow himself. The witnesses on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant agree substantially in this: that some ten or twelve rods south of where the horse went off he went close to the mountain side on the west side of the road, and that they could easily trace his tracks on that side close to the rocks, down to a point nearly opposite to where he went off, and that then the horse went nearly straight across the road and went off. The testimony of some of the witnesses on the part of the defense, who were there between 6 and 7 o'clock on the morning of the accident, would seem to show that the horse was going backwards at the time the accident occurred, and that the hind wheels of the wagon went over the bank first. Other witnesses are of a different opinion, and it is proper for you to consider all the evidence of the witnesses on both sides as bearing upon this question, so far as it may be important in the determination of this case. * * *

We have spoken to you in regard to the duties of the commissioners as to keeping this road in proper condition, and it was also the duty of Mr. Disbrow to exercise such care as a prudent man, having regard to all the surrounding circumstances, would take; that is, having regard to the character and condition of the road and the fact that it was known to him, as well as to the darkness of the night. If he failed to exercise such care and precaution it would be negligence on his part; and if such negligence contributed to the accident, then he cannot recover, even though you should find that the road was unsafe and dangerous and that the defendant was guilty of negligence.

If you find for the plaintiff, the measure of damages is the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiff and her children, without any solacium, that is, sorrow or distress of mind. That cannot enter in as an element of damage. Their loss is what the deceased would probably have earned by his intellectual or bodily labor in his business or profession during the residue of his lifetime, and which would have gone for the benefit of his widow and children, taking into consideration his age, ability and disposition to labor, and his habits of living and expenditure. You will understand that in arriving at that amount, his personal expenses for the remainder of his life would have to be taken out of whatever sum he might have earned, as those would not have gone to his family.

The plaintiff's counsel have submitted certain points in writing, asking us to charge you as follows: * * *

"2. That a road 20½ to 22½ feet wide, along a steep and precipitous mountain side between 200 and 800 feet to the bottom of the mountain, the outer side of the road being only six inches higher than the road bed and having a wall of loose stones one foot high and two feet wide, is not a reasonably safe road for the traveling public."

Ans. The facts contained in this point have reference to the road in suit, and whether it was a reasonably safe road for the traveling public or not is a question for the jury, and it is submitted to you under the instructions contained in our general charge.

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for $100 damages, and plaintiff took this writ, assigning as error the admission and rejection of evidence as above noted and the refusal to affirm plaintiff's second point.

Messrs. B. M. Peck and D'A. Overton, for plaintiff in error:

Carelessness on several different occasions would not prove carelessness on the night when plaintiff's intestate was killed.

Frazier v. Pa. R. R. Co. 38 Pa. 104.

Compensation for loss of life is to be measured by the loss thereof to the parties entitled to compensation.

In estimating the value of life, that personal exertions may ever be required of its possessor or his possible want of capacity are not to be taken into account. Id.

Messrs. Davies & Hall, for defendant.

Per Curiam:

The verdict of the jury establishes the negligence of the defendant and the absence of contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The only substantial question remaining is the measure of damages. That was a question for the jury, to which it was correctly submitted. The evidence of the defendant, received under objections, had such a bearing on the value of the decedent's life to his family, and of his probable care for its preservation, as to be considered by the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

Borough of FREEMANSBURG, Pff. in Err.,
v.
Jeremiah RODGERS.

1. On appeal to the common pleas from a report of viewers assessing damages to plaintiff by reason of a change of grade in a street, held, that testimony of the viewers that they had heard the testimony of the witnesses before them as to the injury to the property, and the opinion of the viewers that the change of grade was a damage to the property, after having testified to an acquaintance with the value of such property and that they had viewed the premises, was admissible.
2. Held also, that the cause of action accrued at the time of the physical change of grade on the ground.

3. Held also, that the measure of damages is the difference in the market value of the property before the change of grade in the immediately adjoining property and the market value after the change of grade in front of the property, with interest on the principal sum to date.

4. Held further, that an assent to the change of grade by plaintiff at a time when he was not the owner of the property would not bind him after he became such owner, and that statements made in his hearing before he became the owner, or acquired any title in the property, to which he gave no dissent, were not evidence of any assent upon his part to the change in the grade.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 210, E. D. All the Judges present.

Error to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff on an appeal from a report of viewers assessing damages to plaintiff by reason of a change of grade in a street. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the charge of the court below to the jury.

The witnesses at the trial, Theodore Fradeneck, Francis Held, A. J. Snyder and Christopher Gebhardt, were viewers appointed by the court on petition of Rodgers to assess damages to him caused by the change of grade in question.

Theodore Fradeneck, after having testified to his familiarity with the prices of property in the Borough, having bought and sold real estate there, and that he was a viewer in the proceedings to assess damages to Rodgers caused by the change of grade in question, being examined further on behalf of the plaintiff, testified as follows:

Q. Afterwards did you hear the testimony of the residents of the Borough who gave an opinion as to the injury which was sustained to the property by reason of that change of grade.

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled. Bill sealed.

A. There was testimony, yes, of a number of witnesses, but I do not recollect how many.

Q. State whether or not in your opinion such raising of the sidewalk was a damage to the property.

A. It was.

Q. Are you acquainted with the value of property in Bethlehem and around it?

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled. Bill sealed.

A. Well, to some extent, I am.

Q. State whether or not in your opinion such raising of the sidewalk was a damage to the property.

A. It was.

A. J. Snyder, examined on behalf of the plaintiff, testified as follows:

Q. After you had looked about the property did you hear the testimony of witnesses on the question of damages?

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled. Bill sealed.

A. Yes, but I cannot mention the number of witnesses we heard.

Q. State whether or not that change was a damage to the property.

A. Yes, I think it was.

Francis Held, examined on behalf of the plaintiff, testified as follows:

Q. After you had viewed the premises with the special end in view of ascertaining the damages sustained by Mr. Rodgers—

A. Yes.

Q. After you had viewed the premises did you hear the testimony of a number of witnesses from the residents of the Borough upon the subject.

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled. Bill sealed.

A. Yes.

Q. State whether the raising of that sidewalk was a damage to the property.

A. I think it was.

Christopher Gebhardt, examined on behalf of the plaintiff, testified as follows:

Q. Are you acquainted with the general market value of property in Easton?

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled. Bill sealed.

A. Yes.

Q. State whether or not in your opinion the raising of that sidewalk was a damage to Jeremiah Rodgers' property?

Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection overruled. Bill sealed.

Plaintiff, inter alia, presented the following points:

1. The cause of action accrued at the time of the physical change of grade on the ground.

Ans. This point we affirm.

2. The measure of damages in this case is the difference in the market value of the property before the change of grade, in the immediately adjoining property and the market value after the change of grade in front of the property, with interest on the principal sum to date.

Ans. This point we affirm.

Defendant, inter alia, presented the following points:

1. If the jury find that the grade of the several streets, including the pavements of the Borough of Freemansburg, was fixed in 1870 by the corporate authorities, and further find that work was done in raising Main Street in front of Joseph Lerch's property to the proper grade, and in raising the pavement on Main Street in front of said property to within five or more inches of the proper grade, either before or after 1870, and before October 26, 1878, when Jeremiah Rodgers, the plaintiff, purchased the property from the heirs of Joseph Lerch, deceased; and although the raising of the pavement to the proper grade was completed after the date of said purchase, this does not entitle Jeremiah Rodgers to any share of the damages, if any were sustained to the property by reason thereof, as he took the property by his purchase cum onere, and the verdict must be for the defendant.

Ans. If that point means that work was done in raising Main Street in front of Joseph Lerch's property by the Borough of Freemansburg, or in conformity to any action of the municipal authorities, then this point would be true. If it does not mean that, and it simply means the raising of the pavement by somebody else, other than the borough authorities, or without their assent, or not in conformity to any demand upon their part, then we negative this point.

2. If the jury find the facts set forth in the foregoing points as therein stated, and further find that at the time of the sale of the property it was stated by the heirs of Joseph Lerch, deceased, and others in the hearing and presence of Jeremiah Rogers that the purchaser of the property would be required to raise the pavement on Main Street in front of the property to the proper grade, then the legal effect of the matter set forth in this point is that Jeremiah Rodgers took the property by his purchase cum onere, and the verdict must be for the defendant.

Ans. If the jury find the facts of the first point as qualified by the court, and as we stated when we said if it were in that way we would affirm it, then we also affirm this point. If the jury do not so find, then we negative this point.

7. The Act of Assembly under which this claim is brought does not apply to or cover a case where no essential change of grade or alteration is made. Merely requiring the owner of a lot to raise his pavement three or four inches, to a level with the pavement of his neighbors, is not such essential change of grade or alteration.

Ans. This point we deny, as applicable to this case.

The court, REEDER, J., charged the jury as follows:

In this action Jeremiah Rodgers, the plaintiff, seeks to recover from the Borough of Freemansburg damages which he alleges that he sustained by reason of a change of grade on Main Street, in the Borough of Freemansburg.

Prior to 1878, under the laws of Pennsylvania, persons who were damaged by reason of a change of grade of a street were not permitted to reecover any damages against the municipal corporation creating such damages. Since then, however, by reason of an Act of Assembly passed in that year, the Legislature directed that persons suffering damage by reason of the change of grade by a municipal corporation, should be compensated for the amount of the damage which they had suffered by reason of any change of grade.

[Under the provisions of that Act of Assembly, before the jury can render a verdict awarding damages to a plaintiff in any case, they must find: first, that a change of grade has been made; second, that the change of grade has depreciated the value of the property; third, that the change was made without the consent of the owner of the property. In considering this case which you have been sworn to try, I will direct your attention to these three propositions inversely; and you will therefore consider, before passing upon the evidence in determining your verdict, first, if there was any change, whether the change was made without the owner's consent.

It is a legal presumption that no man will consent to any injury affecting his person or property. This is a mere presumption, however, which can be overthrown by evidence to the contrary. Therefore, when the plaintiff has proven, if he has succeeded in convincing you that the injury has been done to the property of Jeremiah Rodgers, the burden of proof, by reason of this legal presumption, rests upon the defendant to convince you that it was done with his consent. In the absence of any such evidence the law presumes that the injury done to the property, if any was done, was done without his consent. The only evidence in the case was that which I admitted under the offer of the defendant in relation to the declarations which were made at the public sale by Joseph Lerch's heirs of this property and were testified to have been made by Peter A. Fritchman in the presence of Jeremiah Rodgers, but which was denied by Rodgers. Those declarations were that an obligation would rest upon the purchaser of the property to raise the sidewalk in front of the property on Main Street to the established grade.

I admitted the evidence as I said then, because it was some evidence of his assent, not knowing at the time how far the defendant's testimony would go in support of it. We say to you now, that you shall disregard that testimony in considering whether there was any evidence of assent upon the part of Jeremiah Rodgers, and even though Jeremiah Rodgers assented to them at the time, we do not think that that assent, made by him at a time when he was not the owner of the property, could bind him after he became the owner of the property. It is a doubtful question in my mind whether assent made in that way is the assent that is required by the Act of Assembly. It is a doubtful question whether the assent required by the Act of Assembly is not a formal assent by the party, indicated in some way to the municipal authorities, and even though he were the owner of the property at the time and had assented—not listened to without assenting, as the testimony is—but had assented to the proposition that it would be the duty of the purchaser of that property to raise the pavement, that any such assent upon his part would be a waiver of his legal right to recover any damage which he may have suffered by reason of any elevation of the pavement. But it is not necessary for me to decide that question. It does not arise here.

The proposition as submitted is that certain statements or declarations were made at that time in his hearing, before he became the purchaser or owner, or acquired any title in the property, to which he gave no dissent. This is not evidence of any assent upon his part at all, and, therefore, so far as that testimony bearing upon the question of his assent to the alteration of it or change in the grade of the pavement is concerned you will disregard it entirely in making up your verdict.] Therefore, the testimony leaves you without any evidence of his assent to this change of grade at all.

You will, therefore, consider the next proposition, whether there was a change of grade.

It does not affect the right of the party injured to recover damages whether the change of grade is from a grade previously established by the borough council or whether it was a change from the natural surface of the ground; that is to say, it does not matter whether the Borough has formally, by resolution, established a grade at that place and afterwards by resolution or ordinance changed it, or whether the natural grade of the surface of the ground at that place has been the grade at that point, and the Borough afterward changed it by fixing another grade to which it elevates the street. In either event the plaintiff would be entitled to recover if such change caused a depreciation of the market value of his property.

The natural grade is the grade of the street at which it has been maintained for the convenience of the public. The words, change of grade, are used by the courts interchangeably for two purposes: first, for the purpose of indicating the change of grade as fixed by ordinance and as indicated by the official map of the Borough; and second, the change of grade which is the physical, actual alteration of the ground so as to conform to the proper grade, or the grade established on the borough map. It is the latter, we say to you, and the latter only, for which persons injured are entitled to recover; that is to say, the right of action against the Borough for a change of grade in a street does not commence with the fixing of the grade upon the borough map. It is not the paper grade that gives parties owning property along a street a right of action. It is the actual, physical work done upon the street in order to make the surface of the street conform to the actual grade. So in this case.

No matter when the ordinance of council was adopted fixing the grade, if you find from the evidence that the first attempt of the Borough to make this street actually conform to the grade fixed by the resolution of 1870, adopting the map, in front of the plaintiff's property was when they raised the pavement, and that the raising of the pavement on Main Street was a damage to the market value of the property, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover; that is to say, that if you find as a fact that when the plaintiff's pavement on Main Street was first put down it conformed to the surface of the ground as it then was, that when the pavement was first laid in front of that property it was laid upon and in accordance with the surface of the ground as it was at that time, and that the first time that the Borough took any steps to elevate that street so as to conform to the grade fixed by it by the resolution of 1870 adopting the borough map, was at the time in 1881, which was testified to by plaintiff's witnesses, then we say to you that that was such a grade as would entitle the plaintiff to recover, if he had suffered any damage to his property in consequence of it.

[If you believe from the evidence that in 1858, or in any year prior to 1870, the borough authorities graded the street by filling up the hollows and digging down the hillocks that existed along that street without fixing a regular grade by ordinance or resolution, then the elevation and the position in which they left the street and pavement at that time was the grade of that street; and no matter whether the pavement was higher or lower than the street at that time, the condition in which they left it was the grade for the pavement as well as the condition in which they left the street was the grade of the street.]

[The Borough could, and if you find that it did not by any subsequent action, adopt and enforce a grade, and enforce the raising of the pavement so as to conform to the grade which it then adopted, until 1881, and that it then raised the pavement in front of Jeremiah Rodger's property on Main Street so as to conform to the grade of 1870; and if you believe, furthermore, that the grade of 1870 was a change from the grade of the ground or of the pavement as it left it when it elevated the street in 1858, and that the change of 1881 was a damage to that property, then we say to you that the plaintiff would be entitled to your verdict.]

If, however, you find that there was no change of grade, that the pavement as laid did not conform to the natural surface of the ground, and that after it was raised, then, for the first time, it conformed to the natural surface of the ground, or the condition in which the Borough left the street after its improvement upon the street in 1858, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to your verdict, and your verdict would have to be for the defendant.

[If you believe from the testimony that there was no physical conformation of this pavement to the grade established in 1870, and you believe that the grade of the pavement was in the same condition and at the same elevation that it was after the Borough had completed its work upon the street in 1858, and that the change in order to make the pavement conform to the grade of 1870 was not until Jeremiah Rodgers became the purchaser of this property in 1881, then he would be entitled to recover.]

I do not know whether or not I have made clear to your minds the position which I have been discussing; but I will restate the proposition as clearly as possible.

It was testified to by the defendant's witnesses that in 1858 changes were made in the elevation of this street, in the grade of Main Street. If you believe that to be true, and you believe that after it made the changes in that street there was no fixed elevation or grade of the street, and the testimony shows none, and you must therefore assume that there was none, then the condition in which it left the street was the grade for the street; and the position or elevation at which it left the pavement was the grade of the pavement.

[There is no contention that that grade so left by the Borough in 1858 was ever fixed by any subsequent ordinance or resolution of the Borough until 1870, when it adopted this official map, which is in evidence, and which fixed the grade of that street. When that map was adopted fixing the grade of Main Street in front of that property that fixed the grade of both the pavement and the street.

The testimony in the cause upon the part of the defendant was that that map made no change of grade in front of Rodgers' property, so far as the street was concerned, if it made a change in the grade so far as the sidewalk was concerned; and that afterwards the Borough, in 1881, elevated that sidewalk in order to make it conform to the grade established in 1870. If that elevation was a damage or an injury to the property, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in this action.] If it did not do so, or if it was no injury to the property, then the defendant would be entitled to your verdict.

You will next have to determine what, if any, is the amount of the damage to which the plaintiff is entitled by your verdict if you should find that he is entitled to any.

If this injury was a damage in the way in which I have already stated, if you find the facts which are essential to your verdict as I have already stated them in the first part of my charge to be, and you find that they caused any damage to the property of Jeremiah Rodgers, you will have to determine what the amount of that damage is. The testimony in relation to the damage that was caused to the property by reason of the elevation of the pavement on Main Street has already been alluded to. The claim of the plaintiff was that it was for the depression in the yard of the house, he being obliged to step down from the pavement upon the yard and again step up in order to go into the house, and that it was for the water being turned from the yard into his cellar—from the pavement into his cellar—and from the interference, by the elevation of the pavement, with the front gate, and the damming of the water running down Madison Street upon his pavement by the elevation of this pavement on Main Street and turning it into his property and thence into his cellar.

You have heard the testimony in regard to it and you will take the evidence into consideration upon all these questions, and determine whether they have caused him any dam age or not. I will only call your attention to the testimony in relation to the condition of the pavement on Madison Street, he claiming that the water running down Madison Street was turned, by reason of the elevated condition of the pavement on Main Street, into his property. The defendant claims that this was caused by his own negligence, he having had the established grade on Madison Street given to him by the borough surveyor, and he having refused to lay his pavement in conformity to it. If that is true, then you would have to eliminate from your consideration the turning of the water because of that condition of the pavement; because, if that allegation of some of the defendant's witnesses is true, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover because of that.

Jeremiah Rodgers, however, contends that he laid his pavement on Madison Street, in conformity with the grade given to him by the borough surveyor, and said something in connection with that about stakes being driven. If that is true, and you believe his testimony, and you believe that that pavement was laid in conformity with the grade given to him by the borough surveyor, then he would be entitled to recover for any damages sustained by reason of the elevation of the pavement on Main Street and the turning of the water into his property, if you believe that it was so turned in. So also with the condition of the fence; if you find that the raising of the pavement interfered with the opening of the gate, that would be an element which you would have a right to take into consideration in determining the amount of damages to which he was entitled.

The true measure of damages, however, is this: it is not the amount which it would cost him to place his property in the same condition that it was before, but it is the difference in the market value of the property before the change of grade and after the change.

It is contended by the plaintiff upon the one hand and disputed by the defendant upon the other, that the difference in the market value which is to be the measure of damages in this case must be found by the jury to be the difference between the property as it was originally left in 1858, and the condition in which it was after the pavement was elevated so as to grade with the pavement on either side. We say to you that that is correct, as a matter of law; that after the Borough had compelled the adjoining property owners to elevate there pavement so as to conform to the established grade, that if by that act the property of Jeremiah Rodgers was depreciated, you have no right to take such depreciation of value into consideration in order to arrive at the amount of appreciation of value after the pavement was elevated.

The true comparison is the condition in which the Borough left the pavement in 1858, after it had fixed and graded that street and left it until 1870, when it made the first change (if you believe that that is the fact, that the first change after 1858 was made in 1870) the condition in which it was at that time is the condition with which you must compare the property after it was elevated to the grade, and the difference between its value then, or in that condition and its value at the time it was up upon grade after the alteration is the true measure of damages which you must find in this case. You will understand very easily that if a Borough, or a municipal corporation direct a change of grade along a street, and the pavements are elevated upon either side of a property, that that depression in the pavement would of course be, under ordinary circumstances, a depreciation in the value of the property. But in order to arrive at the measure of damages which the owner of that property would sustain after his pavement had been elevated to grade, you would have no right to take into consideration the condition of his property when his property is depressed by reason of the change to grade of the adjoining property owners; but you would have to compare it with the market value of his property before the change of grade, if it was on a level with the pavement of the property owners adjoining, and its condition after it had been raised by the Borough; and the difference is the true measure of damages for your consideration.

I do not propose to comment upon the testimony in this case. A number of witnesses have been examined upon both sides who have testified as to their opinion in regard to the amount of damages. [If you believe from the evidence that his property is worth more to day than it was prior, or as much to-day as it was prior, to the elevation of the pavement, then your verdict will be for the defendant. If you believe it is worth less to-day than it was befor the elevation of the pavement, then your verdict will be for the plaintiff; and it will then be your duty to ascertain from all the evidence in the case how much less it is worth; and after having determined how much less this property is worth to-day than it was before the change of the grade, then you will allow that in your verdict with interest from the time of the injury.]

A verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff for $387.45 and a judgment entered thereon.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in admitting the evidence above noted; the answers to the plaintiff's first and second points, defendant's first, second and seventh points, and the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. O. H. Meyers and W. E. Doster, for plaintiff in error:

The questions asked the witnesses were incompetent and irrelevant. It enabled the witnesses to testify to the opinion of others, which the law does not tolerate; besides, the admission of this testimony was in violation of the plainest and most familiar rule of evidence, which forbids the introduction of hearsay testimony.

The rule laid down by the court as to the measure of damage is in clear contravention of the rule, repeatedly declared by our supreme court, that "The measure of damages is the difference between what the property would have sold for as affected by the injury, and what it would have brought, unaffected by such injury."

In the latter case the court says that the rule as laid down in 7 Serg. & R. 411, has been followed in Pa. R. R. Co. v. Heister, 8 Pa. 450; Searle v. Lackawanna etc. R. R. Co. 33 Pa. 57, and in a number of other cases there cited.

The error committed here is that the point of time when the jury are to determine the value of the property is to-day, that is at the time of the trial; and if it is worth less to-day than it was before the change of grade, then the difference is the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The alleged change of grade was done in June, 1881. The case was tried in 1886; and, for aught we know, the value of the property in 1886 may have depreciated in value from other causes since 1881.

Rodgers, the purchaser of the property, bought it cum onere, and is therefore not entitled to any damage by reason of the subsequent raising of the pavement. In other words, the law required him to regulate his bid on the property, so that he paid no more for the property than it was worth, as affected by the subsequent raising of the pavement.

A charge must be tested by its general effect on the minds of the jury, and not by the sentences culled here and there. If as a whole the charge was calculated to mislead the jury, there is error in the record; if not, there is none.

In Little Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. French, 2 W. N. C. 718, the jury were told they might measure the proportion of the injury done by the defendants, with a liberal hand, and it was held not to be error taking the charge as a whole.

See also Carman v. Clarion River Nav. Co. 2 W. N. C. 720; Blair Iron & Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 3 W. N. C. 103.

Directing the jury to allow interest on the amount of damages from the time of the injury was not error.

Where the property of a citizen is injured by a corporation, against or without his consent, under an authority coupled with the constitutional obligation to pay a just compensation, the duty of ascertaining the amount is an incident to the obligation to pay, and clearly falls upon the corporation.

Railroad v. Gesner 20 Pa. 240.

Under the Act of May 24, 1878, the liability of the Borough was fixed at the time of the physical change of grade, and the injured party had the right to expect his money at that time. Delay of payment beyond that time is consequently an injury for which the only compensation is interest.

Philadelphia v. Dyer, 41 Pa. 463; Pa. R. Co. v. Cooper, 8 Pa. 408; Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Burson, 61 Pa. 369; Bare v. Hoffman, 79 Pa. 71.

Per Curiam:

A careful examination of the questions relating to the admission of evidence discloses no substantial error. Some answers may have been irrelevant, but they did no harm. The evidence was fairly submitted. We see no error in the charge nor in the answers to the points.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 133, E. D. All the Judges present.

Error to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment for plaintiff, for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense in an action of sci. fa. to revive a judgment. Affirmed.

At the trial in the court below, before SCHUYLER, P. J., the following facts appeared:

This was a sci. fa. by William F. Detwiller, to revive a judgment against Samuel R. Weber and Judith his wife, for the alleged debt of the wife. The judgment was obtained originally before a justice of the peace, from whose docket the following transcript was filed in the court of common pleas August 30, 1877:

"'Served on oath by producing the original summons to the defendants and informing them of the contents thereof, Dec. 9. Now, Dec. 14, parties appear. Case continued to the 23d inst. at 4 o'clock P. M. Dec. 23, parties appear. Plaintiff claims $89.12 for medicine and medical attendance for the family. Defendant objects to $30, which amount was for his son's sickness, and a set-off for carpenter work done for plaintiff. Plaintiff admits there is an offset. Deft. is required to produce his book of original entries. Adjourned to Jan. 6, 1877, at 8 o'clock, A. M. Parties met again; defendant produced his book, set-off $18.18; found correct and corresponding with plaintiff's book up to a certain date and year, the balance of $60.81 for which amount there were no original entries and could not make affidavit to it. Plaintiff produced his book where original entries were kept. $36.44 were taken as correct. Defendant's offset, $54.62, in full, leaving a balance in favor of plff. of $4.50, and $30, with $12.60 interest, amount $47.10; this debt had been contracted by the deft., Judith Weber, for necessaries, to wit: medical attendance furnished by the plaintiff; to the use of the family of said Judith Weber. Jan. 13, judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants for the sum of $47.10, with costs of suit. Execution issued Aug. 7, 1877. Returned 'No Goods.'"

Judith Weber filed the following affidavit of defense:

"Judith Weber, one of the defendants, being duly sworn according to law, says that she is one of the defendants in the above stated case, and that she at the hearing of the case was not indebted to the said plaintiff, in any manner whatever; that she never entered into a contract with the said plaintiff for medical attendance or family necessaries; that the plaintiff's book of original entries contains no charges against this deponent of any kind; that Jacob Nickum, the justice of the peace, called on this deponent and urged her to sign a revival of the said judgment, and that then for the first time she learned that there was a judgment against her; that at the time of the hearing of the case before Justice Nickum, the plaintiff's claim was outlawed, and that that plea was made to the justice by Samuel R. Weber, the husband of this defendant, but that the justice would not pay any attention to the said statement; that this deponent never was summoned to appear before Justice Nickum in the said case, and therefore had no hearing before the said justice; that this deponent never was nor is she now indebted to the said plaintiff; that she has a just and legal defense against the revival of the said judgment; all of which she is able to prove to the satisfaction of the court if she will be permitted to do so."

A supplemental affidavit was as follows:

"Judith Weber, one of the defendants above named, being duly sworn according to law, says that she has a just and valid defense to the whole of plaintiff's claim in the above entitled action of scire facias, and to the original action, by the plaintiff, William F. Detwiller, brought, the nature and character of which is as follows:

"That she did not employ the said plaintiff to attend the family of herself and her husband, and that he never rendered any medical services or furnished any medicine to her, or to her said family at her request and on the credit of her separate estate; but that the said services were rendered and medicine furnished to and on the credit of her husband Samuel R. Weber, with whom the said William F. Detwiller had mutual dealings and accounts, which were adjusted on the hearing before the said Jacob Nickum, the justice before whom the said original action was brought, as appears by the record and transcript thereof.

"That the said record and transcript thereof does not primarily set forth that the said services were rendered and medicine furnished to this deponent or her family at her request and on her credit, or that the same were charged to her; but only that the claim of the said plaintiff was 'for medicine and medical attendance for the family.'

"That the said record and transcript of the said alleged judgment are further void and of no effect because it does not therein and thereby affirmatively appear that an execution was issued against Samuel R. Weber, the husband of the deponent, and duly returned that no property of the said Samuel R. Weber could be found; or that thereupon an alias execution was issued against her to be levied out of her separate estate, as required by law.

"That the said transcript and the writ of scire facias thereon were prematurely and improperly proceeded upon in the court of common pleas of said county, the said entry of said transcript and the issuing of said writ of scire facias, being without warrant in law, and wholly and entirely illegal and void, ab initio, as by the said transcript and record appears.

"That the said transcript and record do not affirmatively show that the said action by the said William F. Detwiller was brought for the purpose of charging the separate estate of this deponent; or that she, this deponent, had notice or knowledge that she or her separate estate was so held and charged; or that the said William F. Detwiller, plaintiff, was by said justice, at the hearing, duly sworn to prove his claim; or that any other legal and competent evidence thereof was produced and heard by said justice in said action, as against her, the said Judith Weber, and her separate estate; or that she, the said Judith, had ever acknowledged the said indebtedness or promised to pay the same; or that the said medicine and medical attendance were furnished for the support of the family of the said husband and wife, to wit: the said Samuel R. Weber and Judith Weber, his wife; or that any legal proof whatsoever was made to or heard by the said justice that the said William F. Detwiller had any legal claim against her, the said Judith Weber, for medical services rendered and medicine furnished to the family of the said Samuel R. Weber and Judith Weber, his wife, upon the credit of the said Judith Weber and at her request; all which she expects to prove upon the trial of this cause."

By consent of plaintiff's attorneys, the following depositions were taken:

Judith Weber, sworn:

"I am one of the defendants in the suit in which the original judgment was obtained. I knew the plaintiff Dr. Detwiller; I never entered into a contract with Dr. Detwiller for medical attendance on my family: I never made a contract with him; I don't owe a cent, nor was I in any manner (indebted) at the time of bringing this suit; I never contracted with him. No summons was ever served on me in this case. I was not present at the hearing. I never knew there was a judgment against me until Esquire Nickum called on me to sign a revival. I refused to sign a revival, because I was not indebted to him, and he had nothing to do with me."

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, states that he has no questions on cross examination, but objects to the whole of the testimony, because incompetent and irrelevant for the reason the docket of the justice, Esquire Nickum, who gave judgment for the plaintiff in 1876 shows that defendants were summoned and that judgment was duly entered against the wife for necessaries according to the Act of Assembly, and makes the same objection to the testimony of the following witness:

Josephus Weber, sworn:

"I am a son of defendants and was present at the hearing. I saw Dr. Detwiller's books there. I looked at the entry of charge. I looked at the entry of my father's name Samuel R. Weber, nothing there besides that. The whole account (was) charged to him. Mother's name not there. Nothing said about the wife; only a single charge against Samuel R. Weber and nobody else. My father made objections on account of the bill and of it being over six years. My father mentioned it to the justice and I did to the esquire myself. My mother (was) not there. The bill (was) made on account of my sickness. I was a married man. I asked the doctor for the bill and he would not give to me."

Plaintiff entered a rule to show cause why judgment should not be taken for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, which the court, after hearing, made absolute.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in entering the judgment against Judith Weber for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense.

Mr. Elisha Allis, for plaintiff in error:

The judgment against Mrs. Weber was void as is shown by the transcript, which sets forth the mutual dealings between the plaintiff and Mr. Weber. It recites that on demand each had produced "his" book of original entries against the other; that plaintiff claimed for medicine and medical attendance for the family. Defendant objects to $30, which was for "his" son's sickness, and a set-off for carpenter work done by him for plaintiff. Plaintiff admits there is a set-off.

For such a claim there should have been no recovery against the wife.

Murray v. Keyes, 35 Pa. 384; Parke v. Kleeber, 37 Pa. 251; Sawtelle's App. 84 Pa. 310; Hoff v. Koerper, 103 Pa. 396; Martin v. Renier, 11 W. N. C. 370.

The wife must contract in her own behalf. The evidence must clearly prove, and the pleadings aver it.

Berger v. Clark, 79 Pa. 340, 345.

A joint purchase of necessaries is, in law, the contract of the husband alone.

Rigoney v. Neiman, 73 Pa. 330.

The very essence of her liability is that the necessaries sued for were furnished at her request and on her credit. If not so furnished, her separate estate cannot be made liable.

Sawtelle's App. 84 Pa. 306, 311; Hecker v. Haak, 88 Pa. 238, 242.

When, therefore, as appears by the transcript, the plaintiff admitted the set-off, in the husband's right, he destroyed his case, as against the wife.

A wife cannot be concluded from denying her appearance before the justice, by the entry, "parties appear," for she is not named. The depositions of the wife and the son were admissible to explain and limit the word "parties;" for nothing is taken against her by intendment or enlarged by construction.

The judgment being void, the transcript brought nothing into the court of common pleas, which gave it jurisdiction over the person or estate of Mrs. Weber, nothing on which it could act.

Hecker v. Haak, 88 Pa. 238; Gould v. McFall, 1 Cent. Rep. 858, 111 Pa. 68.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
Jacob L. GRIM.

1. In Pennsylvania a clear, distinct and unequivocal acknowledgment of a debt is sufficient to take a case out of the Statute of Limitations.
2. Such an acknowledgment being proved, the law will imply the promise without its having been actually made.
3. Evidence that the specific statement of the account, for the recovery of which the suit was brought, was exhibited by the plaintiff to the debtor and the items distinctly pointed out to him, and that he thereupon made a payment thereon, and made no objection to the existence and validity of any of the items thus designated, justifies the finding of the jury that he admitted the bill to be right and acknowledged his liability therefor.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 266, E. D. All the Judges present.

Error to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action on an account. Affirmed.

This was an appeal to the common pleas by Martin L. Yost from a judgment of a justice of the peace, of $100, in favor of Jacob L. Grim, in an action for a balance due on a book account. Defendant pleaded nil debet and the Statute of Limitations.

At the trial before SCHUYLER, P. J., the following facts appeared:

Grim, the plaintiff, was a miller and sold Yost, the defendant, flour and feed. The parties had a settlement in April, 1873, at which settlement (as sworn to by Grim) Yost informed Grim that he had gone into the lumber business with his brother-in-law, Moritz, under the name of Yost & Moritz, and asked Grim to get his lumber of the firm, saying that the firm would get its horse feed from Grim, who should charge the whole to the individual account of Yost, as formerly, but keep the items that went to the firm marked, so they could be identified.

This agreement was carried out. Grim bought some lumber of the firm, and Yost, as formerly, got his horse feed of Grim and it was charged to his individual account. The firm also got feed of Grim, which was charged on the day book to Yost & Moritz but was posted on the ledger to Yost's individual account. Yost denied ever making any such agreement with Grim.

May 22, 1878, Grim called on Yost for a settlement, taking with him a statement of the account, which showed charges for feed delivered between May 10, 1873, and April 9, 1877, and after deducting the price of certain lumber, purchased by Grim from Yost & Moritz, showed a balance due Grim, with interest, of $129.39. At this time Yost gave Grim a check for $54.93.

Grim, on direct examination, after testifying to the fact of presenting the bill to Yost and noting a small offset for lumber and adding interest to the accounts, testified as follows:

Q. What did he say then?

A. He did not say anything then; he wanted to know what goods he personally got for himself, and I told him I could not tell him exactly what, except these lower items for the seed wheat and for the seed rye, etc.; and then we looked over it awhile and I told him this bill is made out Jan. 1, 1877, until here, and then he figured out and then: "Well," says he "I and Mr. Moritz are two; we are not friends together; we don't speak together and I don't get along with Mr. Moritz, and now I'll give you a check and then you go to Mr. Moritz and get some out of Mr. Moritz;" and I told him I couldn't go to Mr. Moritz because I didn't have it charged to him in my ledger that way; that I had charged him, Dr. Yost, with it, and he said they were not on good terms and they would not speak, and I should go and see him and collect it out of him; and I told him I would do so provided I could; and the next time I saw Dr. Yost I told him that I couldn't collect anything and I wouldn't do it that way.

On cross examination he testified, inter alia, as follows:

Q. Why was it that the check was given for $54.92 and not for just $54?

A. Why, he wanted to know what he got individually and I told him I couldn't tell on this bill, that I hadn't the books with me, that if I had the books with me I could tell—but here is the marks yet that were made with my pencil, and I said "I know that this hundred you got out on the farm private where the pencil mark is," and then he figured up a little and says he: "I'll give you my check now for $54.92; I and Moritz are not on speaking terms, and you try and collect that from him."

Q. You say that after some figuring and talking to find out what Yost got himself you came to this amount of $54.92, and after that he gave you a check for that amount.

A. Yes, he figured out and told me that he would give me a check for that amount.

Q. Was that the amount you and he made out that he had got individually?

A. No, I told him I couldn't tell the amount he got.

Defendant presented the following point: 1. Under all the evidence the verdict must be for the defendant.

Ans. I cannot affirm this point.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"Now take the evidence as given by Jacob L. Grim himself and consider whether that, assuming it to be true, would justify you in finding that the defendant did acknowledge the existence of this debt. Mr. Grim testifies as follows (Reads from direct and cross examination of J. L. Grim.): Now this is the account given by the plaintiff himself, and is the only evidence, so far as I remember, bearing upon what took place at Dr. Yost's office at the time the check for $54.92 was given—the only evidence given by the plaintiff bearing upon what took place at that time. Throwing, for the present, out of the case all the other evidence, can you say from what Mr. Grim says that this giving of the check for $54.92 was such a clear and distinct acknowledgment on the part of the defendant that the whole bill that was presented at that time was his individual bill? Was his evidence upon that point so clear and distinct that you can say without hesitation that the defendant, by the payment of the $54.92, intended to acknowledge his liability for the full amount of the bill?"

"If you are satisfied that this was a firm debt to begin with, and that Dr. Yost agreed on May 22, 1878, that the bill was all right, acknowledged his liability for it, then your verdict would be in favor of the plaintiff, provided the evidence is such as satisfies you beyond hesitation that such was the fact."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.

The assignments of error specified the answer to defendant's point, and the portions of the charge given above.

Mr. Robert L. Cope, for plaintiff in error:

The claim of the plaintiff on its face was barred by the Statute of March 27, 1715. The supreme court, in construing this Act, has added to it a provision that if the defendant within six years acknowledges the claim in a clear, unequivocal, unambiguous and unqualified manner, so as to imply a new promise and be consistent with a promise to pay, such an acknowledgment shall avoid the statute.

Suter v. Sheeler, 22 Pa. 308; Bolton v. King, 14 W. N. C. 361.

A man cannot be said to waive or surrender a legal right unless his intention to do so clearly appears, either by his acts or words. It has therefore been held that "If there be circumstances accompanying an acknowledgment, which repel the presumption of a promise or intention to pay, or if the expression be equivocal, vague and indeterminate, leading to no certain conclusion but at best to possible inference which may affect different minds in different ways, they ought not to go to a jury as evidence of a new promise to revive the cause of action."

2 Greenl. Ev. §404; Shafer v. Shafer, 40 Pa. 51.

Does not the request to collect some from Moritz clearly repel the presumption of a present intent to pay the whole claim himself? Is it consistent with a promise to pay the whole balance?

Senseman v. Hershman, 82 Pa. 83.

The question as to the sufficiency of the evidence, assuming it to be true, is clearly for the court and not for the jury.

Shafer v. Shafer, 40 Pa. 51; Senseman v. Hershman, 82 Pa. 83; Landis v. Roth, 16 W. N. C. 309.

Mr. W. E. Doster, for defendant in error:

In Palmer v. Gillespie, 95 Pa. 344, the court says:

It is not essential that the promise be actual or express, provided the other necessary facts are shown. A clear, distinct and unequivocal acknowledgment of a debt is sufficient to take a case out of the operation of the statute. It must be an admission consistent with a promise to pay. If so, the law will imply the promise, without its having been actually or expressly made. There must not be any uncertainty as to the particular debt to which the admission applies. It must be so distinct and unambiguous as to remove hesitation in regard to the debtor's meaning.

Fries v. Boisselet, 9 Serg. & R. 128; Bailey v. Bailey, 14 Serg. & R. 195; Allison v. James, 9

Watts, 380; Gilkyson v. Larue, 6 Watts & S. 213; Hazlebaker v. Reeves, 12 Pa. 264; Davis v. Steiner, 14 Pa. 275; Johns v. Lantz, 63 Pa. 324.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

It is settled law in Pennsylvania that a clear, distinct and unequivocal acknowledgment of a debt is sufficient to take a case out of the Statute of Limitations. Such an acknowledgment being proved, the law will imply the promise without its having been actually made. Palmer v. Gillespie, 95 Pa. 344.

In the present case the evidence was sufficient to justify the finding of the necessary facts. The plaintiff below testified that the specific statement of the account, for the recovery of which this suit was brought, was by him exhibited to the debtor, and the items got for the latter distinctly pointed out to him, that he thereupon made a payment thereon, and made no objection to the existence and validity of any of the items thus designated. This evidence justified the submission to the jury to find that he admitted the bill to be right and acknowledged his liability therefor.

Judgment affirmed.

Walter L. C. BIDDLE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
D. Dodge TOMLINSON et al.

1. The purchaser of a judgment is ordinarily charged with the inspection of the record of that judgment, and is in general affected with notice of any right which it plainly discloses. A like rule applies to purchases of land sold on execution to satisfy a judgment.
2. A deed of land, with all rents, issues and profits, and all the grantor's estate, right and interest, to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, vests in the grantee the legal title and equitable estate, including ground rent and life estate, of the grantor.
3. A judgment can not be attacked collaterally, save for collusion.
4. Where parties have contrived by judgment to defeat the rights of a third person, such judgment is not a bar against the claim of the party sought to be defrauded.

(Argued Jan. 26, Decided March 28, 1887.)

Error to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict directed for plaintiffs in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

The action was brought by D. Dodge Tomlinson and Caroline B., his wife, John M. Armington, William Elliott and Sarah H. his wife, Charles Ganshine and Ann E. his wife, and Monterey Armington, plaintiffs, heirs at law and next of kin of Catharine Armington, deceased, against Christiana Horn, to recover possession of certain premises in the City of Philadelphia.

On rule to show cause, Walter L. C. Biddle, as landlord, was joined as codefendant, and admitted to defend and filed a plea of "not guilty."

At the trial in the court below the following facts appeared:

February 17, 1846, Charles H. Fisher and wife deeded to Henry Knight and Thomas Armington, in fee, the lot in question, reserving an annual ground rent of $46. In the same year, Henry Knight and Thomas Armington deeded the same lot to John F. Armington in fee, subject to the ground rent. In 1847 a judgment was entered against John F. Armington for $500, in favor of one Malin.

On December 17, 1851, John F. Armington and Catharine, his wife, conveyed the premises to Josiah Hibbard for the consideration of $1,000, subject to the ground rent, and December 20 thereafter, said Hibbard conveyed the premises to Catharine, wife of John F. Armington, for the same consideration, subject to the ground rent. All these deeds were duly executed and recorded.

On April 1, 1852, the judgment of April 2, 1847, was revived by an agreement filed on record and signed by said Armington but without notice to Catharine Armington, and a fi. fa. was issued thereon, under which the property in question was returned "levied and condemned."

A venditioni exponas was subsequently issued and the premises sold to John Wurfflein for $100; and December 30, 1856, the purchaser received a sheriff's deed for the same in fee, subject to the ground rent.

Wurfflein took possession of the premises and collected the rents until April 12, 1867, when he purchased the ground rent in fee from Rebecca Snowden, in whom the same was then vested, and a deed was made to him for the same.

Wurfflein continued in possession until May 1, 1869, when he conveyed the premises to Jacob Knoell for the consideration of $3,600. The deed recited that the premises were the same which the sheriff of the City and County of Philadelphia, by deed dated December 30, 1856, and recorded, etc., "granted and confirmed unto the said John Wurfflein in fee, subject to the payment of a certain yearly ground rent therein mentioned, of $42, which said yearly ground rent Rebecca C. Snowden by indenture dated the 12th of April, 1867, * * * granted and assigned unto the said John Wurfflein his heirs and assigns, whereby the same merged and became forever extinguished; together with all and singular the buildings and improvements, ways, waters, water courses, rights, liberties, privileges, hereditaments and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining, and the reversions or remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, property, claim and demand whatsoever of them, the said John Wurfflein and Anna B., his wife, in law, equity or otherwise, howsoever, of, and to the same, and every part thereof, to have and to hold the said three story brick messuage or tenement and lot or piece of ground above described, hereditaments and premises, hereby granted and mentioned and intended so to be with the appurtenances unto the said Jacob Knoell his heirs and assigns, to and for the only proper use and behoof of the said Jacob Knoell, his heirs and assigns forever."

Knoell took possession of the property under this deed, occupied a portion of it, and received the rents up to the time of his decease in 1875, when his widow and children, devisees in his last will and testament, succeeded him in possession, receiving the rents until September, 1882.

Catharine Armington died March 5, 1856, leaving surviving her husband John F. and children, plaintiffs in this action. John F. Armington died in February, 1877; and in September of the same year the heirs of Catharine Armington, the plaintiffs in this suit, brought an action of ejectment for the lot in question, contending that their mother, Catharine Armington, died seised in fee of the property, and that upon her death their father, John F. Armington, became entitled to a life estate in the premises as tenant by the curtesy, with remainder to themselves, subject to the ground rent; that the Malin judgment revived without notice to the mother, and did not bind more than the life estate of John F. Armington; that the sheriff's sale passed only that life estate to Wurfflein; that upon the death of said John F. Armington they became entitled to possession of the premises, subject to the ground rent.

The devisees of Knoell defended that action. The case was tried in October, 1881, and a verdict rendered for the defendant and a judgment entered thereon. On error to the supreme court the judgment was reversed and a venire de novo ordered; the court, in an opinion delivered March 23, 1882, holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on their title. See 100 Pa. 165.

April 1, 1882, a summons in covenant sur ground rent deed first recited, was issued in the name of John Wurfflein against Henry Knight and Thomas Armington, the original covenantors; and on May 17, 1882, judgment was obtained thereon without notice to the heirs of Catharine Armington, on two returns of nihil habet, for the arrears of ground rent from July 1, 1867, to January 1, 1882, $918.45, the alias summons being returned "Served on Christopher Knoell, tenant in possession."

June 20, 1882, a venditioni exponas was issued on this judgment and the property advertised for sale.

June 28, 1882, an affidavit was filed by Monterey Armington, one of the heirs of Catharine Armington, deceased, which set out that John Wurfflein, the nominal plaintiff in the action on the ground rent deed, had no interest or title in or to the ground rent, having conveyed all his interest to Jacob Knoell, and that the suit was the result of a fraudulent conspiracy between Wurfflein and Knoell to defraud the plaintiffs in ejectment out of the property to which they are entitled and the income thereof; that the summons was served upon Christopher Knoell, one of the heirs of Jacob Knoell; and that the deponent and his brothers and sisters had no knowledge of the suit until they saw the advertisement, June 27, 1882.

On this affidavit the court granted a rule to show cause why judgment should not be opened, venditioni exponas set aside and the terretenants admitted to make a defense. Proceedings to stay meanwhile.

July 1, 1882, the court entered an order as follows:

"Rule continued and sale to proceed, subject to the rule."

July 3, 1882, the property was sold by the sheriff to the defendant Biddle. No notice of the rule to open the judgment and set aside the venditioni exponas was given at the sheriff's sale; and it appears from the evidence that Biddle had no knowledge of the same but immediately after the sale was informed of the fact by the attorney who represented the Armington heirs at the sale.

On July 8, 1882, the rules to open the judgment and set aside the venditioni exponas were discharged. On July 15 Biddle paid the balance of the purchase money, $2,000 and received a sheriff's deed for such premises; and the proceeds of the sale were paid into court.

The ejectment suit of the Armington heirs against Rau and the Knoells was again tried in October, 1882, and verdict rendered for the plaintiffs, the jury assessing damages for mesne profits at $1,300, and judgment was entered thereon.

A hab. fac. was issued to which the sheriff returned that he found the premises in possession of a sheriff's vendee under a paramount title, and the court refused to grant an attachment against the sheriff; whereupon, on December 2, 1882, a bill in equity was filed by the Armington heirs, alleging that the suit for arrears of ground rent and the judgment and execution sale thereunder to Biddle were part of a fraudulent scheme conceived by Charles and Christopher Knoell for the purpose of defrauding the Armington heirs of their title to the premises.

The bill prayed a decree impounding the fund in court, and declaring the sale to Biddle fraudulent and void, and asking that an injunction issue. This bill was subsequently dismissed, without costs, on the ground that no fraud had been shown as to Biddle the purchaser, and without prejudice to the plaintiffs' legal rights, if any they had, to maintain the action of ejectment for the same premises.

See 6 Cent. Rep. 903.

At the trial of this action plaintiff read in evidence the depositions of Wurfflein and Charles and Christopher Knoell, children and devisees of Jacob Knoell, deceased, showing that the sale from Wurfflein to Jacob Knoell was of the whole property including the ground rent; and that Wurfflein asserted no claim for the ground rent or for arrears; that Wurfflein, after his purchase from the sheriff and up to his sale to Knoell, had possession of the premises and was in receipt of the rents therefor.

The court charged the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury: I shall not trouble you with any determination of this case upon the facts which have been submitted in evidence, further than to instruct you it is very much a question of law—what is involved in it. Under all the evidence I instruct you to find a verdict for the plaintiffs, reserving the question for the court in banc as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and reserving also the right to enter judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto, as it is termed, if under all the evidence the court should be of opinion that the defendant is entitled to a verdict. Therefore you have nothing more to do than to find a verdict for the plaintiffs."

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in directing a verdict for plaintiffs.

Mr. Charles Hart, for plaintiff in error:

A purchaser at sheriff's sale need not regard a notice of defense contained in the record.

Taylor v. Young, 71 Pa. 81; Farrington v. Woodward, 82 Pa. 259.

It appears from the record in a suit that on May 17, 1882, judgment had been entered on two returns of nihil. On June 20, following, a vend. ex. was issued. Here, then, was a valid judgment by a court of competent jurisdiction, and a valid writ of sale.

If dissatisfied with the action of the court, in discharging the rule to show cause these plaintiffs might, before the sheriff's sale, have removed by writ of error the record of court, and thus have submitted for revision the action of that court in entering the judgment of May 17, 1882, for arrears of ground rent, as well as the order made on July 1, 1882, directing the sale to proceed.

Fraley v. Steinmetz, 22 Pa. 440.

Having failed to do this the terretenants (the plaintiffs below) acquiesced in the judgment against them, and cannot now be heard in prejudice of rights derived from such judgment.

Mr. Joseph M. Pile, for defendants in error:

The ground rent estate reserved from the lot, passed by the conveyance of the lot by Wurfflein.

None of the Armington heirs were present at the sale to Biddle. Their counsel was present, and was entitled to presume that anyone who was a possible bidder had knowledge of what the record clearly set out.

Mere silence will not estop a party having title; it will only postpone when silence is a fraud.

Robinson v. Justice, 2 Penr. & W. 19.

There can be no fraud in silence where the purchaser or other actor was or ought to have been acquainted with the subject of his action, or, having means of knowledge, neglected it.

Commonwealth v. Moltz, 10 Pa. 531; Hepburn v. M'Dowell, 17 Serg. & R. 383.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The title to the lot, subject to the yearly ground rent of $42, was in Catharine Armington at the time of her decease. John F. Armington's life estate in the lot became vested in John Wurfflein, who afterwards purchased the ground rent. In 1869, Wurfflein conveyed the lot by deed, which on its face is for the fee, without reservation, to Jacob Knoell.

John F. Armington died in 1877, and soon after the heirs of Catharine Armington brought suit in ejectment for the lot. Before the termination of that suit an action was brought in covenant, in the name of Wurfflein as plaintiff, against Knight and Armington, grantees in the deed by Fisher, dated February 17, 1846, which created the ground rent. The alias summons was served on Christopher Knoell, tenant in possession, who is one of the devisees of Jacob Knoell, said devisees owned the ground rent and had possession of the ground. Not until the property was advertised to be sold by the sheriff did the plaintiffs learn of this action in covenant, and that judgment had been entered "for want of appearance on two returns of nihil habet," and "damages assessed at $918.45."

It scarcely needed the direct testimony of Wurfflein to show that he knew he had no interest in the ground rent, and that he permitted the use of his name in an action to recover arrears for the very purpose of preventing the heirs of Catharine Armington from getting possession of the property. Nor is the case made much plainer by the testimony of Christopher Knoell that his father bought the lot from Wurfflein, clear of all incumbrance, and that he did not know of any ground rent.

On the day that the plaintiffs learned that the lot was advertised for sale, they prayed the court to open the judgment, to the end that they might defend; the court granted a rule to show cause, but permitted sale by the sheriff, subject to the rule. Although the petition set out the facts and was supported by affidavit, the heirs of Catharine Armington were unable to convince the court that the judgment ought to be opened at their request, but they succeeded in getting enough upon the record to warn the purchaser at the sheriff's sale.

Moreover, the money is held in court that as little hardship may result as possible after adjudication of the validity of his title. He ought to have taken notice of the pending rule founded on affidavit, alleging conspiracy to defraud the Armington heirs, between Wurfflein and the tenants in possession of the lot. The deed by Wurfflein to Jacob Knoell was recorded. We think he stands in no better position as to title than would Wurfflein or Christopher Knoell, had either of them purchased the lot at the sale by the sheriff. The purchaser of a judgment is ordinarily charged with the inspection of the record of that judgment, and is, in general, affected with notice of any right which it plainly discloses.' Griffiths v. Sears, 3 Cent. Rep. 239, 112 Pa. 523.

As regards purchases of land sold on execution to satisfy a judgment a like rule applies.

The deed by Wurfflein to Knoell falsely recited that Wurfflein had title in fee to the lot, and that the ground rent had merged and become extinguished. His title to that rent is correctly stated, and the rent well described. The intent to convey the lot in fee, subject to no charge, is obvious; and the grant contains words to effectuate that intent. That the ground rent, whether merged or not, was intended to be included in the grant cannot be doubted. Although the parties may have been mistaken as to the merger, Wurfflein conveyed the lot, with all rents, issues and profits, and all his estate, right and interest, to Knoell, his heirs and assigns. Because Wurfflein did not own the fee, is the deed void as to the estate he did own? Wurfflein retained no legal title to anything so described as to be within the grant; the legal title, as well as the equitable, was vested in Knoell for the ground rent and life estate.

The question is not whether the judgment is too large, or whether the Knoells were entitled to recover the rent since the death of Catharine Armington. The plaintiff in error contends that Wurfflein was a naked trustee, and that the Knoells were the equitable owners of the rent. In that view the equitable owners had the alias summons served on one of themselves as tenants in possession, procured judgment in default, and this at the time when they were defendants in the pending ejectment at suit of the owners of the fee to recover possession.

But nothing on the record shows that Wurfflein sued as trustee, or for the use of anybody but himself. He had no title or interest; and those who held the title were in possession of the land. The owners of the rent, with notice of the action, permitted Wurfflein to recover judgment for the arrears. All parties to that action know that, as between themselves, the judgment is an adjudication that Wurfflein is entitled to the money. Yet none of them pretends that even now the judgment belongs to him.

A judgment cannot be attacked collaterally, save for collusion. Where parties have contrived by judgment to defeat the rights of a third person, such judgment is not a bar against the claim of the party sought to be defrauded. In this case the scheme is transparent, without aid of the oral testimony; and the specification of error cannot be sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued Feb. 28, Decided March 28, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1885, No. 168, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey and Sterrett, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action on the case for damages alleged to have been caused by the negligence and want of skill and care of defendant, a surgeon. Reversed.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the supreme court.

The court below, HAGENMAN, J., charged the jury as follows:

This action is brought by Peter Herring against Dr. Mayberry S. Reber to recover damages for unskillful and careless treatment. The evidence discloses that on the 27th of May, 1882, the plaintiff was at Shoemakersville, and there, or near by, met with an accident in which his leg was badly broken between the knee and the ankle. He was taken to the house of his son, and was there treated by the defendant, Dr. Reber. The bones were properly set; and there is no allegation of want of skill or care in the setting and treating of the fractured bones.

After some considerable time, the heel seems to have become very sore. About six weeks after the accident the plaintiff was brought to Reading, where he was treated by Dr. Sterly, and after remaining here for about eleven weeks, he went to Lehigh County, where he at present lives. He still suffers, and, from the evidence, probably will suffer from the injury which his heel sustained, either from the treatment, or from the accident which happened to him at Shoemakersville.

There is no dispute in the testimony that the heel became exceedingly sore, and that there was considerable sloughing away of the heel. The question in dispute is whether the treatment which the doctor gave the patient was proper. Was it that skill which a physician should bring to the care of his patient, or was it not? If it was not, if the injury of which the plaintiff complains was caused by a want of skill, a want of care on the part of the physician, then the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff for such damages as the jury would find him, under the circumstances, entitled to. On the other hand, if proper care and proper skill was bestowed, such as a physician should bring to the treatment of such a case, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover.

There is no dispute between counsel as to what the law is in a case of this kind. There is an implied contract of a surgeon or a physician who attends a patient, that he will use all known and reasonable means to accomplish the object for which he is called in to treat the patient; and that he will attend his patient carefully and diligently. His relation to his patient implies that he possesses, and will employ in the treatment of the case, such reasonable skill and diligence as are ordinarily exercised in his profession by a thoroughly educated surgeon or physician. This is the rule of law. And the question arises: Did this defendant, when he was called in, use that skill and diligence which he was required to use? If he did, he is not responsible; if he did not, he is responsible.

The evidence of the plaintiff, who is an old gentleman, is that Dr. Reber was called in to attend him; that he fixed up his leg and put it in a box; that the doctor came nearly every day; he worked around it; was lying on my back and in a few days it began to burn; told the doctor, who then placed something under it, but think it was too late; was sore; he got salve and some wash; he never looked at it particularly; put salve on; it got very sore, had great pain; at times was not conscious; "I told him I had pain; he looked in, and rubbed salve on it; told him how painful it was, a week or longer before it opened; my daughter waited on me." The daughter he referred to more especially is Mrs. Eck. She came up to see her father after this accident occurred, and was there on Decoration Day, which was the following Tuesday after the accident happened.

Mrs. Eck says she lived in Reading, and on Decoration Day, the 30th of May (the accident happened on the 27th), they put his leg in a box, on cotton, and the foot of the leg; they cut off the foot of a stocking and then sewed it up; "I told the doctor that father wanted the box opened, he had so much pain;" this was subsequent to the time. But after the leg was dressed and put in the box, several of the witnesses have testified that there were supports from the ceiling down, holding the box up; and that there was an extension applied. In other words, to this stocking which was around the foot there were strips or bandages of some kind sewed fast, or were around the foot, and there was a suspension of some kind from the ceiling, to the end of which a box of sand was put.

Some of the witnesses speak of a tin can, containing about a quart, and that it was full of sand. Mrs. Eck then speaks of having gone up several times to see her father, and that while she was there, after this stocking was fitted to the foot, it was sewed up on both sides; and that this was never removed, as far as she knows, until some four weeks after the accident occurred. She says: "I told the doctor that father wanted the box opened, he had so much pain; Doctor said it was rheumatism at the time; the time he opened the box was four weeks after the accident; Father said: it was like crawling;" she used the German word which no one here seemed to be able to translate exactly, but the word crawling in English comes as nearly in meaning to the German word as I can now think of [and when we opened the box, the maggots began to roll out of the heel; it was all slimy at the heel; I said, "Is this the way my father is to be eaten up with worms?"] The doctor said he knew there was worms at it; two weeks after, he was brought to my house, Reading; he was there eleven weeks.

This testimony is offered on the part of the plaintiff to show that there was want of care,—want of that ordinary skill and care which the doctor should have brought to his patient. These witnesses, and one or two others, speak of the heel having rested on the bottom of the box, or upon some hard substance. [You have the testimony of the doctors who were examined on the part of the plaintiff that if this heel had rested upon a hard substance, such as these witnesses spoke of, that inflammation would set in, and sloughing would follow; and that this inflammation and sloughing followed in consequence of the want of proper care and skill upon the part of the doctor.]

[In the questions that were put to the physicians examined, both on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant, in the statement of the facts which were embraced within the questions, the doctors were asked whether that was evidence of want of care, or whether it was not evidence of negligence. The doctors said it was.]

It is for the jury to say whether the evidence submitted on the part of the plaintiff establishes the fact that there was want of care, a want of skill upon the part of the defendant in his treatment of this patient.

The defendant takes the stand himself, and you have heard what he says in regard to it; that he dressed the leg properly; that he removed the bandages every day, and washed the parts; that is, washed the leg, and washed it down over the heel. He does not remember whether there was a stocking or whether there were bandages around the foot. He says, however, whatever was there was removed by him, and that he washed the leg and the heel.

You have the testimony of Charles Herring, the son of the plaintiff, and at whose house the plaintiff was, and he gives us the same statement while he was there. He says that the heel as well as the leg rested upon a cushion of some soft substance.

Then Mrs. Herring is called, and she says much the same thing. She was there and helped to attend and nurse the old gentleman, and attended with the doctor to the dressing of the limb. She says that the box was opened every day and the bandages taken off; that the leg was washed and the heel was washed. Her attendance took in the first three weeks. During the fourth week it seems the daughters of the plaintiff were called together, they were probably nearly all there during that week, the old gentleman's condition being regarded as serious, and that he was likely to die. During that week, on the Saturday of which Mrs. Eck says she insisted on having the box opened, and that if the doctor would not open it himself she would, Mrs. Herring was herself indisposed. But on the day it was opened, although she was about, she says she only saw after it was opened that there were some maggots on the pillow.

Then Sallie Herring was examined. She is the daughter of Charles Herring, and was not at home much of the time, and did not see much; but what she saw is of the same character as was testified to by her father and mother.

After that testimony was in, there were certain inquiries made of the doctors, and certain statements of facts were embraced within the questions; and the doctors, one and all, said if such was the treatment it was done with skill and with care. It will be for the jury, therefore, to say whether the facts which were embraced in the questions submitted by the plaintiff or whether those embraced in the questions put to the doctors by the defendant are the true facts of the case. It is for the jury to say what the facts of the case are. It is for you to say whether from all this evidence there is want of proper care and skill upon the part of the physician. If there was, he would be liable.

We have been asked to say to the jury that even if there was not that proper care and skill upon the part of the doctor, if the plaintiff contributed to the injury which he complains of, he cannot recover. That is the law. Although one person may sustain an injury by the negligence of another, yet if he contributes to the injury which he receives, he is not entitled to damages.

When a physician or surgeon takes the charge of a patient, he assumes an implied obligation to treat the case with reasonable diligence, carefulness and skill. It is, however, the duty of the patient to submit to the treatment prescribed, and to follow the directions given, provided that they be such as a physician of ordinary skill would adopt or sanction; so that, when Dr. Reber attended to the patient, if his treatment was skillful, it was the duty of the patient to submit to his treatment; and although the doctor may have been negligent himself, if the plaintiff contributes to the injury which he complains of, he would not be entitled to recover.

The jury will, therefore, first of all inquire whether there was or was not that proper, ordinary diligence, care and skill exercised by Dr. Reber which he, as a physician, was required to bring to the care of his patient. If there was, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. But if the jury find, with the instructions I have given in regard to contributory negligence, that without any fault of the plaintiff himself he suffered this injury from a want of that care, that skill which the physician should have given to his patient, then he would be entitled to recover damages.

And then you will come to the question as to what are the damages he is entitled to recover. In estimating damages, the jury should allow not only for the direct expenses incurred by the plaintiff by reason of the injury, but also for the privation and inconvenience he is subjected to, and for the pain and suffering, bodily and mental, already experienced and likely to be experienced, as well as for the pecuniary loss he has sustained and is likely to sustain during the remainder of his life from the disabled condition of his heel. And in addition to what I have stated, the plaintiff would be entitled to such damages as would result from the loss of his earning power occasioned by the accident. In estimating the damages, the jury will take into account the age of the plaintiff. He is eighty odd years old. You will take everything into consideration which I have laid down to you, and which are embraced within the rules of law laid down to us, and you will return such a verdict as, in your judgment, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

But, always, as I said before, if you find that he is entitled to recover; if you find that there was that proper skill and care exercised by Dr. Reber, and that this injury, although it came upon the plaintiff, did not result from the want of care and skill upon the part of the defendant, your verdict will be otherwise.

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $900 damages.

The first assignment of error appears from the opinion of the supreme court. The fifth, second and third assignments of error specify respectively those portions of the charge inclosed in brackets. The fourth assignment of error specified the action of the court in allowing the hypothetical case, assumed in the following question, to be submitted to the physicians called as experts in the case:

"By Mr. Reber: Q. If maggots form in the heel under such circumstances, does it not show that it is unskillful and improper treatment to permit them to remain and increase in number until a part of the heel, as large as a man's thumb, is destroyed by them?"

The sixth assignment of error specified the action of the court, after having been requested to say to the jury in the general charge, that if contributory negligence was shown, the plaintiff could not recover, in not referring to the evidence of contributory negligence, to wit: the application of wet cloths to the heel, in disobedience of the doctor's express orders, and the removal of the patient from the doctor's care against his protest, while the ulcer was apparently healing.

The seventh assignment of error specified the action of the court in presenting to the jury, in the charge, only so much of the testimony as assumed that the ulcer was caused by pressure on the heel during treatment, and in omitting all reference to the testimony of the physicians that such ulcers frequently occur in aged people without apparent cause or from the slightest scratch or abrasion of the skin.

Messrs. Adam H. Schmehl and Richmond L. Jones, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Jeremiah K. Grant and Henry C. G. Reber, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of case against a physician for negligence in the treatment of a fractured leg. The plaintiff, who was about eighty years of age, sustained a compound comminuted fracture of both bones of his leg between the ankle and knee. No complaint is made of the treatment of the fracture, as the plaintiff was entirely cured in that respect and in the usual time. The broken bones were reunited, the leg was straight and of the same length as the other one. It was admitted that the defendant treated the fracture with care, skill and entire success. This element of the treatment is therefore entirely out of the case.

The claim for damages is based only upon an allegation of negligence in the treatment of an ulcer which developed upon the plaintiff's heel and resulted in a sloughing of the flesh, which was not cured by the defendant and occasioned pain and suffering to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was taken away from the treatment of the defendant by his daughter, Mrs. Eck, about six weeks after the accident and was subsequently treated for about eleven weeks for the ulcer in the heel, apparently with indifferent success. Whether he would have recovered from the ulcer, if he had remained under the defendant's treatment, cannot be known because the ulcers only broke out in the third week and the plaintiff was taken from the defendant's care at the end of the sixth week. This, of course, produces an element of uncertainty in the plaintiff's case, since it becomes complicated with the question as to whose treatment, if any, was at fault for the nonrecovery of the ulcer in the heel.

It was entirely undisputed that several ulcers broke out on the leg and heel of the plaintiff, but those on the leg appear to have recovered under the treatment of Dr. Reber, the defendant, and the only one as to which complaint is made is the one on the heel. It was testified by all the physicians, including those called by the plaintiff, that ulcers are of common occurrence in persons of extreme old age, often without any apparent cause. Thus Dr. Loose, one of the plaintiff's medical witnesses testified:

"Ulcers are common occurrences in people of extreme old age, without apparent cause. The ulcers we find usually in aged people are caused by stagnation of the blood. In aged people the valves of the superficial veins are apt to give out, and the blood instead of going vigorously, stagnates and produces varicose veins, and these produce ulcerations. In a vitiated condition of the blood a scratch may make a very bad ulcer."

Dr Cleaver, another of plaintiff's experts, testified: "In extreme old age ulcers not unfrequently develop without any apparent cause. The cause may be in the blood itself, so that an ulcer may be developed without a bruise. If it is attributable to any particular cause, when you remove the cause the ulcer will heal."

Dr. Sterly, who treated the plaintiff next after the defendant, being called by the plaintiff, said: "Sometimes the least irritation or pressure upon certain parts, especially the lower limbs, will produce ulceration in aged people, and sometimes ulcers will form or develop themselves, you might say spontaneously, without any apparent cause, arising from mere poverty or depravity of the blood, not depravity so much as a want of vital power. And ulcers formed from such constitutional cause are likely to continue and to resist efforts to heal, and are described as indolent ulcers; you will find them frequently in aged people."

The defendant and all his medical witnesses testified to the cause and effect; and it was an entirely undisputed fact that in aged persons, ulcers are developed by very slight causes and, frequently, by no apparent cause, in which case they are attributable to low vitality and poverty of the blood.

In addition to this the defendant and his medical witnesses all testified that wet applications upon the parts affected would so soften and shrivel the skin as to produce ulcers; and it was also proved, both by the defendant and the persons attending the plaintiff, that wet applications were made to the plaintiff's heel repeatedly by the direct command of the plaintiff, and against the remonstrance of the defendant. The defendant alleged that in this respect the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

In this condition of the testimony it is evident that the case should have been presented to the jury upon the question as to the cause of the ulcer in the heel, and the character and effect of its treatment by the defendant. The jury should have been told by the court that under the testimony there were several different possible causes for the ulcer, to wit: 1, extreme old age and poverty of the blood; 2, irritation or pressure upon the heel; 3, wet applications upon the heel; 4, a low state of vitality in the patient.

For the first, third and fourth of these causes the defendant would not be responsible. For the second he would be responsible, if he negligently and improperly applied an undue pressure to the heel. This should have been carefully explained to the jury, and their attention should have been called to the evidence on both sides relating to this subject. Having read the whole of the testimony with the closest care I am constrained to say that the great preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that no such pressure was applied. Then the jury should have been distinctly charged that if the plaintiff was himself guilty of contributory negligence in producing the ulcer, he could not recover.

It was not enough merely to state this as a general proposition. The meaning of contributory negligence should have been explained to the jury as it related to this particular case; and they should have been told that the defendant alleged, and gave evidence to prove that the plaintiff had himself given directions to have wet applications made to his heel, and that if these produced, or tended to produce the ulcer, he was guilty of contributory negligence and could not recover.

As the testimony given by the defendant on this subject was not contradicted, but was strongly corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses, its force was greatly enhanced, and the attention of the jury should have been called to this aspect of the case. From whatever cause the ulcer was produced, the attention of the jury should have been directed to the treatment administered by the defendant. Was it proper and skillful, or improper and negligent, and if so, in what respect? The doctors do not seem to have differed as to what would be the correct treatment; and the question would be whether that kind of treatment was administered. For if it was, the defendant would not be responsible if the plaintiff did not recover. Doctors are not required to insure the recovery of their patients, but only to treat them with adequate care and skill.

These views indicate what, as it seems to us, was the proper manner of presenting this case to the jury.

An examination of the charge compels us to say that it was not so presented in any respect. On the subject of contributory negligence no explanation of its meaning was given, and not the slightest allusion was made to the large amount and uncontradicted character of the evidence tending to show such negligence. This was misleading and therefore error.

Nor was the precise question at issue at all explained to the jury. That question was: How was the ulcer on the heel produced? Was it by natural causes, such as the great age of the plaintiff, the stagnant or impoverished condition of his blood, or a low state of vitality pervading his system? Or was it the result of any possible bruise received at the time of the accident and not externally manifest? Or was it produced by an undue pressure upon the heel applied by the negligent conduct of the defendant? In this latter case only would the defendant be responsible for the fact of the ulcer, and the jury should have been so instructed, but were not. Then the character of the treatment administered should have been presented. Was it such as was usually given by physicians of competent skill and care? Or was it unskillful, inadequate and negligent? Attention should have been called to the evidence, not upon one side only, but upon both sides of this question. We think the charge is justly subject to unfavorable criticism upon all these points, so much so that we cannot regard it as an adequate presentation of the case to the jury, and must therefore treat it as erroneous.

On the trial, exception was taken to the allowance of a hypothetical question put to the physician by plaintiff's counsel, on the ground that it assumed a state of facts not proved in the testimony. The part of the question objected to is thus expressed: "And the entire leg in this condition resting mainly upon its heel for several weeks, without being changed or receiving any care or any other attention at the heel, what under such circumstances and conditions would likely be the effect upon the heel?"

A careful examination of the testimony compels us to say there is no evidence which supports this hypothesis. It includes the idea that for several weeks the heel received no care and attention, and to that no witness testifies. The plaintiff says that in a few days after the accident, the heel pained him, and he complained of it to the defendant who placed something under it and got some salve or wash which he applied.

Mrs. Eck did not see her father until the fourth day after the accident, and during the first four weeks, the period covered by the question, she was only at the house part of the time; and both her testimony and that of the other persons relied upon by plaintiff on this subject was merely negative, and goes for nothing against the positive testimony of the defendant and of the plaintiff's son, Charles Herring and his wife and daughter, who were present all the time and personally attended the plaintiff and testified to the constant treatment of the heel as well as the leg by the defendant. The question also assumes that the leg was "resting mainly upon its heel for several weeks, without being changed." This also is an unproved fact. The plaintiff did say that he laid on his back with the heel resting on the board pretty hard, and in a few days it began to burn, and hurt. But he also says he informed the doctor of it, and the doctor put something under it, and got some salve and rubbed the heel with it a number of times. He does not say the leg continued to rest on the heel for several weeks, and his own witnesses prove the contrary.

Mrs. Eck says: "The leg was resting in the box, but the whole heel you could see below the box, and the bottom of the foot." Dr. Sterly said that when he saw the plaintiff on May 31, "the fracture box did not reach the heel, and the heel was resting upon a pillow. The defendant and his witnesses all said the heel was resting on a pillow or on cotton. Mrs. Charles Herring, plaintiff's daughter-in-law, said the doctor put a cushion in the box, fixed it and put the leg in, but not so that the heel rested:" that the doctor "came every day, opened the leg every day, and looked after it and washed it, put a new bandage around it and put it in the box again. * * * He washed the leg from the fracture down to the heel and washed the heel also." She also said the heel did not rest on a board.

There was much other testimony to the same effect, which it is not necessary to repeat. But it is very clear that the assumption upon this subject, contained in the hypothetical questions we are considering are not proved by any testimony either in words or in substance, and this assignment of error is therefore sustained.

The language of the charge covered by the second assignment is still more objectionable. None of the doctors said that the inflammation and sloughing followed in consequence of the want of proper care and skill upon the part of the doctor. Yet the court distinctly charged the jury that they did so testify. In such circumstances such charging is the gravest error.

The language covered by the third assignment is ambiguous because it implies that the testimony of the defendant's physician, in answer to the defendant's hypothetical questions, proved that upon the facts there stated there was evidence of negligence and want of care. Of course this was not so, and the learned judge probably did not so intend; but the words he used are liable to that construction and are therefore misleading.

The hypothetical question complained of in the fourth assignment was a very exaggerated presentment of the testimony of one witness, Mrs. Eck, contradicted by every other witness in the case as to the number of maggots that were seen; yet as she did use language of such a character, we could hardly reverse on the ground that there was no supporting testimony at all. It was certainly not an impartial presentment of the testimony in relation to the maggots, to repeat to the jury the highly sensational exclamation of Mrs. Eck, in regard to her father being eaten up with worms, without also stating that the other witnesses testified to a far less number than she did; and in this respect the charge was misleading and the fifth assignment is sustained. The sixth and seventh assignments are both sustained for the reasons heretofore stated.

It was most clearly proved and not at all contradicted that the plaintiff insisted upon having wet applications made to his heel, and that it was done solely at his instance and against the positive instructions of the defendant. Yet no allusion was made to this testimony in the charge, nor was it in any manner explained to the jury that such conduct on the part af the plaintiff would, if believed by the jury, constitute or tend to prove contributory negligence. A mere statement of the general doctrine as to the effect of contributory negligence without any application of it to the facts of this case was of no moment at all, and might as well have been omitted entirely.

We are also of opinion that undue prominence was given to the subject of the maggots.

All the physicians concurred in saying that they were of very common occurence, that they were the result and not the cause of the ulcer, and that they are easily removed. The defendant and Mrs. Charles Herring said there were very few of them, and that they were removed at once. They also testified that when the plaintiff was taken away from Charles Herring's house the ulcer on the heel was already healing, and that the defendant protested against such removal, and declared that he would not be answerable for the consequences.

The attention of the jury should have been specifically called to this testimony, and to its effect upon the plaintiff's case, if believed. If it was true, it is diffcult to see how the plaintiff had any case. At his great age with so severe and complicated a fracture entirely cured, as is expressly admitted, with several ulcers, which the age, or the low vitality or the impoverished blood of the plaintiff might easily and naturally produce, all healed, and with only one remaining ulcer, and that fairly recovering, if the defendant's testimony is credited, there would seem to be no cause of action against the defendant. We are unable to discover any evidence in the record that the treatment actually administered by the defendant, either to the fracture or the ulcers, was negligent or unskillful, while on the contrary there is abundant and uncontradicted testimony that so far as the ulcer on the heel is concerned, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Judgment reversed.

v.
Peter WHITE.

1. A witness may use a paper containing a list of items to refresh his memory, when he knows the entries to have been correct when he made them, even though not admissible as entries made in the course of business in a book of original entries.
2. Where an alleged settlement is attacked, it is admissible to prove the several items which preceded it and were claimed to have been considered and included in the settlement.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 268, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Sullivan County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

This action was brought by Peter White against Salathiel Mead to recover for a balance on a book account, and for labor done for defendant. Defendant pleaded the general issue and set-off. Plaintiff obtained a rule on defendant for a statement of the matters of set-off. .This was filed and consisted of items of book account, running back a number of years. On notice from defendant, plaintiff gave him a bill of particulars which also stated that plaintiff would claim a settlement February 22, 1882, when a balance of $14.41 was found due the plaintiff; and would also claim $101, for work done on the "Dutchman's Run Road," and, if the defendant denied the settlement of February 22, 1882, the plaintiff would claim for various items of book account, naming them, which entered into that settlement.

In the trial in the court below before Sittser, P. J., the following facts appeared:

In the years 1880 and 1881 Mead, as supervisor of the Township of Laport, employed White to work upon the roads in said township. White received his pay for all work done upon said roads except $101, for work done upon the "Dutchman's Run Road." Upon this claim there was a controversy as to whether the same was due at the time the suit was brought.

It appeared that the claim of Mead against the township for such work, including the amount to be paid White for his labor was duly audited; but the report of the auditors was appealed from, and a trial had in court and an appeal taken to the supreme court where the matter was still pending. There was also between the parties a contract by White for the purchase of the land from Mead, on which land White was then residing; and it further appeared that in March, 1883, just previous to the commencement of this suit, the balance due on such contract was paid to the attorney in whose hands it had been left, by Mead, for collection.

At the trial the plaintiff first called the defendant for cross examination under the statute, who testified that he and the plaintiff had a settlement in September, 1880, of all their accounts except as to rent for the use of his house and the account between them in regard to exchanging work. Defendant denied having any settlement, February 22, of any account between himself and the plaintiff, except for work done upon the road.

Plaintiff was called as a witness for himself and testified to the circumstances relating to the alleged settlement of February 22, and that he wrote in his account book, which he had with him, according to the direction of the defendant who read to him, and that he wrote down just what had been told him; that the defendant told him the figures, and he put them down as told. Counsel for plaintiff offered the book in evidence.

This was objected to by defendant, because "It is not a book of original entry. It is not signed by anyone and is no evidence of anything whatever. It does not strengthen the case in any way. It is entirely irrelevant and immaterial. It is merely a memorandum the witness says he made at that time."

The counsel for plaintiff offered it in connection with the testimony of the witness.

The Court: As a paper in support of anything else of course it would not be evidence; but the witness swears that it was written at the dictation of the defendant in the case; in connecnection with his testimony it must go to the jury. Exception noted for defendant.

Counsel for plaintiff also asked witness the following questions;

Q. You can please go on and state what items of indebtedness you have against Salathiel Mead, prior to your settlement on the 22d day of February, 1882?

Counsel for defendant object to the question as irrelevant and immaterial.

The Court: We will allow you to show the account. The fact that the witness has testified there was a settlement, if it was an admitted fact in the case, you would be bound by it; but as long as the defendant disputes it we will allow you to introduce your account.

Now, go on, Mr. White, refresh your memory with your papers and books, and testify to what items of work you furnished to him, beginning at the first charge you have and work your way up.

(Counsel for defendant objected to the witness' reading from anything unless it was made at the time and by himself.)

Q. That account you have there upon your paper; where did you obtain that account?

A. Well it is a——I drawed it off from the other——

Q. Drew it off for your convenience to look at?

A. Yes, sir; one thing I would like to explain; this account is most of it, was in a pocket memorandum; I carried it around and it had been all settled, and they had been laid away. I had carried some of them until they had about worn out; the binding was worn off, and was settled up, and I supposed never would be called on; and I gave them up, and didn't give them any attention until I was called on, and had to hunt them up and get them the best I could.

Q. Will you swear that each one of these items that you are about to testify to are truthful items of indebtedness from Mr. Mead to you?

A. Yes, sir.

The Court: We will allow you to use the paper. Exception noted for defendant.

The defendant offered to prove by himself and four other witnesses that what took place between the parties at the time testified to by the plaintiff in his direct examination, when he said he demanded a settlement of defendant, and that defendant became enraged and threatened him with violence, etc., was not true and that no such scene occurred as he detailed. Objected to.

The Court: This will not increase the amount due the plaintiff from defendant. It is irrelevant. Offer overruled. Exception noted.

The court charged the jury inter alia as follows:

"It seems to be conceded by both parties in the case that this $101 was to be applied upon the contract for land. But Salathiel Mead has collected the contract for the land and put it out of his power to indorse it upon it, so that he must pay to Peter White the $101 in money, whenever it is due, and it is for you to say under the evidence, and under all the testimony in the case when that is due."

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for $142.87 and judgment was entered thereon.

The assignments of error specified the admission and rejection of the evidence as above noted, and the portion of the charge to the jury quoted.

Messrs. Thomas J. Ingham and E. M. Dunham, for plaintiff in error:

In order to make a writing evidence against a party, it must either be signed by him or by some one authorized by him, or must be in his writing, or else must be an entry made in the course of business in a book of original entry, that being the only exception to the general rule that it must be in the handwriting of the party against whom it is offered, or signed by him.

It was error to permit plaintiff to read, from loose sheets of paper, an account admitted by him to have been copied from memorandum books, since suit brought, where some of those books were yet in existence.

First Nat. Bank of DuBois v. First Nat. Bank of Williamsport, 5 Cent. Rep. 194; Dodge v. Bache, 57 Pa. 425.

Mr. Ellery P. Ingham, for defendant in error:

Permitting the plaintiff to testify to items of charge, using in aid of his memory a written memorandum, not original, was not error.

King v. Faber, 51 Pa. 393; Ins. Co. v. Hanlon, 31 Legal Int. 372; Babb v. Clemson, 12 Serg. & R. 329; Heart v. Hummel, 3 Pa. 415; McCormick v. Pennsylvania Cent. R. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 315: Robertson v. Lynch, 18 Johns. 451; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 977 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 810); Ins. Cos. v. Weide, 14 Wall. 375 (see note Bk. 20, L. ed. 894).

Per Curiam:

It may be conceded that the written memoranda were not admissible as entries made in the course of business in a book of original entries, yet it is well settled that a witness may use a paper containing a list of items to refresh his memory, when he knows the entry to have been correct when he made it. The alleged settlement having been attacked, it was clearly admissible to prove the several items which preceded it, and were claimed to have been considered and included in the settlement.

We see no error in the rulings relating to the admission of evidence, nor in the charge of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

John McCANN'S APPEAL.
Edwin S. GLANZ'S ESTATE.

1. Claims against the estate of a decedent may be proved by oral evidence of declarations or admissions, if they are so clear, positive and specific as to establish the validity of the claims.
2. In the absence of testimony showing that the sum allowed an auditor in a case was unreasonable this court will not assume it to be excessive.

(Argued March 7, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 424, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Northampton County, dismissing exceptions to the report of an auditor distributing the estate of decedent. Affirmed.

Edwin S. Glanz, a liquor dealer, died intestate, June 3, 1884, leaving to survive him a widow, Mary A. Glanz, one minor child, his mother Elizabeth Glanz and a sister, Mrs. Sarah Gernet.

Letters of administration were granted to his widow, whose account, showing receipts of $8,528.16, was duly filed and confirmed.

D. W. Nevin, Esq., was appointed auditor, to examine the account and make distribution of the balance in the hands of the administratrix. Such balance was not sufficient to pay all the claims presented against the estate, nor the amount of those found due and owing by the auditor; and he distributed the balance pro rata among the creditors, whose claims were allowed.

To the auditor's report John McCann, a creditor of the deceased, filed exceptions, inter alia, to the allowance of the claims of Mrs. Elizabeth Glanz and Robert Gerver; to the action of the auditor in refusing to surcharge the administratrix and in allowing the balance of the widow's exemption to Mary A. Glanz out of the balance for distribution, and also to the auditor's fee of $275, as exorbitant and excessive and not within the limits of the Act of Assembly regulating the compensation of auditors appointed by the orphans' court.

The facts in relation to these claims are as follows:

The claim of Elizabeth Glanz was made up of a note given by Edwin S. Glanz for $500, $90 for money loaned and a $1,000 4 per cent bond, of the value of $1,217.50. No objection was made to the claim on the note for $500. The auditor rejected the claim for $90, money loaned, not considering it sufficiently proven. In allowing the claim for the bond the auditor based his decision upon the following evidence:

Mrs Sarah Gernet testified as follows:

"I live with my mother on Ferry Street. Ed. came to my mother's house, and asked where mother was, and I said she was up stairs. He went upstairs, and I had occasion to go upstairs, and saw the bond on the bed. He came down shortly after, and I saw him have the bond in his hand. I saw him have the $1,000 bond. I just came up as she had gotten it out of the box and laid it on the bed. It was a $1,000 bond. He had it in his hand when he came downstairs, and came out in the kitchen where I was, and he said, 'this is a heavy load off my mind.' I said, 'Did mother give you the bond?' and he said, 'Yes.' I asked him if that would see him through, and he said it would, and he went out of the door."

The same witness on being recalled a few days later, testified as follows: "When he got the bond he said: 'Mother, I will pay you in small amounts every week;' and then he asked her if that would do, and she said yes; when he came he asked for the money as a loan."

On cross examination she testified: "This took place the same day that he got the bond; it was when I was upstairs, before she gave him the bond; it was when I saw the bond lying on the bed, I saw her give the bond to him, that is, I saw the bond in his hand when he came down stairs, and he said he would pay her so much every week; and he asked her if that would do, and he said he would pay it back as soon as possible."

Charles B. Hetrick, to prove the value of the bond, testified as follows: "On May 14, 1884, Edwin Glanz came to our office with a $1,000 4 per cent government coupon bond, and we bought it from him for 1.21¾ and gave him a check for $1,217.50."

A part of the claim of Robert Gerver consisted of a balance due on a book account, for liquor sold. Objection was made to the allowance of this claim, on the ground that Robert Gerver was a retail liquor dealer, and the charges being made of wholesale quantities it could not be recovered. The auditor refused to sustain this objection for the reason that if Gerver violated the law, he was subject to its penalties; but in no case did he forfeit his claim until a conviction should be had under the law.

Counsel for exceptant offered to prove before the auditor that subsequent to the confirmation of the account, evidence was discovered that the entire assets of the decedent's estate were not accounted for by the accountant, and asked to surcharge her with such property and moneys remaining in her hands unaccounted for. To this offer the administratrix objected.

The auditor sustained the objection for the reason that the account was confirmed absolutely; and the auditor having been appointed to distribute the balance in the account, could only inquire as to such matters as relate to distribution, and not to such matters as effect an account already confirmed, to which no exceptions were filed before the appointment of the auditor.

After hearing the exceptions to the report of the auditor, the following opinion of the court was delivered by SCHUYLER, P. J.:

To this report eleven exceptions were filed, but they were not all pressed at the argument. Those that were pressed may be disposed of with but brief comment without injustice to the exceptants. If the testimony of Mrs. Gernet is to be believed, there was no error in allowing the claim of Mrs. Elizabeth Glanz. It is true that Mrs. Gernet is the daughter of Mrs. Glanz. It is also true that she had to be called to the stand a second time, after an interval of several weeks, to supply defects in her first testimony. But these were circumstances that go exclusively to her credibility, which was for the auditor. Clearly, upon such grounds alone, we would have no right to say that this witness is unworthy of belief, when the auditor, with far better opportunities of judging, says to the contrary.

The claim of Robert Gerver is made up of a number of items which are objected to in a lump. The argument for exceptants, however, was chiefly directed against the allowance of the balance of $31.86 on book account for liquors sold. It seems that these liquors were sold in wholesale quantities, and that Mr. Gerver had no wholesale liquor license, he being at the time of the sale a hotel keeper. The allowance of this part of Mr. Gerver's claim is resisted, solely upon the ground that the liquor was sold in violation of a statute of the United States, R. S. § 3242, which provides that every person who carries on the business of wholesale liquor dealer without having paid a license shall be fined not less than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than six months.

It will be noticed that the penalty is annexed, not to the act of selling, but to the carrying on of the business of wholesale liquor selling. It is a sufficient answer to the position of the learned counsel for the appellants to say that there is no evidence that Mr. Gerver "carried on the business of wholesale liquor dealer." From all that appears these sales to Glanz were the only sales of this character ever made by Gerver; and if so, we think the Act of Congress has no application. See Rahter v. First Nat. Bank of Lancaster, 92 Pa. 393.

Whether or not the payments made to Gerver were sufficient to cancel the balance claimed by him is a question of fact. The fact has been found against the exceptant; and we have not been convinced that the auditor committed error in so doing.

The account having been confirmed absolutely, the auditor was appointed for the sole purpose of distribution. He therefore very properly refused to inquire into the question of surcharge. That was a matter over which he had no jurisdiction.

The last exception is to the auditor's compensation. This is an indirect way of "swearing at the judge,"—a not unusual practice when parties lose their cases. The excellent character of the learned auditor for integrity is of weight in the balance when weighing this question of the compensation charged by him. But, outside of this, we think this charge not unreasonable. In addition to the evidence furnished by the notes of audit and the report, it was stated at the argument, in the presence of the counsel for exceptants, and not denied, that in passing upon the numerous questions of fact it became necessary to make long and tedious examinations of books of account, which greatly added to the labors of the auditor.

And now, September 28, 1885, the exceptions are dismissed and the report confirmed.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in dismissing the exceptions to the report of the auditor and confirming the same.

Mr. William Gorman, for appellant:

"It is a rule of reason and therefore of law that where a witness varies in her statement of the same transaction in material particulars at different periods the testimony is to be greatly doubted."

Commonwealth v. Sallager, 3 Clark, Pa. 127.

From the testimony given by the daughter on the first day this claim of the mother would be considered under the law either a gift out and out or an advancement; for the law recognizes the natural affection which prompts the parent to make voluntary provision for children by anticipating in their favor the distribution of the patrimonial estate before death.

In the absence of qualifying and contrary evidence a delivery of personal property by a parent to a child will be regarded as a gift or advancement.

Sharswood, J., in Pollock v. Ray, 6 W N. C. 60, says: "Claims against the estates of decedents resting in merely oral testimony or declarations or admissions are very dangerous, and ought certainly not to be favored by the courts."

See also Graham v. Graham, 34 Pa. 480.

The claim of Robert Gerver raises the question whether the court will help a retail liquor dealer to recover for goods sold by wholesale, such retailer having no license as a wholesaler.

The proof before the auditor was that Robert Gerver was a retail liquor dealer and that he sold liquor to decedent in barrels and quantities not authorized by his license.

The Revised Statutes, page 624, section 3232, provides: "No person shall be engaged in or carry on any trade or business hereinafter mentioned until he has paid a special tax therefor in the manner hereinafter provided."

Section 3242 provides: "Every person who carries on the business of rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, retail liquor dealer or manufacturer of stills, without having paid the special tax as required by law, shall for every such offense be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years; and all distilled spirits or wines and all apparatus fit or intended to be used for the distillation or rectification of spirits or the compounding of liquors owned by such persons wherever found, and all distilled spirits or wines and personal property found in the rectifying establishment, or in any building, room, yard or inclosure connected therewith and used with or constituting a part of the premises, shall be forfeited to the United States."

Section 3244 defines those who are retail and who are wholesale dealers, under which latter class it is conceded Gerver must bring himself, in order to sell in the quantities for which he makes his charges against the decedent.

Under the proof he is not a wholesale dealer, only having a retail dealer's license.

Under this law Gerver is prohibited: first, from carrying on business as a wholesale dealer; and second, a penalty is prescribed in case he does carry it on.

"If a statute inflict a penalty for doing an act, the penalty implies a prohibition; and the thing is unlawful though there be no prohibitory words in the statute."

Every contract, says Chief Justice Holt, made for or about any matter or thing which is prohibited and made unlawful by any statute is a void contract, although the statute itself does not mention that it shall be so, but only inflicts a penalty on the offender, because a penalty implies a prohibition, although there are no prohibitory words in the statute.

See case Mitchell v. Smith, 1 Binney, 110, cited and approved 2 Serg. & R. 196; 4 Serg. & R. 159; 80 Pa. 28; *81 Pa. 127; 73 Pa. 201, and cases cited in 17 Am. Dec. 423.

The lower court was asked, having all the parties before it, to make such order in the premises as would do substantial justice to all the parties. It refused. We submit that this was error.

Rahter v. First Nat. Bank of Lancaster, 92 Pa. 393, held that the United States Statutes did not prohibit the sale of whisky, but only imposed a penalty for their violations, and that therefore the sale was not void and the price could be recovered.

A person not licensed as a broker may, nevertheless, recover the compensation agreed to be paid for negotiating a sale, although he may have rendered himself liable to the penalty of $500 for acting without a license.

Shepler v. Scott, 85 Pa. 329; Justice v. Roward, 10 Phila. 623.

The neglect or refusal of a wholesale dealer to pay the internal revenue tax imposed by the United States Revised Statutes does not invalidate sales made by him during the period of his default, or prevent his recovery of the price of the goods sold.

Larned v. Andrews, 106 Mass. 435.

Per Curiam:

It is true that claims against the estate of a decedent proved by oral evidence of declarations or admissions should be carefully scanned; yet they may be so clear, positive and specific as to establish the validity of the claims. In this case the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the auditor and the court; and we discover no error in their conclusions.

The evidence furnished does not show us the extent of the services rendered by the auditor. In the absence of testimony showing that the sum allowed was unreasonable, we will not assume it to be excessive.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 381, E. D., all the Judges present.

Appeal from a decree of the Common Pleas of Bradford County, in favor of complainants in a bill in equity to establish and enforce a resulting trust in lands. Affirmed.

This was a bill in equity filed May 6, 1881, by B. Rush Jackson and James Thomson, surviving executors of the last will and testament of Josiah Jackson, and Emily L. Patrick, formerly Jackson, and H. W. Patrick her husband, in right of the said Emily L. Patrick against Bernice W. Jackson, executrix and George C. Jackson, executor of the last will and testament of George D. Jackson, deceased, to establish a resulting trust in two thirds of 102 acres, seventy perches, of coal land in Sullivan County, and to compel a conveyance thereof to complainants.

The complaint and its amendments set forth:

1. That Josiah Jackson, George D. Jackson (in their lifetime) and B. Rush Jackson were the owners of an undivided one half of 523 acres and 110 perches, situate in Cherry Township, Sullivan County, Pennsylvania.

2. That the parties named were partners in business under the name of Jackson & Sons, until the death of Josiah Jackson, after which the others continued business as Jackson Bros. That the title to the land mentioned was held, in trust, by George D. Jackson, for himself and the others named.

3. As shown by a written declaration of trust dated July 4, 1861 [setting it out in full].

4. That George D. Jackson in 1866 acquired an undivided three seventeenths interest in the same 523 acres, etc., by conveyance from Francis Jordan, Samuel H. Bibighaus, Thos. J. Woolf et ux. by deed dated September 20; and by a conveyance dated two days later, said George D. Jackson took from M. C. Mercur and Charles F. Welles, Jr., an undivided five and one half seventeenths parts of 102 acres and seventy perches, which were in turn a part of the original 523 acres, etc., before mentioned. That October 24, 1866, George D. Jackson and wife conveyed to the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Company eleven and one half seventeenths of 421 acres, forty perches, of the same land, leaving for himself the legal title to the exact land in controversy, to wit: 102 acres, seventy perches.

5. That the foregoing acquisitions, and the grant of George D. Jackson were in pursuance of an understanding between George D. Jackson, Josiah Jackson, B. Rush Jackson and the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Company, by which the company was to obtain full title to the 421 acres, forty perches, of the said 523 acres, 110 perches, and George D. Jackson full title to the remainder, to wit: 102 acres and 70 perches, the same being for himself, Josiah Jackson, and B. Rush Jackson equally, and that the conveyances made by Jordan, by Woolf, by Bibighaus, by Mercur and by Welles, were but the steps in carrying out this arrangement, and were in the interest of the company and of the Jacksons, to the extents set forth, the whole being paid for, under stipulation with the Jacksons, by the coal and railroad company, in the stock of the corporation.

6. That Josiah Jackson died April 9, 1867, testate and leaving heirs, six in number.

7. That the 102 acres, etc., is a valuable coal tract, and has been entered upon and in possession of Josiah Jackson, George D. Jackson and B. Rush Jackson, an opening made, and coal mined and sold for their joint account and interest, and books kept relating to the same, first in the name of Jackson & Sons, and after the death of the father, by the sons as Jackson Bros.

8. That George D. Jackson died November 23, 1879, and by his will appointed the defendants executrix and executor thereof, with power to sell and convey real estate as fully as the testator himself could have done.

9. That B. Rush Jackson has conveyed his interest in the land to Emily L. Patrick.

10. That Josiah Jackson was in his lifetime entitled to one undivided third of the 102 acres, and the same was by his will vested in Geo. D. Jackson, B. Rush Jackson and James Thomson as trustees, one sixth part for each of the following named children as cestuis que trust: George D. Jackson, B. Rush Jackson, Frances Ann Gottlieber, Elizabeth C. Thomson, Mary Webb Lippincott and Emily L. Patrick. That the remainder of the tract was vested, one third in George D. Jackson and one third in B. Rush Jackson.

11. That by the death of George D. Jackson the legal title to the land became vested in his executrix and executor, subject to the existing trusts.

12. That by the death of George D. Jackson, one of the executors and trustees under the will of Josiah Jackson, B. Rush Jackson and James Thomson became the surviving trustees and as such are entitled to a conveyance from the representatives of George D. Jackson for one third (six eighteenths) of the land in controversy, and Emily L. Patrick, as grantee of B. Rush Jackson, is entitled to one undivided third.

13. That the defendants claim to hold the land in fee and to the exclusion of the trusts mentioned, denying the interests of the plaintiffs.

The defendants demurred to the bill, on the ground that the lands were situate in Sullivan County and not within the jurisdiction of the court; that it appears from the face of the bill that the remedy is full and adequate at law; and that the bill does not set forth the residences of the parties. The court overruled the demurrer and ordered defendants to answer.

The defendants' answer admitted the substance of paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and amended paragraph 4, also paragraphs 6, 8 and 9.

It denied paragraph 5, as to each and every allegation, except that the considerations for the conveyances of Jordan, Woolf, Bibighaus Mercur and Welles, to George D. Jackson were paid in the stock of the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Co.

It admitted paragraph 7, to the extent that the land is a valuable coal tract, from which coal has been taken by Jackson & Sons and Jackson Bros. But defendants aver that they have no knowledge of the arrangement, if any, under which the coal was mined, and further, that whatever possession was exercised by these firms was by permission of George D. Jackson and under him.

It admitted paragraph 10, as to the recital of the trustees and cestuis que trustent under the will of Josiah Jackson, but any conclusions drawn therefrom are denied.

The answer denies generally the plaintiffs' ground of complaint and presents the corpus of the defense by averment—as follows: "We deny that the legal title to the said 102 acres and 70 perches of land became vested in us subject to the terms of any declaration of trust whatever, and we aver on information and belief that on or about the 22d day of September, 1866, all interest of Josiah Jackson and B. Rush Jackson in the said lands under the terms of the said declaration of trust of July 4, 1861, ceased and determined, and that the said declaration of trust was delivered up to the said George D. Jackson, under an arrangement with B. Rush Jackson and Josiah Jackson, pursuant to which George D. Jackson conveyed for their joint benefit on the 24th day of October, 1866, to the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Co., by deed printed as exhibit C, an interest in 421 acres and 40 perches of the said 523 acres and 110 perches of land in the said declaration of trust of July 4, 1861, mentioned, more than equal in value to the undivided one half of the said 523 acres and 110 perches, and equal to 285 acres in quantity."

In answer to paragraph 12 the position of B. Rush Jackson and James Thomson as surviving executors of Josiah Jackson, is admitted,—the rest denied.

The answer to paragraph 13 is an averment of ownership in the land, when the plaintiffs' bill was filed, and a denial that the plaintiffs had any interest therein.

James H. Codding, Esq., was appointed master, who reported, inter alia, as follows:

Our starting point is found in the conveyance produced in evidence, executed November 8, 1859, by Michael Meylert and wife, to George D. Jackson, for an undivided one half interest in 523 acres and 110 perches of land, being parts of six warrants in Sullivan County. It is the west end of this land which is now in question. July 4, 1861, is the date of the next paper, to which so much importance is attached. It is a declaration by George D. Jackson, that "Whereas, the said George D. Jackson and Josiah Jackson and B. Rush Jackson * * * at their joint and equal expense have purchased" the interest in the land, to wit: the 523 acres, etc., "and at the special instance and request of them, the said Josiah Jackson and B. Rush Jackson, he, George D. Jackson, obtained a conveyance from Michael Meylert, in his own name solely, for the whole of the land so purchased"—now he the declarant "doth testify, declare and acknowledge, that he stands seised, and doth covenant that he and his heirs shall and will at all times hereafter stand seised of one full, equal, and undivided third part of the undivided half part of the land," to the use of Josiah Jackson, his heirs and assigns, and one like third to the use of B. Rush Jackson, his heirs and assigns; and that upon any sale or division of the property, he will grant, convey or assure to the purchaser or to his cestuis que trust, their proper share of the land or interest in the proceeds.

This declaration is here claimed as the corner stone of the plaintiffs' case. Was it ever repealed, canceled or annulled by the parties, either by their concurrence or any implication from their actions? This is important, for there is no written evidence showing any change of title to the half of the land in controversy here, since the delivery of the above deed, affecting it in 1859, and the execution of this declaration July 4, 1861.

We may here, from all the evidence, generally review the status of the parties allied in this purchase, as disclosed by the declaration. Josiah Jackson was a well known and respected citizen—a physician, long resident in Sullivan County. The others were his sons, associated with him in mercantile pursuits, at Dushore, under the style of Jackson & Sons.

[This firm was from time to time interested in acquiring land, and the method used in the transaction just mentioned was no novelty to them; for in two instances, at least, in the evidence in this case, a similar course was held—in one, the title being taken by the father, in the other by B. Rush Jackson, and both were followed by declarations showing the common interest of all.]

Other deeds in evidence prove the peculiar changes of title which occurred in the fall of 1866, and are set forth in the plaintiffs' bill. The key to these movements is found in the fact that a railroad and coal company was being organized for operation, near or upon these very lands, and that the Jacksons were associating with others in taking a leading part.

[One thing, however, for a time, complicated the arrangement, and it is clearly in the evidence. George, with a sagacity which was prophetic, declined to embark all their coal interests in the new corporation, for coal was known to be upon this land, and insisting upon his views, so arranged with other corporators, who at first objected, that he was able to reach the end sought.]

By Meylert's deed, he then had legal title to one half the 523 acres, 110 perches—by deed from Jordan, Woolf, Bibighaus, he acquired three undivided seventeenths parts of the same land. The balance of the title was in Mercur and Welles, and from them he obtained five and one half seventeenths of the 102 acres, 70 perches, which he sought to obtain; he then conveyed to the new corporation, eleven and one half seventeenths of 421 acres, 40 perches (all his title therein), and so stood as the holder of the legal title to the now divided and separated 102 acres, 70 perches, which it was his object to procure. Was this transaction for himself or for his firm? Did any other cotemporary transactions with the coal company have any influence upon this? Who, then, owned the land? The answer is the solution to this suit.

If Dr. Josiah Jackson thought the matter needed any explanation, it was not long, for he died April 9, 1867; and the substance of his will, as creating parties to this suit, is admitted by the pleadings. The firm name of Jackson & Sons, became Jackson Brothers, and business went on as before.

[The plaintiffs have produced in support of their claim, outside the deeds and declaration, three independent lines of evidence, which are intended, of course, to be mutually corroborative, pointing toward a common central fact: first, the admissions and assertions of George D. Jackson himself, as to the real ownership of the 102 acre tract, commonly known as near the "Millheim" opening; second, the books of Jackson & Sons, and Jackson Brothers, showing entries, largely in the handwriting of George D. Jackson, and all under his supervision, respecting the mining and sale of coal from this tract, and treating these transactions as at the expense and for the benefit of the firm; third, a sort of mathematical demonstration, which influences the case, by showing an equality of the parties named, in their connection with the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Company, its organizers, and in the stock issued for their lands; in other words, that George D. Jackson gave no more for his interest in the disputed land than did his partners, or that the partners received nothing for an asserted concession of interest, which George retained.]

[In the first instance, sixteen witnesses have testified to statements, in conversation and otherwise, with George D. Jackson, indicating, not an individual ownership in this land, but a common one in the members of the firm of Jackson & Sons. In each case this land has been identified as the subject of the association; and all, with one exception, were made subsequent to the several transfers of 1866. These statements came mostly in shape of information from the speaker to his hearers, and differed among themselves greatly, in manner and form,—from mere reference to the land as "ours," to an unqualified assertion that it belonged to Jackson & Sons.]

The names of the witnesses are:

Theo. Ackley, Jasper Clark, Levi Hunsinger, J. K. Farrell, J. M. Heacock, J. B. Cox, P. Armstrong, J. W. Martin, H. Williams, Charles Kissner, Christian Millheim, H. P. Moore, Horace Arnout, B. M. Sylvara, William Stevenson, J. S. Andrews.

[The admissions and statements recited by these parties are not altogether casual, but come in such circumstances that it was reasonable to expect the truth.

The testimony of the following persons, considered in this last connection, may be important: of J. K. Farrell, who was assessor in Cherry Township as late as 1869; of Dr. J. M. Heacock, who was county treasurer in 1872. The conversations related by them are almost official. Also of H. P. Moore and William Stevenson, who enjoyed unusual and friendly acquaintance with George D. Jackson in his lifetime. If their evidence amounts to anything, it is that he made unequivocal statements that the coal lands, the land in question, belonged to Jackson & Sons.]

No less definite, in respect to individual ownership, is the deposition of J. S. Andrews, but to him Jackson Bros. were named as the owners. It was after the Doctor's death. * * *.

Upon the subject opened by the second branch of the evidence, several witnesses are called to prove that the possession of the land was in Jackson & Sons up to the Doctor's death and subsequently in Jackson Bros.: Millheim, who worked eleven years at the coal opening bearing his name, Jasper Clark, who gave orders for the coal, Charles Kissner, who was a carpenter doing work at the mine. These testified of the father and two brothers as possessing and operating the land and mine, and directing the work done there.

Copious extracts are given from the books of Jackson & Sons and Jackson Bros., cash books, coal books, day books, chiefly in the handwriting of George D. Jackson, and showing that he charged himself with coal from the mine; that all matters connected with the coal business were conducted by the two firms successively, and that they paid its expenses, taxes, etc., and put the receipts from it in the common till.

The defendants do not deny this, but say that this possession and use were by permission of George D. Jackson and under him. Of this, hereafter.

[Upon the third branch of the plaintiffs' evidence, that which endeavored to show the even relations of the parties in the conveyances to the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Company, and its issue of stock in return, no infallible conclusion can be reached. The figures admit of several combinations, and none of them are just right.]

It would seem that death has precluded full explanation. It is clear, however, that the three Jacksons conveyed to the company a large amount of land (more than 2,000 acres), and of this perhaps all was subject to trusts, among themselves or for others.

[George conveyed 645 acres, 46 perches, in Cherry and Colley Townships, which he had by some arrangement for or with Michael Meylert. Also eleven and one half seventeenths of 421 acres, etc., in warrant names of Norris and others. With the latter tract we are familiar. It is land conveyed by Meylert, November 8, 1859, and for which, with the 102 acres, etc., now in controversy, the declaration of the trust of July 4, 1861, was executed. These eleven and one half seventeenths are the original one half (8½ 17ths) conveyed by Meylert, and three seventeenths (3 17ths) conveyed to him by Francis Woolf, Thomas J. Woolf, Samuel H. Bibighaus. And here we find that George D. Jackson paid no consideration to these parties for the three seventeenths. He was but their agent, the bridge over which their title passed to their company as to 421 acres, etc., to himself as to the 102 acres and 70 perches.]

B. Rush Jackson conveyed to the company 1,088 acres, which appear to have been affected by a trust.

From Mr. Mercur's evidence as to the value given to land in forming the railroad and coal company, to wit: $200 per acre—4,274 shares of stock should have been issued to the Jacksons in return. The evidence discloses but 3,439 shares issued to them directly, and these were diminished by transfers: to M. C. Mercur, 425 shares; to Francis Jordan, 123 shares; to S. H. Bibighaus, 61 shares, and to Michael Meylert, 891 shares, until finally there remains: to George D. Jackson, 646 shares; to B. Rush Jackson, 646 shares, and to the estate of Josiah Jackson, 647 shares, practically an equality in result, too nearly so to be accidental.

The defendants' offer, by T. J. Vanderslice, J. G. Wright and F. F. Lyon, to procure declarations made by George D. Jackson, to the effect that the land in question was his, and his only. This is claimed to be rebuttal, but must probably weigh as other declarations, made in the interest of the declarant, and not in the presence of those affected by the claim. Mr. Mercur gives an interesting account of what was said to him by the brothers, a short time before George's death. It is certain from this that cordiality, if not friendship, had ceased between them; that George at that time claimed the land, while Rush, consistently with his present position, asserted that it "belonged to George, Rush and father's estate." These statements were not made, however, by the brothers in each other's presence.

The foregoing may show this much: that George's declarations were not invariably to the effect of a firm or common ownership; but if he considered the land his own, and his title beyond doubt, it is not easy to understand the anxiety he expressed to Vanderslice, and his wish to see Judge Elwell or Mr. Buckalew on the subject.

[Six receipts from the county treasurer, for taxes, were produced in evidence, the intent being to show that George D. Jackson supported a burden of ownership, not likely to be usurped by a disinterested party, and himself paid the taxes upon this property, as his own. Granting these their weight, they are silently disputed. The first one, dated June 6, 1868, for $12.75, for taxes upon the George Fox and Joseph P. Norris warrants, is undoubtedly the same item as the entry in coal book, page 54, "expenses," Jackson Bros., for date, amount and purpose coincide. The second and third receipts are for same tracts, inter alia; and here again, entries are found, on the coal expense book of the firm, pages 93, 94, showing payments for taxes on the same dates, the amounts being about one fourth less, as taxes upon other warrants were paid for at the same time.]

The fifth receipt is indorsed on its back "Paid by G. D. J." in George D. Jackson's handwriting. Why this, if paid by him upon his own land? * * *

[It is admitted, we believe, that all presumptions adverse to the declaration of trust must arise from the transactions of 1866, and in the failure of these it is entitled to its original vitality, so far as it affects the land in question. Upon the evidence, and from the views herein expressed, the Master finds that there are no such adverse presumptions; in fact, that there is no evidence of its cancellation or rescission. It is therefore still in force as to one half the land.]

As to the other moiety, we recapitulate: George D. Jackson did not complete his legal title by any arrangement with the Sullivan & Erie Company. This tract never was included in the proposed or established boundaries of that corporation. Three seventeenths came from Jordan, Woolf, Bibighaus, who conveyed that interest in the entire 523 acres, etc., considered their share equal to ninety-two acres.

[These were evidently considered as part of the 421 acres which went to the company, for the company paid them for just that amount. This course would depress the share of the Jacksons in the 421 acres just the three seventeenths of the 102 acres and no more. The real bargain which closed the gap in the title was with Mercur and Welles.]

Mr. Mercur tells of the accepted proposition, emanating from himself and Welles. "We will give you enough of our land outside the (S. & E.) line to make the 100 acres, receiving payment by stock from the company of an equal quantity of land you deed to them."

[Now, who paid the consideration? We quote Mr. Mercur again: "The stock was issued to Welles and myself for that quantity of land in excess of our deed to the company, and the stock to the Jacksons was that much less. * * * I mention the Jacksons, meaning the Doctor, George and Rush."]

[In deference to the defendants' position on this subject the Master has studied this part of the case with special care, and the foregoing foreshadows his conclusion. He is unable to find that George D. Jackson conveyed to the Sullivan & Erie Company, in individual right, any such excess of land, above that of his partners, as to extinguish their rights in the original trust, or acquire for himself the remainder of the title; nor is there a spark of evidence showing that any such arrangement was contemplated among them, and we think he was precluded from so doing without such understanding, by the fiduciary relation he then sustained. We believe further that the three Jacksons stood on terms of substantial and real equality as to this land from their first title in 1859, to and through all the transactions of 1866.]

[It is, therefore, found that the consideration which was paid at the time when George D. Jackson took the legal title to the second half of the 102 acres, proceeded equally from Josiah Jackson, George D. Jackson, and B. Rush Jackson, and was paid from lands held by them, which were conveyed to the Sullivan & Erie Co., Mercur, Welles and others taking the stock therefor, pursuant to their arrangement. Upon this, the conveyances of 1866 established a resulting trust]—82 Pa. 371; 86 Pa. 204; and the parol evidence which has been presented is entitled to its proper weight. 17 Pa. 220; 23 Pa. 268; 68 Pa. 38, 279.

This evidence is much strengthened by the fact of possession, which is undisputed. The trustee and cestuis que trustent, equal in interest, were not only mere possessors, but exercised and incurred notorious acts of ownership and obligation prior to Dr. Jackson's death; and since that time there has been no other possession than that of George and Rush, who were in unchanged relation to each other and were, both, executors of their deceased father's will, privies in blood and estate.

Said Black, C. J., in Lynch v. Cox, 23 Pa. 268: "Where cestui que trust proves purchase money to have been his, he makes a strong case; it is much strengthened by showing that he went into possession immediately, without opposition from the holder of the legal title, and is rendered nearly irresistible by a continued and undisturbed occupancy, without payment of rent, or other acknowledgment of superior right, for a long time. * * * Presumptions are in favor of legal title when neither party is in possession, but when the cestui que trust occupies the land, they are wholly against the trustee."

[The defendants upon argument invoked the Act of April 22, 1856—limitations—as a bar to this suit, in part, at least. But here, again, the Master believes that the fact of possession is conclusive.] "A case is not within the words of the statute when the cestui que trust has possession and occupancy, when the statute is running. If the statute had begun to run, this would stop it. If possession preceded the trust relation, it would not begin to run."

52 Pa. 492; 56 Pa. 119.

[The Master is, therefore, of opinion that the surviving executors of Josiah Jackson are entitled to a conveyance of one undivided third, and Emily L. Patrick (now a widow, assignee of B. Rush Jackson) to one undivided third of the 102 acres 70 perches, as described in the original bill of complaint in this case.]

Numerous exceptions were filed to the Master's report, setting forth, inter alia, the portions of his report inclosed in brackets. On the hearing of such exceptions the following opinion and decree were delivered by MORROW, P. J.:

The undisputed evidence is that Josiah Jackson and his sons, George D. and B. Rush Jackson, did business for many years at Dushore, Sullivan County, in the firm name of "Jackson & Sons," and until the death of Josiah Jackson, April 9, 1867. His sons continued in business as "Jackson Brothers" until the death of George, November 23, 1879.

The land in suit—102 acres and 70 perches—is a part of a larger tract of 523 acres and 110 perches, in Cherry Township, Sullivan County—an undivided half part or moiety of which, Michael Meylert, in the year 1859, conveyed to George D. Jackson, and on the 6th day of July, 1861, George D. Jackson executed a writing, in which he declared that he held the undivided half as follows: one third for his father, one third for his brother and the remaining third for himself. This declaration of trust was found in the safe of Jackson Brothers after George's death, among his private papers.

Three and one half seventeenths of the same tract was conveyed to George D. Jackson, September 20, 1866, by Francis Jordan and others, and on the 22d of the same month, M. C. Mercur, and Charles F. Welles, Jr., conveyed to him 5½ seventeenths of the 102 acres and 70 perches—the land in question. On the 24th of the following October (1866) George D. Jackson conveyed the eleven and one half seventeenths of 421 acres and 40 perches—all of the tract of 523 acres and 110 perches, except the 102 acres and 70 perches just mentioned—to the Sullivan & Erie Coal & Railroad Company. This left the title to 102 acres and 70 perches in George D. Jackson. It is averred in the bill that he held this title in trust for the equal benefit of his father, brother and himself. The defendants claim that he owned the land absolutely, and free and discharged from all trust.

[From the testimony taken under these allegations, the master has substantially found as follows:

1. That the declaration of trust has neither been terminated nor surrendered.

2. That the consideration for the three and one half seventeenths of the entire tract, and also the consideration of the five and one half seventeenths of the 102 acres and 70 perches were paid from lands held by Jackson & Sons at the time when George D. Jackson took the title to the second half of the 102 acres and 70 perches.

3. That Jackson & Sons and Jackson & Brothers were in joint possession of this land—opened a coal mine on it—mined and sold coal for their joint benefit.

4. That George D. Jackson admitted to different persons at or near the mine, and elsewhere, that the land belonged to Jackson & Sons, and that he entered on the books of both firms charges and accounts of coal taken and sold from this land.

The master found there was a resulting trust, and recommends a decree that one undivided third be conveyed to the executors of Josiah Jackson, and another third to Mrs. Patrick, assignee of B. Rush Jackson.

To this report the defendants have taken exceptions, and say the master erred in not finding that the declaration of trust had been terminated and surrendered. They also say that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the master in finding that the consideration was paid by Jackson & Sons at the time the second half of the 102 acres was conveyed to George D. Jackson, and that all the evidence is not so clear, explicit and unequivocal as to establish a resulting trust.

I have examined the evidence with some care and think it fully warrants the findings.]

[There is no question but that a resulting trust may be proved by parol. It is true that the evidence must be clear, explicit and unequivocal. Is it not so here? "A fourfold cord is not easily broken;" payment of the purchase money by the cestui que trust, possession, improvements, declarations of the alleged trustee that he held the land for Jackson & Sons, and finally, all participating in the coal sold. Add to this the fact that he held one half of the land in trust, as by the declaration of trust, when he took the conveyance of the second half, and a resulting trust seems to be the inevitable conclusion.]

[The Statute of Limitations is no bar, for the cestuis que trust were in possession.]

Clark v. Trindle, 52 Pa. 492; Williard v. Williard, 56 Pa. 119.

We see no error, therefore, in the conclusion reached by the master. It is not necessary to notice the exceptions in detail. They are dismissed except so far as sustained here. Let the proper decree be prepared.

[And now, to wit: February 1, 1886, this cause came on to be heard upon the master's report and exceptions thereto, and was argued by counsel for the respective parties; and, therefore, upon consideration it is ordered, adjudged and decreed—

1. That Bernice W. Jackson and George C. Jackson, executrix and executor of George D. Jackson, deceased, convey by good and sufficient deed in fee simple to James Thomson and B. Rush Jackson, surviving executors of Josiah Jackson, deceased, an undivided one third interest in the 102 acres and 70 perches of land described in the plaintiffs' bill of complaint.

2. That the said Bernice W. Jackson and George C. Jackson, executrix and executor of George D. Jackson, deceased, convey by good and sufficient deed in fee simple to Emily L. Patrick, assignee of B. Rush Jackson, an undivided one third interest in the said 102 acres and 70 perches of land described in the plaintiffs' bill of complaint, and the said Bernice W. Jackson and the said George C. Jackson, executrix and executor as aforesaid, are hereby ordered and enjoined to execute and deliver to the said James Thomson and B. Rush Jackson, executors as aforesaid, and to the said Emily L. Patrick, assignee of B. Rush Jackson, respectively, good and sufficient deeds in fee simple as aforesaid for their respective and undivided one third interests in said land as aforesaid within ninety days from the date of this decree.]

[And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendants in the said bill of complaint pay the costs, the master's fees and expenses to be paid in the first instance by the plaintiffs in the bill, with recourse over against the defendants upon the determination of this cause.]

This appeal was taken by defendants. The assignments of error, inter alia, specified the action of the court in dismissing the exceptions to those portions of the master's report inclosed in brackets; the portion of the opinion of the court inclosed in brackets; the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the bill and in entering the decree.

If as to part of the property ejectment might afford an adequate remedy, still the appellees could not be compelled to split up their claim.

There was no evidence which proved any surrender of the declaration of trust, nor any declarations of the parties that it had been so surrendered. The master has found as a fact that this declaration of trust was never surrendered or annulled.

"The finding of facts by a master sustained by the approval of the court below will not be set aside, except for plain error."

Kisor's App. 62 Pa. 435; Thompson's App. 41 Legal Int. 24.

Per Curiam:

An examination of all the numerous assignments discloses no error which demands a reversal of this decree. The demurrer was properly overruled. The jurisdiction of the court cannot be successfully questioned. As to an undivided one half of the land, the trust was proved by the written instrument. The trust as to the other half was proved by oral testimony, but by evidence so clear, explicit and unequivocal as to justify the master and the court in finding that a resulting trust was established.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

v.
Hetty GREENWALDT, Exrx.

In an action on an insolvent's bond an affidavit of defense is sufficient if it alleges that the bond was not forfeited on the day the insolvent's petition was dismissed, that the hearing was fixed not for that day but for a subsequent one and had been continued by a rule, not yet disposed of, to show cause why the order dismissing the petition should not be rescinded, and that on the day the petition was dismissed the insolvent surrendered himself to the keeper of the county prison.

(Argued March 29, Decided April 11, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 140, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense in an action of debt. Reversed.

This was an action by Hetty Greenwaldt, executrix of Louis Greenwaldt, deceased, against Max M. Betz and Constantine Krause on the following bond executed by them, a copy of which was duly filed:

"Know all Men by these Presents, That we, Constantine Krause and Max Betz, are held and firmly bound unto Louis Greenwaldt in the sum of $8,000 lawful money of the United States of America to be paid to the said Louis Greenwaldt, executors and administrators; to which payment, well and truly to be made, we do bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents, sealed with our seals, dated the — day of August, 1886. Whereas, the above bounden Constantine Krause has been arrested or detained in the County of Philadelphia, by virtue of a capias ad satisfaciendum at the suit of the said Louis Greenwaldt for the sum of $4,000 and costs; and the said Constantine Krause having made application to the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Philadelphia, in compliance with the provisions of the Act of General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, passed the 16th day of June, 1836, entitled 'An Act Relating to Insolvent Debtors,' to give bond to the said Louis Greenwaldt with such security as should be required and approved by the said court; and the said court, upon the said application, having required security in the sum of $8,000, and having approved of the said Max Betz as security for the said Constantine Krause, now, the condition of this obligation is such that if the said Constantine Krause shall appear at the next term of the court of common pleas of said county, and then and there present his petition, for the benefit of the insolvent laws of this Commonwealth, and comply with all the requisites of the said law, and abide all the orders of the said court in that behalf; or in default thereof, and if he fail in obtaining his discharge as an insolvent debtor, that he shall surrender himself to the jail of the said county, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue."

With the copy was filed an averment "that said bond became forfeited by reason of the noncompliance with its terms; that the alleged insolvent did not appear at the next term of the said court; whereupon, his petition was discharged, and the insolvency proceedings quashed."

The defendant Krause filed an affidavit of defense, to the following effect:

"The bond sued on was not forfeited on October 16, 1886, when the petition of the deponent in insolvency was dismissed. The hearing of said matter was fixed for October 23, 1886, and has since been continued by the court under a rule to rescind said order dismissing the petition. Deponent, on October 16, 1886, surrendered himself to the keeper of the Philadelphia County prison, who received him as a prisoner, in accordance with the terms of said bond, and no breach of the conditions of said bond have ever occurred. All of which facts defendant expects to be able to prove upon a trial of the said cause."

The following affidavit of defense was filed by the defendant Betz:

"Max M. Betz, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the defendants in the above case and is the surety on the bond given in this suit by Constantine Krause to take the benefit of the insolvent laws of this Commonwealth.

"This affiant says that the said insolvent, Constantine Krause, has surrendered himself to the jail of Philadelphia County as provided in said bond, in case the said insolvent failed to obtain his discharge as an insolvent debtor. And this affiant further says that he is advised by his counsel that this bond is one which does not entitle the plaintiff to judgment for want of an affidavit of defense."

The plaintiff took a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, which the court made absolute.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court: 1, in entering judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense; 2, "Because it appears by the affidavit of Constantine Krause, the insolvent, that he surrendered himself on October 16 to the keeper of the Philadelphia County prison, who received him as a prisoner, in accordance with the terms of said bond; and that no breach of the conditions of said bond has ever occurred. And also it appears by the affidavit of Max M. Betz, who is the surety on the bond, that the said Constantine Krause, the said insolvent, did surrender himself to the jail of Philadelphia County as provided in said bond;" 3, "Because the affidavits of defense distinctly raise the question of fact, whether or not the said Constantine Krause did surrender himself to the jail of Philadelphia County as provided in said bond;" 4, "Because the copy of the bond filed is not such an instrument as comes within the Affidavit of Defense Law, entitling the plaintiff in this action to judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense;" 5, "Because it appears by the record that the suit upon the bond was premature, as it appears by the affidavit of defense that the hearing of said matter in insolvency was fixed for October 23, 1886, and has since been continued under a rule to rescind said order, dismissing the petition, and suit was commenced upon this bond on October 18, as appears by the docket entries;" and 6, because the affidavits were sufficient to prevent judgment.

Messrs. Lewin W. Barringer, John H. Fow, E. A. Anderson, Thomas R. Elcock and F. Carroll Brewster, for plaintiffs in error:

The copy of the bond filed is not an instrument within the Affidavit of Defense Law.

A bail piece is not within the law.

Commonwealth v. Steelman, 2 Miles, 405.

Nor a sheriff's recognizance.

Commonwealth v. Hoffman, 74 Pa. 105.

It is admitted as a matter of original practice in these cases that averments may be made that the conditions of certain bonds have been broken; but where, as in this case, these averments are distinctly denied by affidavit of the defendant, the averment amounts to nothing against the oath of the defendant. The averment and the oath of the defendant, taken together, raise a distinct question of fact for a jury to pass upon.

Borlin v. Commonwealth, 99 Pa. 42; Dauphin Coal Co. v. Dasher, 1 Pearson, 148; Strock v. Commonwealth, 90 Pa. 272.

The suit upon the bond was premature. This affidavit says that no right of action had accrued upon the bond because the insolvent had not had a hearing in the insolvency case; that the hearing was fixed for October 23, 1886. Suit was brought on this bond October 18, 1886, although no cause of action could arise upon it until after October 23. Besides, rules were pending to show cause why the order of court should not be rescinded.

McGovern v. Hoesback, 53 Pa. 176.

That there was a full compliance with the spirit as well as with the letter of the bond can be seen by referring to the language of this court in the case of Mullen v. Wallace, 2 Grant, 389. See also Gallagher v. Kenedy, 2 Rawle, 166; Potts v. Fitch, 2 Pa. 173.

Messrs. Bradbury Bedell and Frederick B. Vogel, for defendant in error:

The averment of the breach of the condition of the bond was that the alleged insolvent did not appear at the next term of the said court; whereupon, his petition was discharged and the insolvency proceedings quashed.

The next court of common pleas is the first period of time succeeding the day of giving the bond, fixed by the court for hearing insolvent debtors, provided fifteen days' notice can be given by the debtor of his application; i.e., of having filed his petition.

Ingraham, Insolvency, p. 28.

In cases where the petition is dismissed because the party does not attend when his case is called up, the practice is for the crier to call upon him to come forth and support his petition, or it will be dismissed. Id.

The order of the court declares that the debtor did not appear at the day fixed for his hearing; whereupon, the petition was dismissed and the insolvency proceedings quashed. This order made by a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive as to the fact that the debtor did not comply with all things required by law to entitle him to a discharge; and cannot be the subject of inquiry in a collateral suit. Being a decree of a court having jurisdiction, it is immaterial what may have induced the decision; it is not subject to review in this court in a case growing out of it, and the making of this order has never been excepted to; and no assignment of error has been based upon it.

Sheets v. Hawk, 14 Serg. & R. 173; Heilner v. Bast, 1 Penr. & W. 267.

A surrender to jail before the day of hearing does not save a forfeiture of the bond.

Kelly v. Stepney, 4 Watts, 69.

A surrender to jail on the day of hearing and after an appearance, the petition not being in accordance with the Act of Assembly, does not save a forfeiture of the bond.

Detwiler v. Casselberry, 5 Watts & S. 179.

A surrender to jail on the day of hearing, the insolvent being present in court house, but not having personally appeared in court, does not save a forfeiture of the bond.

Wolfram v. Strickhouser, 1 Watts & S. 379.

The cases cited by plaintiff in error as to the insufficiency of the copy filed were brought to recover an uncertain sum of money upon bonds for the performance of collateral conditions. In the present case the bond is for a fixed sum: and the damages under it according to the law are the debt, interest and costs in the suit in which it was filed.

Rush v. Clifford, 10 W. N. C. 238.

But no decision is needed in this case, for the Act of March 12, 1842, § 2, P. L. p. 67, expressly brings bonds given by debtors and their sureties with the conditions prescribed in the sixth section of the Act of the 16th of June, 1836, entitled, "An Act Relating to Insolvent Debtors," within the provisions of the Affidavit of Defense Law in Philadelphia County.

As to the averment and the oath of the defendant, raising a distinct question of fact for a jury to pass upon, it is sufficient to say that the averment sets forth what the record itself showed, that the insolvent did not appear; the affidavit evades this averment, which could not be contradicted without contradicting the record, sets forth that there was no forfeiture or surrender to jail, "and that no breach of the conditions of the bond has ever occurred."

This is simply a general denial without any statement of facts, and a mere averment of a conclusion of law which is insufficient.

Marsh v. Marshall, 53 Pa. 396; Bardsley v. Delp, 88 Pa. 420; Stitt v. Garrett, 3 Whart. 281; Dewey v. Dupuy, 2 Watts & S. 553.

Every fact must be averred, and nothing left to inference.

Peck v. Jones, 70 Pa. 83.

It is claimed by the fifth assignment of error that the action was prematurely brought, because the affidavit of defense says that the record of the court below in this very case is untrue; in other words, the lower court erred because it would not receive parol evidence to contradict its own record; and that, too, as to matters especially within the knowledge and conscience of the court. That this cannot be done is so clear that it is unnecessary to cite other authorities than Sheets v. Hawk, 14 Serg. & R. 173; Hoffman v. Coster, 2 Whart. 453; and Graham v. Smith, 25 Pa. 323.

The bail can only be exonerated by a surrender upon the day the petition is dismissed, in cases where the dismissal of the petition is based upon the insolvent's nonresidence for the required time within the State; or where his insolvency arose from gambling, or purchase of lottery tickets, or where he has been guilty of embezzlement or fraud; in all of which cases he is prevented from complying with the condition of the bond by operation of law, at the instance of the creditor or the court, and not by any default in himself in complying with the provisions of the Insolvent Act. In these cases the surrender furnishes the body to answer the criminal offense, for which the surety did not undertake to answer.

Wolfram v. Strickhouser, 1 Watts & S. 379; Kelly v. Stepney, 4 Watts, 69; Detwiler v. Casselberry, 5 Watts & S. 179.

Although the failure of the debtor to conform with the requirement of the Act arises from ignorance or an honest mistake, it is no excuse, and the bond becomes forfeited.

Detwiler v. Casselberry, supra.

(Argued April 6, Decided April 25, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 252, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

Reported below, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 565.

This was an action by Thomas Jones and Catharine Jones, his wife, late Kate Williams, in the right of his wife; Owen Owens and Grace Owens, his wife, late Grace Williams, in right of the wife; David Williams, by Thomas R. Hughes, his guardian, against Jennie Bland, Willis O. Smith, Jennie Smith, and Margaret Brown.

The facts, as they appeared from the plaintiffs' testimony at the trial, are stated in the opinion of the supreme court.

On motion of the defendants, the court below entered a compulsory nonsuit. Upon overruling a motion to take off the nonsuit, REED, J., delivered the following opinion:

This case, which has already been passed upon more than once, comes now before the court in a shape which differs essentially from any in which it has before been presented.

The plaintiffs show that Grace Bland, under whose will they claim, was the grantee of the premises in dispute in a deed made by one Ford in the year 1865, and that she went into possession, occupying the whole or a portion of the property with her husband, Aneurin Bland. No purchase money was paid by her, as far as the evidence showed, and no title or any act indicative of a claim of title was shown on the part of her grantor, Ford. The evidence also showed that the defendants, Jennie Smith, and Willis O. Smith, were respectively the second wife of Aneurin Bland, whom he married after the death of Grace Bland, and the second husband of Aneurin Bland's widow, Jennie. But there was no evidence that the defendants claimed either under Grace Bland or Aneurin Bland.

For all, therefore, that appears in this stage of the controversy, the suit may be merely a struggle for the possession of land between persons who are alike intruders upon it; and to settle such disputes courts of justice do not sit.

The case of Jones v. Bland, 2 Cent. Rep. 326, 112 Pa. 181, proceeded upon a dissimilar state of facts. There was there some proof of the payment of purchase money by Grace Bland, and the issue below had been made to turn exclusively upon a single question, namely: that of Ford's possession, which was at best but one element in the case.

The motion, therefore, to take off the nonsuit is refused.

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in entering the nonsuit and refusing to take it off.

Messrs. Thomas R. Hughes and David C. Harrington, for plaintiffs in error:

Every possession where there is title is presumed to be in subordination to it; hence, the possession of Grace Bland must be presumed, in absence of testimony, to be under her deeds; and the husband is also presumed to be in under the title of his wife, and after her death as tenant for life under her will.

Clark v. Trindle, 52 Pa. 492; Jones v. Bland, 2 Cent. Rep. 326, 112 Pa. 176.

The second wife of Aneurin Bland, upon his death, became a tenant by sufferance, is an intruder, and cannot dispute the title of the plaintiffs.

Asher v. Whitelock, L. R. 1 Q. B. 1.

The widow of a tenant for life, who continues in possession without any contract between herself and the owner of the land, holds in subordination to his title, and not adversely; she is at best a tenant by sufferance.

The subsequent marriage of such widow does not change the character of her possession; the second husband occupies the premises in right of his wife, and his possession, during her life, is in privity with the owner's title, and not adverse to it.

Bannon v. Brandon, 34 Pa. 263.

In Bowser v. Bowser, 2 W. N. C. 624, the husband bought property, and it was sold at sheriff's sale, where his wife became the purchaser. She was without means, but borrowed part of the money and obtained credit for the balance, which her husband paid. Upon her death her husband remained in possession, remarried and left his widow in possession. The daughter of the first wife brought ejectment and recovered on the ground that the title was in the heir of the deceased wife, and that her husband had no title.

A case was decided in the same way by Judge Hare, in Caffrey v. McFarland, 1 Phila. 555, where the facts were exactly like the present.

That plaintiff in ejectment need not go further back in deducing title in the first instance than the will under which he claims, of one who died seised of the land. The law presumes a fee simple in the devisor, unless the contrary is shown.

M'Henry v. M'Call, 10 Watts, 470; Miller v. Wilson, 2 Yeates, 294.

In ejectment by the heirs of one who died seised, against the widow and her second husband, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show title in the ancestor.

Cook v. Nicholas, 2 Watts & S. 27; Mobley v. Bruner, 59 Pa. 481.

The proposition which used to be a maxim, that the possession of the wife is the possession of the husband, is no longer any truer than its converse.

Hoar v. Axe, 22 Pa. 384.

A conveyance to a wife vests the title in her, even as against the husband and his heirs, as was decided in Earnest's App. 106 Pa. 310; Bowser v. Bowser, 2 W. N. C. 624, and Emery v. Marshall, Legal Int. 1885, p. 395.

Where a defendant moves for a nonsuit, the plaintiff's evidence must be taken to be true; and every reasonable inference of fact which a jury might draw from it in favor of the plaintiff must be drawn by the judge.

McGrann v. Pittsburgh etc. R. R. Co. (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 565; Miller v. Bealler, 100 Pa. 583; Maynes v. Atwater, 88 Pa. 496; Schuchardt v. Allen, 1 Wall. 359 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 642); Greany v. Long Island R. R. Co. (N.Y.) 2 Cent. Rep. 452.

If there was any doubt as to the meaning of the witness, it was for the jury to solve.

Devine v. Miller, 37 Legal Int. 436.

Where there is any evidence which would justify an inference of the disputed fact it must go to the jury.

Maynes v. Atwater, 88 Pa. 496; Howard Express Co. v. Wile, 64 Pa. 201; R. R. Co. v. Heil, 5 W. N. C. 91.

This case has already been decided by this court and is reported in 2 Cent. Rep. 326, 112 Pa. 176.

Messrs. A. A. Hirst and Crawford & Dallas, for defendants in error:

In the present case the plaintiffs not having proved the material facts of Grace Bland's payment of the purchase money and possession at the time of her deed under it, which facts were the basis of the decision in 2 Cent. Rep. 326, 112 Pa. 176, and it appearing that colored people had possession of the principal part of the house, covering the period of her alleged possession, which was to whatever extent it existed, but jointly with her husband, the rule that even as against an intruder, the plaintiffs must show a title from a prior and exclusive, not a mixed or concurrent possession, precludes the plaintiffs' recovery.

7 Alb. L. J. 402 and cases cited; Tyler, Eject. pp. 72, 73, 105, 204, 685.

In Clark v. Trindle, 52 Pa. 497, both sides gave testimony and claimed under the same title, one as legal owner, and the other as cestui que trust; but the court held that a joint occupancy, or a possession not exclusive, will not amount to entry under color of title, as a starting point for the running of the Statute of Limitations, or making title against the joint possessor.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

In considering the validity of a compulsory nonsuit it is the duty of the court to assume the truth of plaintiff's evidence and deduce therefrom every reasonable inference of fact, in his favor, that might be drawn by a jury. In that respect it is substantially the same as a judgment for defendant on demurrer to evidence.

If this case had been submitted to the jury, as it should have been, they doubtless would have found substantially the following facts, viz.: that in August, 1865, Ford and wife sold and conveyed the premises in controversy to Grace Bland, who afterwards went into possession of the same with her husband and died seised thereof in 1872, having first, by her will, duly probated, devised the same to her husband, Aneurin Bland, for life, and remainder in fee to the plaintiffs; that, after the decease of testatrix, Aneurin Bland the tenant for life married Jennie Bland, one of the defendants, and they continued in possession until his death in 1878. His widow, continuing to occupy the premises, afterwards married Willis O. Smith, another of defendants in possession. The remaining defendant occupied part of the premises as tenant of the widow, Jennie Bland. These are the controlling facts which the jury would have been clearly warranted in finding from the evidence, and upon them, without more, the plaintiffs had a prima facie case, entitling them to a verdict. The intervening life estate of Aneurin Bland having terminated by his death in 1878, the plaintiffs (as devisees in fee of the remainder) were entitled to possession as against his widow and all other mere intruders.

As we said before, it is not always necessary for a plaintiff in ejectment to first show title out of the Commonwealth, and then trace each successive transfer down to himself. If, for example, both parties claim under the same person, there is an implied admission of title in him. In like manner, the fact that defendant acquired possession as tenant of plaintiff warrants a presumption of title in the latter. If plaintiff claims by descent, it is sufficient for him, in the first instance, to prove his heirship and that the ancestor from whom he derives title was the person last seised of the premises. If he claims as devisee, he must, in like manner, prove the will and seisin of his devisor. The latter may be done by showing that he was in actual possession or in receipt of the rents as landlord at the time of his death; because possession is presumptive evidence of seisin in fee until the contrary is shown. Jones v. Bland, 2 Cent. Rep. 326, 112 Pa. 176.

As against the defendants, who are strangers, in blood as well as title, to Grace Bland, the devisor of plaintiffs, the latter were prima facie entitled to recover upon showing that she died in possession of the premises, and that the intervening life estate, created by her, had terminated. Those who continued to hold possession after the death of Aneurin Bland, the life tenant, were prima facie intruders.

The learned judge was mistaken in saying the former case, or rather the former trial of this case, proceeded upon a dissimilar state of facts. There was some evidence of additional facts, but they were not essential. The controlling facts deducible from the evidence are substantially the same. In the absence of any controversy between the devisees of Grace Bland and creditors of her husband, the conveyance by Ford and wife vested the title in her.

The recital and receipt in the deed were prima facie evidence of payment of the consideration money by her. If it were even shown that her husband paid the purchase money, it would not affect her title. The presumption would be that it was intended as a gift from him to her.

It is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, or to repeat what was said when the case was here before. The assignment of error is sustained.

Judgment reversed, and procedendo awarded.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 186, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, and Green, JJ.

Error to the Quarter Sessions of Fayette County, to review a judgment on a verdict of guilty on an indictment for forcible entry and detainer. Reversed.

The indictment was as follows:

The grand inquest of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, now inquiring in and for the body of the County of Fayette, upon their oaths and solemn affirmations, respectively, do present, that Samuel Thompson, late of said county, yeoman, and Robert Thompson, late of the county aforesaid, yeoman, on the second day of March in the year of our Lord, 1885, in the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms, with violence and a strong hand, unlawfully did enter into a certain store room situate in the Borough of Brownsville, Fayette County, Pennsylvania, fronting on Main Street in said borough, then and there in the peaceable possession of one John Dutton; and they, the said Samuel Thompson and Robert Thompson, then and there, with force of arms and with a strong hand, by force and threats and menacing conduct, unlawfully did expel, remove and turn out the said John Dutton from the possession of the said premises with the appurtenances, and the said John Dutton so as aforesaid expelled, removed and turned out from the possession of the same by force and with a strong hand, and by menaces and threats did then and there unlawfully hold and keep out, and other wrongs to the said John Dutton then and there did, to the great damage of the said John Dutton, contrary to the form of the Act of the General Assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial, are stated in the opinion of the supreme court.

INGRAHAM, P. J., charged the jury as follows:

"As you have already heard, this is an action or prosecution in the name of the Commonwealth against Samuel and Robert Thompson, for forcible entry and detainer. It is claimed by the Commonwealth that in the month of November, 1884, the prosecutrix, Mrs. Ada O. Krepps, was in the possession of a frame building in Brownsville in this county—in the 'Neck' I believe, and that while so in the possession of that property, the defendant took possession of it by force and is still in the possession of it. No, I believe the prosecutrix resumed possession of the property; and if you are satisfied from the evidence of these facts, counsel have agreed that you may return a verdict of guilty of forcible entry, as charged in the indictment. So, if you are satisfied of the fact of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, you can convict him. But if you have a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, he is entitled to the benefit of that doubt, and you can acquit him."

Verdict: guilty.

The assignments of error specified the charge and the subsequent action of the court below in overruling a motion in arrest of judgment.

Mr. Edward Campbell, for plaintiff in error:

The indictment is for the forcible entry of a store room in Brownsville in said (Fayette) County; to this the bill adds, "fronting on Main Street in said Borough."

Hunt v. McFarland, 38 Pa. 69.

Judgment cannot be entered if the title of the prosecutor is not set out in the bill, for the prosecutor may have been tenant at will and liable to be turned out.

Vanpool v. Commonwealth, 13 Pa. 390; Respublica v. Campbell, 1 Dall. 354 (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 178); Leinbach v. Kaufman, 1 Cent. Rep. 420; McDermott v. McIlwain, 75 Pa. 341; Trimbath v. Patterson, 76 Pa. 277.

The information alleges Dutton to have been a "tenant," but no allegation anywhere appears as to whose tenant he was; this cannot be inferred.

The information also alleges that the title was in the husband of the prosecutrix. She therefore could not have been entitled to possession. The verdict in this case is guilty of forcible entry, only. The bill charges forcible entry and detainer. There can be no judgment because the court cannot separate the single count of which the bill consists.

Commonwealth v. Toram, 3 Clark, 288.

Nothing is alleged anywhere to show any right of Ada O. Krepps, the prosecutrix, to the possession of the premises; and it is not pretended that she was in possession. The prosecutor must aver a freehold, and prove at least an occupation or reception of the profits.

2 Whart. Am. Cr. Law, § 2042.

In this case the bill alleges an occupation by Dutton, who is a stranger, or for all that appears may have been defendant's tenant.

Possession or seisin of the prosecutor must be alleged in the bill.

One who breaks open the door of his own house, which is forcibly detained from him by one who claims the bare custody of it, cannot be guilty of forcible entry.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

An examination of the evidence in this case develops the following facts: John Dutton, the alleged tenant of the prosecutrix, left his shop at about 5 o'clock on the evening of the 4th of November, 1884, and when he returned the next morning, he found as he says, that the lock had been taken off the door and two new ones put on, the one on the inside and the other on the outside. He discovered no other marks of violence than what is here stated, except that a piece had been cut out of the door. His possession does not seem to have been disturbed, nor was there the slightest interference with him personally; and if his occupancy was at all interrupted he does not so state. Indeed, there could not have been an interruption thereof for a longer period than it took to remove the locks, since they alone interfered with his immediate entrance upon the premises. There was neither violence nor threats of violence; nothing which was calculated to alarm the most timid.

The explanation of the matter seems to be that some time during the night Samuel Thompson and his son Robert had visited the premises, and quietly, under a claim of right, had substituted their own locks for that of Dutton. This evidence does not bring the case within the Act of March 31, 1860, since no entry was made with violence and a strong hand or other circumstances of terror, and the court below ought so to have instructed the jury. An insignificant trespass, such as that above described, which had no public significance, cannot be made the subject of a criminal prosecution. As was said in Respublica v. Devore, 1 Yeates, 501, indictments for forcible entry and detainer ought to be discouraged unless there is evident force against the person in actual possession.

The judgment is reversed, and it is ordered that the record be remitted to the Court below.

Henry MILES, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Benjamin LEWIS et al.

1. A vendee of land, in possession under a contract of sale on which a balance of purchase money was unpaid, confessed judgment in amicable ejectment, to the vendor, to be released on payment of the balance of the purchase money, in ten days; the money not being paid, judgment was entered twelve days thereafter, and a writ of hab. fa. issued; thereupon the vendee took a written lease of the premises from the vendor, at a small sum per month, and the sheriff returned the writ executed. The vendee was, at the time, indebted by judgment, in favor of a third party. Thereafter the property was sold under a fi. fa. issued on said last mentioned judgment against the vendee, to the present plaintiff, who now brings ejectment therefor against the vendor and vendee. The vendee testified that he told the vendor that said judgment creditor was about to push his judgment to collection; that the amicable action and confession of judgment in ejectment were for the very purpose of hindering such judgment creditor from reaching the property; and that the nominal payments of rent provided for in the lease were to apply on the purchase money. Held, that there was such evidence of fraud and collusion in the transaction between the vendor and vendee, with the intent to delay said judgment creditor in the collection of his judgment, as should have been submitted to the jury, and which, if found to exist, would render the transaction void as to the judgment creditor sought to be defrauded, and the purchaser under him—the present plaintiff.
2. If the plaintiff in the present action is entitled to recover, it is because the amicable action in ejectment, with judgment confessed, was collusive and fraudulent as to the said judgment creditor; and the plaintiff is not bound to tender or pay any money to the vendor.
3. The testimony of the vendee as to the intent of the transaction between him and the vendor was not incompetent under the rule which applies where one party to an instrument seeks to set it aside by oral testimony—for he would still be bound by the judgment in ejectment and lease, and the judgment would be valid as to all persons except the creditor sought to be defrauded.

(Argued Feb. 24, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 286, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment on a verdict for defendants in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

This action was brought by Henry Miles against Thomas Barrowman and Benjaman Lewis to recover possession of premises in the City of Scranton. The following facts appeared on the trial before HAND, P. J.:

April 25, 1870, Alexander and Thomas Barrowman contracted to sell the lot in question to W. S. Griffiths. November 7, 1870, Griffiths sold the lot to Benjamin Lewis in consideration of $670. April 12, 1871, Griffiths assigned the contract to Alexander and Thomas Barrowman and on May 22, 1874, Alexander Barrowman assigned his interest in the contract to Thomas Barrowman, the present defendant.

Lewis, for the purpose of building on the lot, borrowed $1,000 of the Miners & Laborers Building Association, and gave his judgment note therefor, upon which note judgment was entered May 15, 1872, and the same was duly revived by sci. fa. On fi. fa. issued on this judgment, the property was sold on October 11, 1879, to Henry Miles, and a sheriff's deed delivered to him; and he brought this action of ejectment, claiming under such title.

Defendant Barrowman showed title as follows:

May 12, 1877, nearly four years after the payments of purchase money on the contract were due from Lewis, Barrowman and Lewis entered into an agreement whereby Lewis confessed judgment in ejectment to Barrowman, conditioned upon the payment in ten days of the amount of $344.58, the balance due on such contract.

The money not having been paid, twelve days thereafter, and on May 24, 1877, judgment was entered upon such agreement and the next day a writ of hab. fa. was issued and executed, and the possession of the tract of land delivered to Barrowman. A lease was then executed between Barrowman and Lewis for the land and house, at a rental of $5 a month, under which Lewis continued in possession of the premises up to November, 1882.

On behalf of plaintiff, Lewis testified that the arrangement between himself and Barrowman was entered into for the purpose of preventing the Building & Loan Association from pushing its judgment and obtaining possession of the property, and that the agreement was that the sum paid by Lewis as rent should be applied in extinguishment of the balance due on the contract, and that upon paying such amount in full he was to have a deed of the premises.

These statements were denied by Barrowman.

Plaintiff, inter alia, presented the following points:

1. If there is evidence in this case tending to show that the amicable action entered into between Barrowman and Lewis was entered into for the purpose of hindering or delaying the Miners & Laborers Building Association in the collection of its judgment, or for the purpose of defeating the claim of said association, then it is such evidence of fraud and collusion as ought to be submitted to the jury.

Ans. "If there was evidence in the case, we would affirm this principle. We affirm it as a principle of law, but we answer it in the negative on the facts of this case." Second assignment of error.

2. If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that Thomas Barrowman and B. Lewis effected the conveyance of the land described in the writ to Thomas Barrowman (through the amicable action of ejectment) for the purpose of defrauding the Miners & Laborers Building Association, such conveyance is fraudulent as against the Miners & Laborers Building Association, and for all purposes of appropriating the property of B. Lewis to the satisfaction of the loan of the Miners & Laborers Building Association the equitable title to the property at the time of the sheriff's sale to Miles was deemed to be still vested in B. Lewis.

Ans. "We negative this point, upon the facts of this case." Third assignment of error.

3. If the jury believe from the evidence that the amicable action of ejectment and confession of judgment in the same by B. Lewis to Barrowman was entered into by B. Lewis and Barrowman for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff in the judgment and execution on which the land was sold, and was purchased by the plaintiff here, and that the land was that of B. Lewis at the time of the sheriff's sale of the interest of B. Lewis in the same to the plaintiff here, to be reconveyed to B. Lewis, or to anyone whom he might name, upon payment of the purchase money due Barrowman on said land, the plaintiff is entitled to recover and the verdict must be for the plaintiff for the land described in the writ, conditioned on his paying Barrowman, the defendant, the amount due him by B. Lewis.

Ans. "We answer this in the negative, upon the facts in this case. Miles should have tendered the purchase money, if he wished to stand upon Lewis' equities." Fourth assignment of error.

4. Under all the evidence in this case in any event the verdict must be against Benjamin Lewis for the land described in the writ.

Ans. "We answer that in the negative." Fifth assignment of error.

5. That if the jury believe that Barrowman and Lewis, by means of an amicable action of ejectment, perpetrated a fraud upon the Building Association, a lien creditor of Lewis, the purchaser at sheriff's sale, the plaintiff in this case, is entitled to recover without making a tender of the unpaid purchase money to the holder of the legal title prior to his bringing his action of ejectment.

Ans. "We answer that in this case there appears be no fraud against the Building Association. If there is an equity outside of the question alleged, of fraud ex maleficio, of fraud on the ground that Barrowman is a trustee ex maleficio, that equity can be secured by a conditional decree by the court on its equity side, Barrowman would not be made a trustee ex maleficio, except by refusing to convey on offer of payment. Under the principles and the facts in this case, your verdict will have to be for the defendant." Sixth assignment of error.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"It is further alleged and sworn to by Benjamin Lewis that when Thomas Barrowman took this tract of land back, under these proceedings in ejectment, he gave Lewis a lease (which is true) for the premises, and that at the same time he agreed with Lewis that if he, Lewis, would pay him the amount that was due him, or when he did pay him the amount that was due him, he would reconvey, or convey rather, the land to him."

"Mr. Barrowman is not in the position of having received a conveyance from Benjamin Lewis; he is simply in the position of having enforced his own purchase money against the tract of land.

"Now, this evidence is in the case only testified to by Benjamin Lewis, and alters or contradicts the written agreements of the parties, to wit: the agreement for the amicable ejectment and the lease in the case. But giving to this agreement the full force that the words sworn to can imply (and I should state here, however, before I say that, that there is but one witness who testifies to this arrangement, and that is Benjamin Lewis, who in his testimony admits that he had an interest in this case, and that it is against Thomas Barrowman), but as I say, admitting the whole force that can be given to these words that are sworn to as having been uttered by Thomas Barrowman, and the agreement that is set up, it amounted to an agreement by the holder of the legal title, which he had acquired again against the equitable title, that if he received the amount that was due him, he would make a conveyance.

"Assuming that the lease, at the rate of $5 per month, which, as the evidence shows is not a high rate of rental, but on the contrary rather a low rate, assuming that the rental was to be applied to the purchase money that was due Thomas Barrowman, it would require a longer time than elapsed before this action was brought to raise any equity that would entitle Benjamin Lewis, or anyone holding under him, to bring his action and compel a conveyance on the part of Mr. Barrowman.

"Mr. Lewis was obligated, if no time was fixed to pay that purchase money, to pay it within a reasonable time. The evidence is that he even failed to pay the rent; and the evidence is that he remained in possession of that land from 1877 down to the time when this suit was brought, during which he had the full opportunity, if that agreement was good, to make payment to Thomas Barrowman for the amount that was due him.

"The evidence further discloses that he remained in possession until 1882. Now, there is no equity that this court will enforce on its chancery side, to compel a conveyance to Benjamin Lewis, or anyone claiming under him, without the payment of the money to Thomas Barrowman. If this case is eventually to be decided wholly upon the equity that is set up by this plaintiff, that equity can be reached without a verdict here, because it is a fixed equity, the amount can be easily calculated and a decree could be made upon the payment of the money. But we hold in this case that this action being brought by Henry Miles, without any offer to pay Thomas Barrowman the amount that was due him, or before the arrangement was completed that is set up by Benjamin Lewis, if he stands upon that, his action was premature, brought too soon; and at all events the court, under the circumstances of this case, would not, at this late day, allow a verdict to go in favor of the plaintiff against Thomas Barrowman, except there was evidence that a tender of the amount due Thomas Barrowman was made before the action was brought, because upon these equities Henry Miles is seeking, as a vendee, to enforce the specific articles of agreement, and has shown no disposition on his part, as far as the evidence is concerned, to satisfy the just and equitable claim of Thomas Barrowman against this tract of land.

"Upon all the facts of the case, therefore, and upon the equitable principles that control us, we say there is no fraud in this case against Benjamin Lewis, for he has not complied with his agreement with Thomas Barrowman, or attempted to comply with it; there is no fraud against Henry Miles, for he stands in no better position than Benjamin Lewis, and had not offered to comply before the suit was brought.

"There is no fraud against the building association, for it had its lien upon the equitable title in 1872, and rested quietly on it until in 1879. Knowing that Mr. Barrowman had the legal title, and that it was liable at any time to be excluded from any interest in the equitable title, whenever he saw fit to enforce his payment for purchase money, the association laid by for seven years. If it had desired to enforce its right to have a legal title, it was its duty to have sold the land upon its judgment, becoming a vendee, then tender Thomas Barrowman the purchase money and ask for a deed. This it did not do. We hold that Henry Miles stands in no better position than it does."

The jury returned a verdict for defendant as directed by the court in its answer to defendant's fifth point, and judgment was entered thereon.

The first assignment of error specified the action of the court in directing a verdict for defendant. The other assignments of error are noted above.

Messrs. Lemuel Amerman, H. M. Edwards and C. Comegys, for plaintiff in error:

Under the Statute of Fraudulent Conveyances, 13 Eliz. chap. 5, §§ 1, 2, Rob. Dig. 295, a fraudulent conveyance may be effected through an action of ejectment.

Forrester v. Hanaway, 82 Pa. 218; Sweetzer's App. 71 Pa. 264.

A fraudulent conveyance or what is the same thing a fraudulent suit, judgment and execution, is void as against the person intended to be defrauded by it, and for all purposes of appropriating the property to the satisfaction of his claim, the property is to be deemed still vested in the debtor.

Kimble v. Smith, 9 W. N. C. 357; Harlan v. Maglaughlin, 90 Pa. 293; Monroe v. Smith, 79 Pa. 459; Snyder v. Christ, 39 Pa. 499; Byrod's App. 31 Pa. 241; Phipps v. Boyd, 54 Pa. 342; Heath v. Page, 63 Pa. 123; Haymaker's App. 53 Pa. 306; McKee v. Gilchrist, 3 Watts, 280; Rhoad's App. 11 W. N. C. 276.

If the intention and effect of the amicable action of ejectment was to hinder, delay or defraud the Miners & Laborers Building Association in the collection of its judgment, it is absolutely void.

Bunn v. Ahl, 29 Pa. 387; Passmore v. Eldridge, 12 Serg. & R. 198; Stahle v. Spohn, 8 S. & R. 317; Forrester v. Hanaway, 82 Pa. 224.

Whether or not the amicable action of ejectment, confession of judgment and execution thereon, was to the end, purpose and intent to delay, hinder or defraud the Miners & Laborers Building Association was a question of fact that should have been submitted to the jury under all the evidence in this case.

McGrann v. Pittsburg etc. R. R. Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 565, 111 Pa. 171; Kaine v. Weigley. 22 Pa. 183; Rogers v. Hall, 4 Watts, 359; McKibbin v. Martin, 64 Pa. 352.

If possession has been obtained by Barrowman, the holder of the legal title under circumstances which is a fraud on the lien creditor, the Miners & Laborers Building Association, it follows that Miles, the purchaser at sheriff's sale, is entitled to recover that possession from Barrowman without making a tender prior to bringing ejectment, even if there were purchase money due.

As to Barrowman's right to enter judgment in the amicable ejectment suit, see Damon v. Bache, 55 Pa. 67.

A judgment by confession has all the qualities of a verdict.

St. Bartholomew's Church v. Wood, 61 Pa. 96.

The case of Forrester v. Hanaway, 82 Pa. 224, has not a single element in common with this case. It was distinguished in Price's Appeal. The purchase money was not all due. It was on the eve of a sheriff's sale of the vendee's interest. An absolute judgment in ejectment was confessed on one day, and the next the property delivered on a habere facias. The vendor knew of the executions, and that the property was to be sold by the sheriff. The court held this a constructive fraud.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

In Damon v. Bache, 55 Pa. 67, it was said that no wrong can be committed in the pursuit of legal rights by lawful means. Therefore a vendor of land, upon request of the vendee because of his indebtedness to others, may bring an action of ejectment, take a confession of judgment to be released on payment of the sum due and owing by the vendee at a stipulated time, and on failure of the vendee to perform the condition, issue execution and recover possession of the land.

It matters not that the vendee suggested the action and had some expectation in favor of his father and mother, for the vendor did nothing wrong in vigilantly enforcing legal rights, and where there is no wrong there can be no fraud. The evidence in that case was insufficient to warrant the inference of an intent on the part of the plaintiff in the action in ejectment, to hinder or delay a creditor of the vendee.

Where the owner of the equitable title, being indebted to divers persons, confesses judgment to the vendor in ejectment, conditional for payment of the purchase money, the judgment will not be set aside in favor of the vendee's other creditors, if there is no evidence of fraudulent intent. Judgment creditors of the vendee must take care of themselves; and in case there is no actual fraud, they cannot complain that the plaintiff in the amicable action and confession of judgment in ejectment, allowed the time given for payment of the money to expire before filing the confession of judgment in court; for that fact of itself does not show fraudulent collusion to hinder creditors. Price's App. 2 Com. Pleas Rep. 79.

But it was remarked by Justice Gordon: "Had other circumstances indicated a collusion between the parties for the purpose of defrauding the appellant, this relation of the confession until the last day of grace would undoubtedly have been evidence bearing upon the fraudulent intention."

Land was sold by articles of agreement, and nearly $700 of purchase money remained unpaid, a portion thereof not due. The vendee had made improvements, and his equitable interest was worth $2,000; judgments were entered against him exceeding $3,000, and on one of the judgments execution had been issued and the property advertised for sale. On the day before the date fixed for the sheriff's sale, the vendee confessed judgment in ejectment, without stay, in favor of the vendor, who immediately issued execution and recovered possession. There was no direct evidence of an agreement or promise by the vendor in favor of the vendee or his family; nor was there evidence that the vendee had an expectancy in favor of his parents. The unusual haste, the agreement making all the purchase money due, with the other facts, were sufficient, as remarked by the present chief justice, to "naturally lead the mind to the conclusion that the primary object of the arrangement was to remove the estate of McNamara out of the reach of his creditors." And as to them the judgment in ejectment was void. Forrester v. Hanaway, 82 Pa. 218.

In this case the amicable confession of judgment in ejectment, to be released on payment of $344.53 purchase money in ten days, was signed May 12, 1877, and filed in court twelve days thereafter. Execution was issued on the day the judgment was filed, and on the next day the plaintiff and sheriff went to the premises; whereupon, the defendant took a written lease for the same, and the sheriff returned his writ showing he had delivered possession as commanded. At the time of this transaction, the vendee was indebted by judgment in favor of the Miners & Laborers Building & Loan Association, $1,000. There is evidence tending to show that the vendee's interest in the land was worth the amount of that judgment.

Had the jury believed the testimony of Benjamin Lewis, they would have been warranted in finding that he told Thomas Barrowman that said association was about to push its judgment to collection, and that Lewis and Barrowman agreed to enter the amicable action and confession of judgment in ejectment for the very purpose of hindering said association from reaching the property. He says that it was understood between them that he paid no rent, that the payments of nominal rents were to apply on the purchase money. His testimony ought to be considered in connection with the short time given in the confession of judgment for payment of the money, the filing of that judgment and the issuing of execution at the same time, and the contemporaneous service of the writ by the sheriff and the execution of the previously prepared lease.

Barrowman contradicts Lewis, and his testimony is not without some corroboration. But the disputed questions of fact were for the jury, not the court. The assignments of error, except the fourth and fifth, are sustained. The fourth is not sustained, for the reason that if the plaintiff is entitled to recover, it is because the amicable action in ejectment, with judgment confessed, was collusive and fraudulent as to the judgment creditor named; and the plaintiff is not bonnd to tender or pay any money to the vendor.

The defendants contend that this case is within the principle ruled in Martin v. Berens, 67 Pa. 459; and Thorn v. Warfflein, 100 Pa. 519, which applies where one party to an instrument seeks to vary, reform or set it aside by oral testimony. But here the parties to the judgment in ejectment are bound by what they did; they are competent witnesses—and should Barrowman admit that Lewis tells the truth, Lewis is bound by the judgment and lease. He would not be heard were he to set up the collusion to hinder his creditor for the purpose of defeating the result of the judgment as to himself. As to all persons, except the creditor sought to be defrauded, the judgment in ejectment is valid.

A creditor who seeks to avoid that judgment must satisfy the jury of collusion between the parties thereto to defraud him. The purchaser at sheriff's sale, or person holding under him, attacks not the existence or validity of a writing or judgment, but he charges that the judgment was collusively confessed and entered for the purpose of hindering or delaying the creditor on whose judgment the property was sold. The burden is on him to make out his case under the rules of evidence applicable in actions at law; not under the rule in equity that the equivalent of the testimony of two witnesses is necessary to overcome the responsive answer to a fact averred in the bill. The plaintiff alleges and must prove that the parties in the judgment, execution and lease, though unassailable as to themselves, intended thereby to defraud the creditor.

Judgment reversed and venire facias de novo awarded.

(Argued Jan. 19, Decided March 28, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 200, E.D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

This action was brought by Albert N. Kidney to recover possession of a lot of ground and five houses in the City of Philadelphia. The writ was issued against the tenants in possession, but before trial Zeno Cope was admitted to defend as landlord and owner. Both parties claimed under Eliza Cope; the plaintiff under a purchase by him at a sheriff's sale in February, 1882, under a judgment obtained by Albert N. Kidney against said Eliza Cope on September 6, 1880, for $1,435.79, upon thirteen promissory notes given by her. The defendant claimed title under deed to him made by Eliza Cope, December 13, 1879.

At the trial in the court below, before BIDDLE, J., it appeared that the property was formerly owned by Thomas Cope who devised it to Eliza Cope, his widow, during life or widowhood, remainder to his children. At the date of the deed to her son Zeno Cope, said Eliza Cope was seventy-two years old. The consideration paid by him was $800, part of which included a judgment against Mrs. Cope which was paid therefrom. The land was subject to a ground rent of $37.50.

It was admitted that Thomas Cope died in possession of the premises. The plaintiff, without objection from defendant, gave in evidence the will of Thomas Cope, the record of the action by himself against Eliza Cope, the judgment, etc., and the sale by the sheriff and deed to himself, and rested his case. The defendant gave in evidence a prior deed of the same premises from Eliza Cope to himself, dated December 13, 1879, and recorded December 15, 1879. The plaintiff alleging that the deed to Zeno Cope was made by Eliza Cope for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the plaintiff in the collection of his debt, offered, in rebuttal, evidence tending to prove such allegations. All the testimony on the part of both parties was directed to this point.

The jury returned a "Verdict for plaintiff, $1,435.79."

On discharging a rule for a new trial the court entered the following order:

"June 28, 1886. The rule for a new trial is discharged, and it is ordered that upon payment of the jury fee, judgment be entered in the above case on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for the land described in the writ of ejectment, and without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring suit for mesne profits."

The assignments of error were as follows:

1. The plaintiff's evidence disclosing no title in him, the learned judge erred in the following ruling as quoted from the bill of exceptions. Plaintiff offered to show: "That before the deed from Eliza Cope to her son Zeno Cope had been delivered, the grantor was indebted on thirteen promissory notes aggregating $1,400; that said notes had been placed in the hands of a collection agency for collection, and Mrs. Cope had been notified."

Objected to. Objection overruled. Exception for defendant.

2. The learned judge erred in the following ruling as quoted from the bill of exceptions: "Plaintiff offered to show that the plaintiff went to see Mrs. Cope with reference to the notes, when she said she would convey away the property—before any deed was made."

Objected to. Objection overruled. Exception for defendant.

3. The jury having given a verdict for plaintiff for $1,435.79, the learned court erred in making the following order: (quoting the order of June 28, 1886.)

4. The record under which alone the plaintiff below claimed title, showed a sale of a life estate without the preliminary order required by law; the whole proceeding was therefore a nullity, and the judgment should have been for the defendant.

Messrs. Henry Budd, Robert Ingram, and F. Carroll Brewster, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles F. Corson, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The first and second assignments of error are not well taken. As the cause was tried the only controverted question of fact was whether Eliza Cope conveyed the land to Zeno Cope with intent to defraud the plaintiff, who was her creditor. It was competent to prove the declarations of both of them tending to establish such purpose; and if the jury believed the testimony, they could hardly have avoided finding that the deed was executed for that purpose.

The defendant did not deny the validity of the plaintiff's title on any other ground than that his deed was prior to the judgment which was the foundation of the sheriff's sale. He did not attempt to defeat recovery for any cause, save that his deed was older than the judgment, and that he was a bona fide purchaser. If he believed that the plaintiff's title was fatally defective, he should have objected to its admission in evidence, or prayed instruction that the plaintiff's evidence did not entitle him to recover. Had he done so, and there was a defect, the plaintiff might have adduced other evidence. But be that as it may, he cannot object to a title here which he did not controvert in the court below, and the fourth assignment will not be considered.

The plaintiff's recovery depended on his satisfying the jury that the defendant's deed was void as against the purchase at sheriff's sale. It is obvious that the jury heard little, if anything, besides the dispute about the alleged scheme to prevent collection of the plaintiff's debt owing by Mrs. Cope, which amounted to $1,435.79. They rendered "Verdict for plaintiff, $1,435.79." Nothing but nominal damages was warranted by any claim or testimony in the cause. That the verdict is good for the land described in the writ or declaration is clear. Had there been claim and proof of mesne profits, judgment could have been entered on the verdict as rendered. We are of opinion that the court properly entered judgment for the land, which implies amendment of the verdict by striking off "$1,435.79," as surplusage. The words "without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring suit for mesne profits" are not prejudicial to the defendant's rights, for it does not appear that mesne profits were claimed, proved or recovered in the trial of the ejectment.

Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL of Mary SCHULTZ et al.

RUFFING'S ESTATE

Upon appeal from a decree of the orphans' court, the record must be so shown in the appellant's paper book as to give the supreme court intelligent information of the facts on which the court below acted, or the decree will be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

(Decided May 2, 1887.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Schuylkill County, confirming the appraisement of a decedent's real estate and setting aside the said real estate to his widow. Affirmed.

The paper book for the appellants contained the names of the parties and nature of the proceedings; a history of the case; the decree made; the assignments of error; and an argument for appellants, but not the record.

The history of the case was as follows:

John Ruffing was a resident of Tamaqua, Schuylkill County; he owned a house and lot of ground in Tamaqua, but no personal property, at the time of his death. He died March 28, 1875, intestate, leaving two children Mary Schultz and Eve Close, and Mary his widow, the appellee.

The appellee was married in December, 1877, to one John Homan, her present husband, with whom she is still living. During her widowhood she did not take out letters of administration nor claim the benefits of the exemption. On March 6, 1885, the appellee took out letters of administration on the estate of her late husband; and appraisers were appointed by herself to value and appraise said real estate which she selected under a claim of exemption. On June 1, 1885, the appraisers filed what purported to be their report appraising said real estate at the sum of $200. On June 22, 1885, exceptions were filed on behalf of the heirs, Mary Schultz and Eve Close, to the confirmation of this report. On November 23, 1885, the court overruled the exceptions and confirmed the appraisement absolutely, from which ruling Mary Schultz and Eve Close, the exceptants, appeal from said decree.

This appellee has laid by from the time of Ruffing's death, March 28, 1875, until May 23, 1885, making upwards of ten years' time, without administering on this estate or taking any steps towards claiming exemption.

On June 1, 1885, a paper purporting to be an appraisement and an election by her to take this house and lot under the Act of 1851, as widow of John Ruffing, deceased, in the name of Mary Homan, was filed, and her claim was not presented to court until June 1, 1885, which was confirmed and made absolute November 23, 1885.

We have no rule of court regulating proceedings under either the Act of April 9, 1849, or the Act of April 14, 1851; these Acts are in pari materia. The practice is generally, under the Act of 1851, that notice of the claim must be given to the executor or administrator to have property appraised to the value of $300.

This appellee says she was married in December, 1877, to Jacob Homan, her present husband; she never took out letters of administration until May 6, 1885; neither Mary Schultz nor Eve Close had notice of the time and place of appraisment; it was a secret matter to them, and the property was appraised to her at a price greatly below its value, to wit: $200.

These appellants claim that they were entitled to notice of the time and place of holding the appraisement, and in this respect the appraisement was invalid and void. The appellants claim that the appraisement was not made according to law and that they are not bound by it. These appellants claim that the appellee, having remarried before she made her claim, waived all right to exemption, if she had any; that she was bound to make her claim in a reasonable time, which she has not done; that upon her remarrying she ceased to be Ruffing's widow, and not entitled to exemption as the widow of Ruffing; that there was such laches on her part, from the time of death of Ruffing, her first husband, until she took out letters, as forfeits her claim to exemption, if there was nothing else, and the confirmation by the court could not aid such void act, and this court should set it aside.

The decree and the assignments of error sufficiently appear from this history of the case.

Per Curiam:

This record, as shown in the paper book submitted, gives us no intelligible information of the facts on which the court acted. There is nothing shown to convict the court of any error in making the decree; therefore,

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

Catharine KELLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PENNSYLVANIA R. R. Co.

One who attempts to cross a railroad track in plain sight of a near approaching engine is guilty of contributory negligence.

(Decided April 11, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 163, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action of trespass on the case for negligence. Affirmed.

The evidence tended to establish the following facts:

The defendant operated a railroad in Philadelphia, along Lehigh Avenue, which is about 150 feet wide, crossing Cedar Street, a much frequented thoroughfare, on which is a line of street cars, at right angles. After dark on the night of February 20, 1886, Patrick Kelley was walking north on Cedar Street and started to cross Lancaster Avenue. In crossing the railroad track he was struck by the north part of an engine backing eastward along Lancaster Avenue, was thrown to the side of the track and killed. This suit was brought by his widow.

The engine was going faster than a horse trots, and was not checked at the crossing. There was no gate or stationary flagman at this crossing. Upon the engine were two flagmen for flagging crossings, one up and the other down the track, but they did not get off to signal the crossing as they had done before on special occasions. The engine bell was rung for two squares before reaching Cedar Street, and a head light in front and lights on the rear of the engine were burning. The whistle was not blown until Kelley started to cross.

A witness called by the plaintiff testified that he was going along the west side of Cedar Street in the same direction as Kelley, saw the light on the engine, heard the bell and waited for the engine to pass.

The engine was fourteen or fifteen yards away when Kelley attempted to cross the street. There was nothing to prevent him from seeing the locomotive, which was plainly visible from the sidewalk for the distance of a square. Another witness who was on Lehigh Avenue one square west of Cedar Street, heard the bell and saw the light as the locomotive approached.

The court entered a compulsory nonsuit and afterwards dismissed a motion to take it off, which was assigned as error.

Messrs. Crawford & Dallas, for plaintiff in error:

What signals, whether a whistle or flagman, are necessary is a question of fact for the jury. Pa. R. R. Co. v. Coon, 2 Cent. Rep. 323, 111 Pa. 430.

If a flagman were not necessary, yet if one be employed or used there before, and there be none at the time, the defendant is liable.

St. Louis etc. R. R. Co. v. Dunn, 78 Ill. 197, 199.

If a flagman would have prevented the injury and one be not there, although other less efficient signals, as the ringing of a bell, were used, the defendant is liable.

Kinney v. Crocker, 18 Wis. 81, 82; Kissenger v. New York etc. R. R. Co. 56 N. Y. 543.

Backing an engine requires great care.

Phila. etc. R. R. Co. v. Anderson, 94 Pa. 351.

The absence of signals before used imparts a sense of security and relieves what would otherwise be contributory negligence.

Pa. R. R. Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 72.

The decedent is presumed to have used due care, and the question is for the jury.

Schum v. Pa. R. R. Co. 107 Pa. 11, 14; Detroit etc. R. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 118–124; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Coon, 2 Cent. Rep. 323, 111 Pa. 431–439.

Mr. George Tucker Bispham, for defendant in error:

The case is wholly different from Pa. R. R. Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 72. In that case Ogier was placed, by the failure to blow the whistle, in a position of peril where he was suddenly called upon to decide what course should be pursued. The court below said: "From the position in which he was placed, when he first could have seen the approach of the train, it is a reasonable conclusion to draw that he was in peril and must have acted upon impulse rather than from judgment."

It is vain for the plaintiff to rely upon the presumption of law that the decedent did his duty, when the evidence of the plaintiff shows that the decedent, in spite of what his eyes and ears told him, walked directly in front of a moving locomotive.

Carroll v. P. R. R. 12 W. N. C. 348.

It is the imperative duty of the traveler to stop, look and listen for approaching trains before attempting to pass over; if he neglects this legal duty, or knowingly attempts to cross in front of a rapidly moving train, he takes his life in his own hands and assumes the risk of personal injury.

Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Brandtmaier, 5 Cent. Rep. 144, 113 Pa. 616.

Per Curiam:

The evidence of the plaintiff showed so clearly that her husband was guilty of contributory negligence, in attempting to cross the track in plain sight of the moving engine, that the court committed no error in not submitting the case to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

John A. CODDING, Plff. in Err.,
v.
BRADFORD COUNTY.

1. Under the Act of March 31, 1860, and the local Act of May 1, 1861, a county to which the latter Act applies is liable to a justice of the peace for all the costs, except those of prosecutor and defendant, of a criminal proceeding against a defendant who pleads guilty before the justice to a felony, is sentenced by him and is discharged without payment of costs.
2. The Act of 1861 provides that the sentence by the justice shall have the full force and effect of a sentence pronounced by the court of quarter sessions. Unless the county is liable for the costs when the conviction is before a justice, the sentence in one form has not the same force and effect as in the other.

(Argued March 16. Decided April 11, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 337, E.D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxon, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Bradford County, to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a case stated. Reversed.

The facts as set forth in the case stated were these:

The plaintiff was a justice of the peace in, and for Bradford County, Pennsylvania, residing at Towanda Borough in said County, duly commissioned and qualified.

On January 6, 1886, he presented to the commissioners of said County a transcript of a criminal proceeding had before him (attached to and made a part of the case stated) showing a bill of costs, itemized as follows, viz.:

Docket empty,	$ 20
Complaint,	40
Warrant,	40
Commitment,	40
Subpenas,	60
Hearing,	40
Recognizances,	1 00
Continuance,	10
Conviction,	50
Discharge,	25
Transcript,	40

making a total, justice's costs,........$4 65

—and showing a bill of constable's costs as follows, viz.:

Const. Dimock,........................$2 48

The charge for "subpenas 60," was for one subpena on the part of the Commonwealth, 30 cents, and one subpena on the part of the defendant, 30 cents.

These costs were demanded of the said commissioners on the 6th day of January, 1886, and Matt Merritt, the defendant in the criminal proceeding, was discharged from the county jail on December 26, 1885, by direction of the plaintiff to the jailer of the county.

If in the opinion of the court the County of Bradford was liable for the costs of the justice under the foregoing facts, or for any of the items of the said costs, and not liable for other items, then judgment was to be entered for the whole amount of said costs, or for such part thereof as in the opinion of the court the said county was liable for, with costs.

If in the opinion of the court there was no liability on the part of the defendant for all or any portion of the said costs, then judgment was to be entered for the defendant.

Either party was to have the right of appeal, or writ of error to the supreme court.

The transcript to which reference was made in the case stated was as follows, excluding the above bill of costs which was on the margin of the transcript:

"Commonwealth of Pennsylvania—Bradford County, ss.

Commonwealth } vs. }
Matt Merritt. }

Warrant issued November 21, 1885, to Dimock, Police, on complaint upon oath of F. F. Lyon, that on the 21st day of November, 1885, and at other times within two years, at the County of Bradford and State of Pennsylvania, one Matt Merritt did feloniously steal, take and carry away 400 lbs. of coal, of the value of $1, the property of the Towanda Coal Company. November 23, 1885, defendent brought up, and the complaint being read aloud in his hearing he pleaded "Guilty." Hearing continued to November 25, 1885. And now, November 25, 1885, parties appear and said Matt Merritt is convicted of larceny as set forth in said complaint; whereupon, he is sentenced to pay a fine of $1 and costs of prosecution, to restore the goods stolen, or the value thereof to the owner, if not already done, and to undergo an imprisonment in the county jail thirty days, and to stand committed until this sentence is complied with."

The transcript was duly certified by the justice of the peace.

The court below gave judgment for the defendant, and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. James H. Codding and John W. Codding, for plaintiff in error:

The proceedings before the justice were under the Act of May 1, 1862, P. L. 682, and its Supplements of April 5, 1862, P. L. 274 and February 14, 1867, P. L. 197. The claim is based on the second section of the first mentioned Act, and also the Act of May 11, 1874, P. L. 132.

The said second section recites that the justice shall proceed to pass sentence upon the defendant, "Which sentence shall have the full force and effect of a sentence pronounced by the court of quarter sessions, in like cases."

This force and effect as to costs had its entire interpretation in the sixty-fourth section of the Criminal Procedure Act, March 31, 1860, until the passage of the Act of May 11, 1874. This provides, P. L. 132, "And in all cases of conviction of any felony, all costs shall be paid forthwith by the county, unless the party convicted shall pay the same."

The Act of 1861 creates a new jurisdiction, intended to relieve the work of the courts of quarter sessions, and by its phraseology of "full force and effect," affords a reasonable deduction as to payment of costs. Its juries, when summoned, are to have the same jurisdiction and control over the payment of costs as in the trial of the same offenses in the court of quarter sessions.

Sec. 7.

And the proviso, excluding the County's liability for either the prosecutor's or the defendant's bill of costs, operates to confirm it as to the costs of the justice and constable.

Mr. John N. Califf, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff in error rests his claim upon section 2 of the special Act of May 1, 1861, P. L. 682, and its Supplement of April 5, 1862, P. L. 274, extended to Bradford County by the Act of February 14, 1867, P. L. 197; and upon the general Act of May 11, 1874, P. L. 132.

The charge against the defendant in the proceedings before the justice was a felony. The defendant pleaded "Guilty," and the justice proceeded to pass sentence; "Which sentence shall have the full force and effect of a sentence pronounced by the court of quarter sessions in like cases." Since the passage of the general Act of May 11, 1874, such a sentence has no effect whatsoever so far as regards the liability of the county for costs. The liability of the County in cases of felony, under the Act of 1874, is forthwith upon conviction, unless the party convicted shall pay the same.

The full force and effect given to the sentence of the justice by the Act of 1861, evidently relates to the validity of such sentence as against the defendant, making its enforcement lawful and his confinement under it a legal and not a false imprisonment.

The Act contains no express provision as to costs in proceedings under section 2, and it is only by inference that it is sought to extend it to the payment of costs. The court will not impute to the Legislature an intent to make the county liable for costs where it is not so expressed in the Act.

County of York v. Crafton, 100 Pa. 619.

Liability for costs on the part of the county must rest upon a statute obliging the county to pay; a mere deduction from its phraseology will not support an action against a county.

Crawford Co. v. Barr, 92 Pa. 359.

The construction of section 7 of the Act of 1861 is not involved in this case, as the proceedings before the justice were under section 2. But under section 7 the County can only become liable for the costs of the officer and the pay of the jurors when upon acquittal in cases of misdemeanor the jury so imposes the costs. The Act of May 11, 1874, was plainly intended not to create a new liability on the part of the county, but to alter the time when the county should pay in cases of felony where by the Act of March 31, 1860, the county was previously liable.

County of York v. Crafton, 100 Pa. 619.

The Act of 1860 relates only to costs accruing on bills of indictment in the court of oyer and terminer and quarter sessions, and does not include cases of convictions before justices.

Crawford Co. v. Barr, 92 Pa. 359.

The Act of 1874 is a general law; that of 1861 and its supplements are special Acts. Later statutes which are general do not repeal an earlier one which is particular.

Bounty Accounts, 70 Pa. 96.

Rarely, if ever, does a case arise where it can justly be held that a general statute repeals a local statute by mere implication.

Malloy v. Reinhard, 6 Cent. Rep. 126.

The attempt by the plaintiff in error to engraft, by an unwarranted implication, part of a general Act upon one that is purely local cannot be successful.

Kilgore v. Commonwealth, 94 Pa. 495.

Unless, therefore, the claim of the plaintiff in error can be sustained under the special Act of 1861, he cannot successfully invoke the aid of the general Act of 1874 to help it out. At any rate the County is not liable for the cost of the defendant's subpena, thirty cents.

Commonwealth v. Evans, 1 Kulp, 426; Wayne Co. v. Waller, 90 Pa. 99.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

It has long been the policy of the Commonwealth not to discourage good faith criminal prosecutions, nor to oppress innocent persons accused of crime, nor to make it the pecuniary advantage of magistrates to hold an accused person for trial. The Act of 1791 provides that when a person charged with crime is brought before a magistrate, and it appears that the charge is unfounded, upon his discharge the costs shall be paid by the city or county.

The provisions of the Act of 1860, so far as they relate to costs, are mainly re-enactments of prior statutes. Full power is given to the jury, to determine by their verdict in all misdemeanors, in case of acquittal, whether the prosecutor or defendant or county shall pay the costs, or whether the prosecutor and defendant shall pay the costs in certain proportions; "And in all cases of conviction of any crime, all costs shall be paid by the party convicted, but where such party shall have been discharged according to law, without payment of costs, the costs of prosecution shall be paid by the county." In all these cases the direction as to costs relate to convictions on bills of indictment.

By the local Act of 1861, in force in many counties, jurisdiction is conferred upon justices of the peace, if the accused person shall plead guilty or demand trial before the justice, for determination of certain indictable offenses defined in the Act of 1860. When the accused person denies the charge and demands jury trial, such trial is conducted on similar principles as trials in the court of quarter sessions; "and the jury shall have the same jurisdiction and control over the payment of costs; Provided, That the county shall in no case be liable for either the prosecutor's or the defendant's bill of costs." With a single exception, the jury in one court have the same power as the jury in the other.

When the accused person pleads guilty, or the jury find him guilty, the justice shall pass sentence upon him, which shall have the full force and effect of a sentence pronounced in the court of quarter sessions, in like cases, except that imprisonment shall only be in the jail of the proper county. The result of the sentence is the same when pronounced on a plea of guilty, as when on a verdict of guilty, except that in one case certain costs have no existence which are made in the other.

All the cases within the Act of 1861, are triable on indictment in the court of quarter sessions under the Act of 1860. Upon conviction of a person, of felony, in that court, if he fail to pay the costs, the county is liable therefor; and unless the county is so liable when such conviction is before a justice, the sentence in one forum has not the same force and effect as in the other. In a trial before the justice of the peace, the exception, that in no case shall the county pay the prosecutor's or defendant's bill, evidences an intendment that other costs shall be paid as if the trial were in any other court having jurisdiction.

In no case is the county liable for costs, unless made so by statute. Crawford Co. v. Barr, 92 Pa. 359.

That decision is cited by the defendant as applicable to the pending question. But there the claim was by a justice of the peace for his costs accrued in a summary conviction, under the Act of March 24, 1878, P. L. 125.

An offense under that statute is not indictable, and it is not a crime within the meaning of the word as used in the Act of 1860; nor is it within the operation of any statute which imposes payment of costs upon the county. All the offenses triable under the Act of 1861 are indictable; and when such offenses are tried on indictment, in case of conviction of the defendant and his legal discharge without payment of costs, the county shall pay the costs of prosecution. The offenses remain the same, the result of conviction is the same, except the statutory limit as to place of imprisonment, and the exemption of the county from payment of the bills of costs, when the conviction is before a justice of the peace. A change of tribunal, and a lawful conviction without the formality of indictment, the sentence to have like force and effect as if the proceeding were in the court of quarter sessions, do not relieve the county from liability for costs imposed where a convicted party shall have been discharged according to law, without payment of costs. The statute making the county liable is not repealed by implication. Although conviction may be without indictment, the statute in so providing makes no change in the law relating to the offenses and procedure, other than is expressed.

The defendant's bill is not payable by the County, and the fees for his subpena are included in his bill. This is recognized in section 63 of the Act of 1860, relating to criminal procedure, and in section 1 of the Act of 1873. The defendant insists that it is not liable for the cost of subpena, thirty cents, which was given to the party who was charged with the larceny; and that sum must be deducted from the claim.

Judgment reversed; and judgment is now entered for the plaintiff for $4.35, with costs, on the case stated.

William J. BARTON, Pltf. in Err.,
v.
Jonathan R. JONES et al.

Plaintiff, an employee of the contractors for putting up the iron work in the construction of a building, in the performance of his duties rode on a bundle of the iron beams as they were carried up the outside of the wall by an engine at the top, for the time under the control of his employers, and having been carried over the top of the wall, was injured while being lowered by the engine to the floor of an upper story. Plaintiff thereupon sued his employers for damages, alleging that the engine was at the time, to the knowledge of his employers, operated by a new, inexperienced, and incompetent engineer without notice to or knowledge of plaintiff, and that the injury resulted from the negligence of such engineer. Held, on the evidence, that plaintiff was properly nonsuited.

(Decided April 4, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 187, E. D.

Error to the Common Pleas, No. 4 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit in an action to recover damages for injuries to the person, alleged to have been caused by negligence. Affirmed.

This action was brought by William J. Barton, against Jonathan R. Jones and Samuel T. Benner, trading as Jones & Benner, to recover damages for injuries received by a fall, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants and their servants.

The following facts appeared before the court at the trial:

Jones & Benner were contractors for putting up the iron structure of the public buildings in Philadelphia. Barton was in their employ, as a laborer whose duty required him to prepare large iron beams, from twenty to twenty-five feet long, for hoisting, by piling them together and fastening them by a chain, so that a wire and hook, dropped from an overhead engine called a traveler, which ran on a tramway located above the building, at a height of 150 feet from the ground, could be thereto attached. When the pile had been attached to the traveler, he would stand on the edge of the pile while it was being raised, so that he could push it away from the marble face of the building, could signal the engineer as to the direction in, and the place to which, the pile was to be carried, and could, when it reached its destination, detach it from the wire.

Barton had been engaged in this work at the public buildings for several years. The traveler was inclosed so that a man on the ground could not know who was in it. The engineer was guided in his movements by signals (wavings of the hand) given by the man who stood on the iron which was hoisted.

These travelers were constructed differently from an ordinary yard, stationary or locomotive engine, having much additional and complicated machinery. They required special experience on the part of those who ran them. There were three of them at the building, two being at the height of 150 feet from the ground, one on the west, and the other on the east side of the building. These two were in constant use at the time of Barton's accident, and were run by engineers who had had charge of them for several years, and who were well known to Barton and to the other employees who had worked with them for a considerable time.

There was a third traveler on the north side, which was only occasionally used, and never, so far as the testimony shows, in hoisting anything but stone. It was at a comparatively low elevation, being about ninety feet from the ground. Its regular engineer had died, and for perhaps a month it had been run, at infrequent intervals, by a man named McGraw, whose regular employment was the running of a stationary engine in the yard. McGraw had come to the buildings in the spring of 1882, and had received a few lessons in running this lower traveler. He appears not to have run either of the upper travelers prior to the accident.

The three travelers and the yard engine were all owned by Struthers & Son, who were the contractors for erecting the marble, and who used them for their purposes. The various engineers were employed by them.

The other contractors at the building, including Jones & Benner, were in the habit of hiring from Struthers & Son, as work of hoisting was to be done, one or the other of the three travelers. When thus hired the engineer and traveler were under the control and direction of such contractor, who directed their movements. Struthers & Son assumed no control or direction while the hiring continued.

Richard McCarthy was the general foreman of Jones & Benner, who had control of their work at the buildings and gave all the directions to the employees of Jones & Benner. The latter were rarely at the building. It seems that when the traveler was needed, he (McCarthy) hired it from Struthers & Son.

On November 7, 1882, he hired the west traveler. Dupelle was absent from his work that day and McGraw, for the first time, had been put in charge of it. Barton swore that he was ignorant of the fact; that he supposed Dupelle was in charge; and that he would not have gone upon the pile had he known otherwise. The foreman of Struthers & Son, one Lawrence, told McCarthy of the change of engineers, and that it would be necessary for his men to be careful. The latter, however, hired the traveler, and gave no warning to Barton, whom he ordered to go upon the pile or bundle of iron beams.

Barton and one Owens, as they had often done before, mounted upon opposite ends of the bundle of iron beams, which weighed about three tons, and ascended in safety to the top of the wall, guiding the load so that it did not strike the timbers of the trestle and the marble work of the building in its ascent. On arriving at the top of the third floor wall, the engine was run in over the wall, preparatory to lowering the iron to the floor of that story. Upon the north or interior wall of the room into which the iron was to be lowered was a common bricklayers' scaffold, composed of pine planks extending about fifteen feet in height from the floor of the room. Plaintiff gave a signal to the engineer to lower, which was obeyed. Plaintiff either miscalculated the space necessary to permit the iron to pass or Owens, who was on the end nearest to the scaffold, neglected to guide it, for six inches of the end lodged for a moment upon the scaffold. Owens stepped off. The equilibrium was destroyed, and plaintiff slid from the lower end and fell to the floor below, causing the injuries for which this suit was brought.

Plaintiff at the trial claimed that McGraw was incompetent, that the traveler was managed in a bungling and inexperienced manner, and was lowered too rapidly; and evidence was given to prove such contention. At the close of plaintiff's case a nonsuit was ordered, which the court in banc subsequently refused to take off and plaintiff took this writ, assigning such action of the court as error.

Per Curiam:

This was one of those unfortunate accidents that are liable to occur in the erection of large buildings. The zeal and ability with which the cause was argued by the counsel for the plaintiff has caused us to examine the evidence with great care. We think it is insufficient to send the case to the jury. It follows that there was no error in ordering a compulsory nonsuit and in refusing to take it off.

Judgment affirmed.

William FAIRCHILD, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Henry S. FAIRCHILD.

A demise of all the coal under the surface of a specified piece of land is a sale of the coal.

(Argued April 15. Decided April 25. 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 413, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, to review a judgment for the defendant in a case stated in an amicable action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The case stated was as follows:

Now, January 5, 1887, it is agreed that an amicable action of trespass on the case in assumpsit in the above entitled cause be entered in said court, and the following facts are agreed upon as a case stated for the opinion of the court in the nature of a special verdict, either party reserving the right to a writ of error to the judgment of said court.

In the months of July and August, 1873, John Fairchild, late of said county, being seised in fee in possession of some fifty acres of coal land situate therein, executed to the Susquehanna Coal Company, a so-called lease of the coal in and under said land, the same being duly recorded in the recorder's office of said county, and a copy of which is hereto attached and made part of this case, the same being marked "exhibit A."

Shortly thereafter, and during the lifetime of the said John Fairchild, the said company, by means of shafts and slopes opening upon the surface of adjoining lands and connected with tunnels or subterraneous passages, entered upon and took possession of the veins and measures of anthracite coal under said fifty acres, and by means of gangways, headings, breasts or chambers, leading from said tunnels, slopes and shafts, and cut and driven into said veins and measures, began and have since continued, and are now continuing the mining, quarrying, removing, transporting, shipping and selling of the anthracite coal under the land described in said so-called lease.

On September 17, 1879, the said John Fairchild died intestate, seised of said land, subject to said so-called lease, leaving to survive him a widow, Martha Fairchild, and by her five children and heirs at law—all of full age, namely: Anna E. Fairchild, intermarried with William Fairchild, the plaintiff above named; Martha L. Fairchild intermarried with O. F. Ferris; John M. Fairchild, Henry S. Fairchild, the defendant above named, all of said county, and Alfred Fairchild, of the State of Michigan.

On October 16, 1879, letters of administration on the estate of said John Fairchild were granted by the register of said county, to the said John M. Fairchild and the said Henry S. Fairchild, defendant, who on April 14, 1884, filed a partial account of their administration, which was confirmed by the orphans' court of said county and distribution had thereon in said last named court; but said administrators have not yet filed a final account, and are unable so to do at this time by reason of certain uncollected debts due their estate for money loaned by their decedent.

On January 20, 1883, the said Anna E. Fairchild died intestate, leaving to survive her a husband, Willaim Fairchild, the above named plaintiff, and by him four children and heirs at law, namely: Monroe Fairchild, of full age and W. H. Fairchild, Edna L. Fairchild, and Edith L. Fairchild, then and now minors, having for their guardian O. F. Ferris, duly appointed by the orphans' court of said county. William Fairchild, the plaintiff, is the administrator of the estate of said Anna E. Fairchild, and has not yet filed or settled an account of his administration.

On January 31, 1883, the said Martha Fairchild, surviving widow of said John Fairchild, died intestate, leaving to survive her children and grandchildren heirs at law, namely: the said John M. Fairchild, Henry S. Fairchild, Alfred Fairchild and Martha L. Ferris, children, and the said Monroe Fairchild, W. H. Fairchild, Edna L. Fairchild and Edith L. Fairchild, grandchildren, being children of a deceased daughter, the said Anna E. Fairchild. Samuel Line of said county, is the administrator of the estate of said Martha Fairchild, deceased.

On account of coal mined, removed, shipped and sold as aforesaid by the said, the Susquehanna Coal Company under said so-called lease during the four periods following, to wit: first, during the lifetime of the said John Fairchild; second, during the period from the date of his death to January, 1883, the date of the deaths of said Anna E. and Martha Fairchild, and third, from January, 1883, to January, 1885, and fourth, from January, 1885, to the present time, the said company has paid as so-called rents or royalties certain moneys as follows: for the first period it paid the said John Fairchild for his own use, and for the second, third and fourth periods it paid to the said Henry S. Fairchild, defendant, as agent or trustee for the use of the parties who should legally be thereunto entitled; and the said Henry S. Fairchild paid over said moneys received during said second and third periods as follows: during said second period he paid one third to the said Martha Fairchild, widow, and to himself and said Anna E. Fairchild, Martha L. Ferris, John M. Fairchild and Alfred Fairchild each one fifth of two thirds; and during said third period he paid one fifth each to himself and said Martha L., John M. and Alfred, two thirds of one fifth to said William Fairchild, plaintiff, and one third of one fifth to the four children of said Anna E. Fairchild in equal proportions, of whom three were represented by their said guardian, O. F. Ferris.

During said fourth period the amount of said so-called rents or royalties paid by said company and received by said Henry S. Fairchild, defendant, for the uses aforesaid is, after deducting certain expenses paid for surveying, the sum of $17,360.42, of which no part has ever been paid to the plaintiff, William Fairchild or to any of the children of said Anna E. Fairchild or their guardian.

The said Henry S. Fairchild, defendant, and John M. Fairchild, administrators as aforesaid, have never accounted as administrators for any of the so-called rents or royalties received by the defendant as aforesaid. There are no unpaid debts against either of the estates of said John Fairchild, Anna E. Fairchild or Martha Fairchild, and each died solvent, irrespective of any interest in said coal land—so-called lease or royalties.

If, under the facts as above stated, the court be of the opinion that said sum of $17,360.42 is, in contemplation of law, to be regarded as rent, or of the nature thereof, accruing during the fourth period, supra, and incident to and issuing out of a coal estate, in the land described in said so-called lease, remaining in said John Fairchild at the time of his death, and descending to his heirs at law subject to the interest of his said surviving widow, Martha Fairchild, under the intestate laws of this Commonwealth, and that on the death of the said Anna E. Fairchild her surviving husband, the plaintiff, became entitled as tenant by the curtesy to the undivided one fifth of said coal estate subject to the interest of said Martha Fairchild, surviving widow, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $3,472.08. But if the court be of the opinion that the plaintiff, as surviving husband aforesaid, by reason of said Martha Fairchild's survivorship after the death of said Anna E. Fairchild, became entitled as tenant by the curtesy to only an undivided one fifth of an undivided two thirds of said coal estate, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $2,314.72.

If, however, the court be of the opinion that said sum of $17,360.42 is, in law, to be regarded as purchase money or in the nature thereof of real estate sold by the said John Fairchild in his lifetime, and collectible by his said administrators, to be by them accounted for as such to the orphans' court and distributed by the latter as personal estate of the said John Fairchild, deceased, to his four surviving children and to the estates of his deceased daughter, Anna E. Fairchild, and of his deceased widow, Martha Fairchild, according to the intestate laws of this Commonwealth, then judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The costs to follow the judgment.

"Exhibit A," to which reference was made in the case stated, was as follows:

This indenture, made the 25th day of July, 1873, between John Fairchild, of the Township of Newport, Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, of the one part, and the Susquehanna Coal Company, of the other part, Witnesseth: that the said John Fairchild, in consideration of the covenants to be kept and the rentals to be paid by the said Susquehanna Coal Company, hath demised, leased and to mine let, and by these presents doth demise, lease and to mine let unto the said Susquehanna Coal Company and their successors and assigns all the anthracite coal in, under and upon all that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the Township of Newport, Luzerne County, aforesaid, bounded and described as follows: Beginning in the line between lots Nos. 2 and 3 of the first tier, first division of lots in said township, at a common corner of the land hereby demised and land now or late of Solomon Fairchild, thence along said line north six and a quarter degrees west sixty-two rods to a corner in the center of the public road; thence along the center of said public road by its several courses and distances to the township line between Hanover and Newport; thence along the said line south seventeen and a quarter degrees east one hundred and twenty-five and four tenths rods to a corner of lands now or late of Solomon Fairchild, and thence along the said land south seventy and a half degrees, west eighty-four and six tenths rods to the place of beginning, being parts of lots Nos. 1 and 2 in the first tier of the first division of lots in the certified Township of Newport, and containing fifty acres one hundred and ten and six tenths perches strict measure. Together with the right to mine, quarry and remove all the coal in, under and upon the said tract of land but without opening thereto or transporting the same upon or across the surface of the said land. To have and to hold the said coal and the mining rights and privileges hereby granted with the appurtenances unto the said Susquehanna Coal Company and their successors and assigns until all the merchantable coal accessible by careful, prudent and skillful working shall be mined out and exhausted.

And the said Susquehanna Coal Company, in consideration of the premises, do hereby for themselves and their successors and assigns covenant and agree to and with the said John Fairchild and his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, in manner as follows, to wit: first, that the rental for all coal mined under this lease shall be at the rate of twenty-five cents per ton of the size and pounds hereinafter specified; second, that for all coal mined and removed during the year ending July 1, 1874, they will pay at the said rate of twenty-five cents per ton; that for the year ending July 1, 1875, and for and during each and every subsequent year during the term, they will mine and remove not less than 12,000 tons of coal, or failing so to do will nevertheless pay for such number of tons, so that the minimum annual rental shall not be less than $3,000; Provided, however, That if during any year such minimum annual rental shall be paid and sufficient coal at the rate aforesaid shall not be mined and removed, the deficit may be mined and removed in any subsequent year of the term; third, that all the rentals under this lease shall be payable quarterly, to wit: on the first day of October, January, April and July in each year; fourth, that under this lease a ton shall consist of 2,240 pounds, and that the rentals aforesaid shall be payable on all coal which will pass over a screen of a half inch mesh. All coal passing through a screen of such dimension shall be regarded as "pea coal," and such coal may be used free of charge for the purpose of driving the machinery by which the said coal is mined and prepared, and shall be free from rental except when such coal shall be actually sent to market, when the rental shall be eight cents per ton, payable quarterly, in addition to the rentals aforesaid; fifth, that the said lessees shall pay all taxes or imposts, United States and local, which shall be assessed upon the coal in place or as it is mined; sixth, that all the mining operations shall be conducted with prudence, skill and care, so that all the coal may be won which can be taken without damage to the mines, and that in all gangways and chambers proper supports and pillars may be so left as to protect as well the surface as the overlying veins of coal; seventh, that the amount of coal mined and removed may be ascertained by reference to the weights returned by transportation companies for coal thus shipped and to the sales books for coal sold on the ground to local buyers, or by keeping an accurate account of the number of cars mined, making proper allowances for slate and dirt, verifying the accuracy of the accounts, if desired, by ascertaining the number of cubic yards of coal mined and removed; eighth, that as well the mines themselves as also the mining, shipping and sales books of the said lessees shall at all proper times be open to the inspection of the lessor and his engineers and agents for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of the mines and the amount of coal mined and removed; and also that the said lessees will furnish from time to time, on the request of the said lessor, maps of the mines, showing their actual condition; ninth, that the said lessees shall and will furnish annually to the said John Fairchild, his heirs and assigns, at the chutes nearest to or most convenient of access for said lessor, his heirs and assigns, twenty-five tons of coal of such sizes as may be desired at the price of $1.50 per ton, upon which coal no royalty shall be charged; tenth, that it is specially understood and agreed that if at any time an installment of rent or any part thereof shall become due and remain unpaid for the space of sixty days, then and in such case the said John Fairchild, his heirs and assigns, having first given to the said lessees, their superintendent or agent, thirty days' notice of his or their intent so to do, may at his or their option declare the term of this lease at an end; and thereupon all rights of the said lessees, their successors or assigns, shall absolutely cease and be determined, and the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, may resume possession of the demised premises with the improvements and appurtenances by legal process, or summarily and without legal process, at his or their option.

And in case a cause of forfeiture by reason of nonpayment of rent shall at any time arise under the aforesaid clause and such cause shall expressly or by implication be waived and the forfeiture be not enforced, the right of forfeiture shall be reserved and be in force whenever and so often as a new cause, by reason of the nonpayment of a future installment for the period aforesaid, shall arise. And it is further agreed by and between the parties aforesaid in manner as follows: that the said lessees, their successors and assigns, shall have the right to open through the surface of the said lands, the coal under which is hereby demised, such air shafts as may be necessary for the ventilation of the mines; provided, however, that they shall be placed at suitable distances from any dwelling house, and shall be made with as little damage as posssible and be properly secured upon the outside.

The instrument was duly executed and acknowledged.

Upon the entry of judgment for the defendant in the court below, the following opinion was delivered by RICE, P. J.:

We are of opinion that the sum of $17,360.42, mentioned in the case stated, is in law to be regarded as purchase money of real estate sold by John Fairchild in his lifetime and collectible by his administrators, to be by them accounted for as such to the orphans' court and distributable by the latter as personal estate of the said John Fairchild, deceased, to his four surviving children and to the estates of his deceased daughter, Anna E. Fairchild, and of his deceased widow, Martha Fairchild, according to the intestate laws of this Commonwealth. Stoughton's App. 88 Pa. 198; Scranton v. Phillips, 94 Pa. 15-22; Sanderson v. Scranton, 105 Pa. 469; Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Cent. Rep. 102; Hope's App. 2 Cent. Rep. 48.

Therefore, pursuant to the stipulations of the case stated, it is ordered that judgment be entered for the defendant.

The assignments of error specified the entry of the judgment.

Messrs. George K. Powell, E. P. & J. V. Darling and S. P. Wolverton, for plaintiff in error:

Neither party to the lease in question thought at the time it was executed that it was a deed, and until the cases of Sanderson v. Scranton, 105 Pa. 469, and Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Cent. Rep. 102, the legal profession, accustomed to drawing such instruments, never for a moment thought that they conveyed the fee of the coal.

The grant of a right to mine coal for so much per ton is a lease.

Offerman v. Starr, 2 Pa. 393; 44 Am. Dec. 211; Greenough's App. 9 Pa. 18.

These instruments of writing have for years been denominated, by the parties to them, as coal leases; they were intended as leases and not as conveyances; the words used in them are proper words and create a leasehold estate, and, technically, are incapable of creating anything else; both lessor and lessee have always supposed them to create such an estate and have invested large amounts of money on the strength of such construction. It is because of these important questions that counsel for plaintiff in error have again brought this question to the attention of the court.

In Greenough's Appeal, 9 Pa. 18, the operative words of the lease were: "May have the privilege of taking coal out of the P. mine, he paying to the respective owners thereof their respective proportions of the sum of twenty-five cents per cubic yard, of the coal so taken out as a rent for the said privilege." The supreme court held that this was a granted right to mine coal for so much per ton, and the redditus was consequently a certain rent, for which a distress might have been made.

In Offerman v. Starr, 2 Pa. 394, the owner passed the right to mine coal at a rent payable on each ton of coal taken out, reserving the right to examine the mine and re-enter on nonpayment of rent or neglect; and it was held that a right to use a mine necessarily implies a right to possess it; and a grant of the use and possession, in consequence of something to be rendered, is exactly what constitutes a lease of the thing to be possessed.

In Griffin v. Fellows, 81* Pa. 114, the words of the lease were: "Grant, demise, let, and to farm let, for 999 years; to have and to hold, the above granted and demised premises, with every power, right, member and appurtenance whatsoever, to the same premises belonging or in anywise appertaining, waters, ways, water courses, mines and minerals." This was held to be a coal lease.

In Miner's Bank v. Heilner, 47 Pa. 452, the question arose whether the rent due under a coal lease was not a prior lien under the Act of April, 1830, relating to mortgages, so that the mortgage of the leasehold would be discharged by a sheriff's sale, under an execution against the lessee. The supreme court said in speaking of this character of leases: "Millions of money are being invested in coal leases and mortgages, for very large sums often incumber them; still they are mere leasehold estates or chattel interests, which may be sold by a constable on an execution of a justice of the peace; and if such a judicial sale should be held to devest mortgages where a $1 rent remains unpaid, it would strike a death blow not only to the best security, but to one of the largest and most productive branches of our industry."

In Turner v. Reynolds, 23 Pa. 199, a son took possession of a coal vein under a parol agreement with his father, who claimed the whole tract on which a large vein was then opened, that he should have a smaller vein if he opened it. A lease was afterwards made by the father to the son and others, by which the lessor "demised, let and to mine let" all the tract of land known as No. 49 (the number of the lot on which the vein was opened) containing 160 acres or thereabouts, "and the coal bed thereon and now opened." Held, that after the lease the son was in possession as tenant and not as owner.

In Moore v. Miller, 8 Pa. 272, it was held that in estimating the language which constitutes a lease, the form of words used is of no consequence; it is not necessary that the term lease should be used. Whatever is equivalent will be equally available if the words assume the form of a license, covenant or agreement, and if the other requisites of a lease are present.

In Gartside v. Outley, 58 Ill. 210, a lease was granted by the Bellville & Illinoistown R. R. Co. to Twist, for an indefinite period, with the permission to take all the coal contained in the said land for the rents therein stipulated, with a clause of forfeiture for noncompliance by the lessee. The court said: "It is insisted that the instrument entered into by the parties is not a lease; that it conveys a higher estate. The counsel does not define the nature of the estate which he insists is created, except to indicate that the grant is in the nature of a 'servitude,' to which the company's land was subjected for an indefinite period. We think the fair construction to be given to that instrument is that it is in the nature of a lease, and creates only the relation of lessor and lessee."

Whatever words are sufficient to explain the intent of the parties, that the one should devest himself of the property and the other come into it for a determinate time, whether they run in the form of a license, covenant or agreement, will, in construction of law, amount to a lease as effectually as if the most proper and technical words were made use of for that purpose.

Watson v O'Hern, 6 Watts, 362.

Mr.* L. H. Bennett, for defendant in error:

This conveyance constituted a sale by John Fairchild, in his lifetime, of his coal estate to the Susquehanna Coal Company.

Kier v. Peterson, 41 Pa. 359; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 244; Stoughton's App. 88 Pa. 198; Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Cent. Rep. 102; Sanderson v. Scranton, 105 Pa. 469.

We are told in the argument for the plaintiff in error that until the cases of Sanderson v. Scranton, and the Delaware etc. R. R. Co. v. Sanderson, supra, the legal profession, accustomed to drawing such instruments, never thought that they conveyed the fee of the coal. This statement is questionable, in view of the action of the profession, in this county at least, in constantly refusing to advise loans on the security of the mortgage of the, so-called, lessor, unless the mortgagee receives, at the same time, an assignment of the royalties, with notice to the persons obligated to the payment of such royalties; and besides the statement in question involves the fault of the legal profession, and not a change in the law.

It is urged that if the present construction be adhered to, parties who suppose they yet hold the legal title of a lessor will find themselves without protection for purchase money, save in the personal covenants of a vendee. The protection which it is assumed has thus been taken from innocent lessors will, in all cases when the necessity for such protection arises, still be found to exist in the real covenants, conditions and clauses of forfeiture, invariably written in the conveyance itself, for the avowed purpose of securing payment of purchase money, and thus appearing of record as notice to everyone. All persons interested in such payments may enforce them against the land, and for that purpose maintain ejectment on such covenants, conditions and clauses.

This principle is enunciated in various cases, of which a few are: Bear v. Whisler, 7 Watts, 144; Hiest v. Baker, and Strauss' App. 49 Pa. 9, 353; Perry v. Scott, 51 Pa. 125; Kensinger v. Smith, 94 Pa. 384.

The rents, or payments, for coal mined and to be mined, under a sale, by a married woman, of such coal, with the right to mine and remove it, are personal property, payable to her executor on her death; and no part thereof belongs to her surviving husband as tenant by the curtesy.

Hope's App. 2 Cent. Rep. 48.

Per Curiam:

That a demise of all the coal under the surface of a specified piece of land is a sale of the coal is now too well fortified by authority to be successfully questioned in Pennsylvania.

The cases affirming this conclusion are cited in the opinion of the learned judge, and fully sustain the judgment he entered on the case stated.

Judgment affirmed.

Alonzo L. JONES, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Maria KROLL.

1. Error in submitting to the jury the construction of a written instrument, may be cured by a verdict in accordance with the construction that the court should have declared in the charge.
2. A lease for no determinate length of time but by which an annual rent is reserved, payable in any aliquot proportions, is a lease for a year.
3. A lease "from the first day of December, 1878, at the rent of $600 per annum, payable monthly when due" with a provision that if the lessee shall continue on the premises "after the termination of the contract, then this contract is to continue in full force for another year, and so on from year to year until legal notice shall be given for a removal," followed by a clause that if the lessee shall continue on the premises "after the termination of the above contract, then he shall have the privilege of staying another five years, at the above fixed rent per annum," is a lease for one year with the option of continuing from year to year for five more years.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 80, E. D.

Error to Common Pleas No. 4. of Philadelphia County to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

Reported below Kroll v. Jones, 1 Pa. C.C. R. 485.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before ARNOLD, J., were these:

On November 11, 1878, Herman Kroll (acting as agent for his wife, Maria Kroll), made and executed with Alonzo L. Jones the following agreement of lease for the premises therein described:

"This agreement witnesseth, That [Herman Kroll, of the City of Philadelphia] doth hereby let unto [Alonzo L. Jones, of the same place, that four story brick house, No. 114, North Sixth Street, for plumbing, gas, and steam fitting business, from the first day of December, 1878] at the rent of [$600] per [annum] payable [monthly when due,] which said rent so reserved, the said lessee agrees to pay regularly as it may fall due, or within five days thereafter; in default of which the lessor may, without notice, re-enter upon and take possession of the premises, or at his option, enter judgment against the lessee, or any subtenants, in any action of ejectment to be brought to recover possession of the premises, without appeal, writ of error, or stay of execution; and for confessing said judgment this shall be the warrant of any person. And the lessee, as a security for the payment of all rent falling due under this lease, hereby grants, bargains and sells, to the lessor, all the goods, household and kitchen furniture of the lessee upon the premises, or to be brought thereon, without any exception; and should the rent at any time be unpaid, or the goods be removed from the premises, the lessor may follow said goods, take possession of them, and for all rent due, sell them at auction on three days' notice, and for all rent not due, hold them in possession in the meantime as a security; the said lessee hereby waiving the benefit of all laws or usages exempting any property from liability for rent, and the lessor not waiving any remedies given by existing laws.

"The premises are not to be underlet, or this lease transferred, without the lessor's consent, under penalty of instant forfeiture and right of re-entry for such breach of this lease; and on the expiration of this lease the property is to be surrendered in as good order as it now is, reasonable wear and tear alone excepted.

"It is hereby further agreed that if the above named [Alonzo L. Jones] should continue on the above described premises after the termination of the above contract, then this contract is to continue in full force for another year and so on, from year to year until legal notice shall be given for a removal.

"It is hereby understood and agreed to that if the above named [Alonzo L. Jones] should continue on the above described premises after the termination of the above contract, then he shall have the privilege of staying there for another five years at the above fixed rent per annum.

"In witness whereof, the said [Herman Kroll] and [Alonzo L. Jones] have hereunto set their hands and seals, the [11th] day of [November, 1878."]

The portions in brackets constitute the written parts of the lease.

The lessee entered and continued in possession thereafter. On August 29, 1884, he was served by Mrs. Kroll (her husband having died meanwhile) with a notice to quit on December 1, 1884. He disregarded the notice and on January 6, 1885, was summoned before Magistrate Becker in proceedings by Mrs. Kroll for recovery of possession under the Act of 1863.

After hearing, the magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff. An appeal was taken from the judgment to the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4. The plaintiff filed a narr. in ejectment and the defendant pleaded not guilty.

At the close of the plaintiff's case below, counsel for defendant below moved the court to enter a nonsuit, which motion the court overruled.

The court then admitted the evidence of the defendant below in explanation of the making of the lease and of the term intended to be agreed upon by him. His statements were, in turn, contradicted by the plaintiff below; and after the testimony of these two witnesses, the court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"The first clause of the lease is: If Jones continues after the expiration of the term, he may continue for another year, and so on from year to year. This shows a yearly letting. Then by another clause he has the privilege of staying another five years. What, then, is the extreme length of his term and option? If the first term was for one year, with the privilege of another five years, he has had that. If the lease was not for one year, but for five years, with the privilege of five years more, he has been prematurely warned out. Because of ambiguity in the lease I have admitted testimony to explain it. Jones says he hired the place for five years, and would not have taken it unless for five years, with the privilege of five years more. If you find that the term was for one year, with the privilege of five years, you will find for the plaintiff. If you find that the term was for five years, with the privilege of another five years, then this suit is premature, and you will find for the defendant. I leave it to you to say, upon the lease and the extraneous evidence, what the term was, whether of one year, with the privilege of another five years, or five years, with the privilege of another five years."

The defendant submitted the following points:

1. The lease given in evidence by the plaintiff must be so construed as to make a term of five years from the date thereof, with the privilege to the defendant of continuing as a tenant upon the premises therein described, "for another five years;" and the plaintiff has no cause of action. The verdict must, therefore, be for the defendant.

2. In the granting clause of the lease, material words defining the term of the demise appear to have been omitted; and the lease must be construed as if such words were inserted, and so as to give effect to the subsequent clause, which gives to the defendant "the privilege of staying there for another five years." The verdict, upon such construction, must be for the defendant.

3. The grant or demise of the term "from the first day of December, 1878, at the rent of $600 per annum," is without limitation or termination; and the same must be read and construed in connection with the clause which provides for the privilege of another five years; and the verdict must be for the defendant.

4. The lease must be construed in favor of the grantee or lessee and against the grantor or lessor, and so as to give effect to every beneficial intendment in favor of the lessee. It must, therefore, be construed as creating a term of ten years; and the jury must find a verdict for the defendant.

5. Upon any construction of the said lease, the defendant was entitled to have and maintain possession thereunder for a term at least of seven years. The notice to quit on the first of December, 1884, and proceedings upon the same by the plaintiff, were premature, irregular and void; and the verdict must be for the defendant.

These points the court affirmed or refused, according as they were answered in the general charge.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff.

Upon discharging a rule for a new trial, ARNOLD, J., delivered the following opinion:

The plaintiff leased a house to the defendant, "from the first day of December, 1878, at the rent of $600 per annum, payable monthly." It was agreed that on the expiration of the term the property should be surrendered in as good order as it then was, reasonable wear and tear excepted.

By another clause in the lease it was further agreed that if the defendant should continue on the premises "after the termination of the above contract, then this contract is to continue in full force for another year, and so on, from year to year, until legal notice shall be given for a removal."

By a subsequent clause it was agreed that if the defendant should continue on the premises "after the termination of the above contract, then he shall have the privilege of staying another five years, at the above fixed rent per annum."

Notice having been given to the defendant, to quit on December 1, 1884, he refused to comply; whereupon, this action of ejectment was commenced. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. The defendant now moves for a new trial, and the question is: What was the duration of the lease?

The construction of this lease is for the court. The ambiguity as to the duration of the estate is patent and not latent. There is enough on the face of the paper to enable us to settle the doubt which has been raised, without the aid of extrinsic evidence.

A lease for no determinate length of time, but by which an annual rent is reserved, payable half yearly, quarterly, monthly, or in any other aliquot proportions, is a lease for a year. Lesley v. Randolph, 4 Rawle, 123; Hey v. McGrath, 81* Pa. 310; Richardson v. Langridge, 4 Taunt. 128; King v. Herstmonceaux, 7 Barn. & C. 551; and a demise for a monthly or weekly rent affords a presumption of a monthly or weekly tenancy. Hollis v. Burns, 100 Pa. 206; Huffel v. Armitstead, 7 Carr. & P. 56.

The first term in the lease before us was for one year. The words "another five years" in the subsequent clause do not overcome the rule of law in this respect, because another five years might follow as well upon another and prior term of one, two or three, as of five years.

It is contended, however, by the learned counsel for the defendant, that a tenancy "for one year, and so on from year to year" (which Woodfall, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, at page 202, says is frequently done by mistake), is a tenancy for two years at least, and cannot be determined at the end of the first year.

It is true that such rulings have been made in England, but there are other and more numerous decisions the other way. In a settlement case, in order to piece out a term for a year so as to give a pauper a settlement, it was held that a lease for six months, and so on from six months to six months, until six calendar months' notice is given to quit, is a tenancy for twelve calendar months at least. Regina v. Chawton, 1 Ad. & El. N. S. 247.

How much influence the benevolent object to be attained had in the result we do not know. Doe, dem. Chadborn, v. Green, 9 Ad. & El. 658, and some earlier cases are to the same effect.

On the other hand, it was held that a tenancy from year to year may be determined by either party at the end of the first or any subsequent year, unless the parties use expressions showing that they contemplated a tenancy for two years at least. Doe, dem. Clarke, v. Smaridge, 7 Ad. & El. N. S. 957; Thompson v. Maberly, 2 Camp. 573.

Other decisions on both sides of this question may be found cited in Lesley v. Randolph, supra, by Mr. Justice Kennedy, who adopted the ruling of Lord Chief Justice Holt in Dod v. Monger, 6 Mod. 215, that a lease for a year, and so from year to year, is a lease binding but for one year, and that may now be considered the rule in this State. It was applied and enforced, although the question was not considered in MacGregor v. Rawle, 57 Pa. 184.

Besides, this is not a lease for a year and so on from year to year. It is a lease for one year, with an agreement that if the tenant should continue on the premises after the first year, then the lease should be in force for another year; and so on from year to year. The mistake which Woodfall says is frequently made was not made here.

At the trial the defendant was permitted to give evidence to show that the first term was to have been five years. This was an error, but it is one of which the defendant cannot complain. The verdict of the jury is founded upon the proper construction of the lease, such as the court now puts upon it.

The defendant was tenant of the premises for one year, with the option of continuing from year to year for another five years; and having enjoyed all that his option gave him, the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises.

Rule discharged.

The assignments of error specified: 1, the portion of the charge given above; 2, the answer to the defendant's points; and 3, the action of the court in leaving to the jury the construction of the lease.

Mr. William H. Ruddiman, for plaintiff in error:

The construction of the lease and the determining, from its terms, of the period of the lessees' tenancy were solely for the court. In construing a deed the court will look at the entire instrument; and general words will be restrained by particular recitals.

Wood, Land. & T. § 237.

It is the duty of the court to reconcile inconsistent or repugnant clauses.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 160, note.

The words in the particular grant of "another five years," could have had no other significance or interpretation than that there had been a term of a previous five years agreed upon. It is not of doubtful character or effect; but if it were, the construction must still be in favor of the lessee and against the lessor.

Wood, Land. & T. § 237.

Where a deed may inure several ways, the grantee shall have his election which way to take it. An exception in a deed shall be taken most favorably to the grantee; and if it be not set down or described with certainty, the grantee shall have the benefit which may arise from such defect.

Jackson v. Hudson, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 375.

If a lease for a term is made determinable at certain specified periods, and nothing is said as to the person by whom the option is to be exercised, the lessee only can exercise it, every doubtful grant being construed in favor of the grantee."

Wood, Land. & T. § 79.

No part of the language contained in the lease should have been separated from the whole instrument, and itself made the subject of particular instruction to the jury.

The points upon which the learned judge was requested to charge the jury, it is respectfully submitted, were clear, intelligible and specific; and if any one of them could be sustained, the verdict should have been for the defendant below. Especially is that the case, if greater stress can be laid upon one than upon another, as to the second point, respecting the omission of material words, and the construction of the lease as if such words were inserted. Where a material word appears to have been omitted in a lease by mistake, and other words cannot have their proper effect unless it be introduced, the lease must be construed as if that word were inserted, although the particular passage where it ought to stand conveys a sufficiently distinct meaning without it.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 160, note 6, 7th ed; White v. Eagan, 1 Bay, 247; Wright v. Dicksons, 1 Dow, 141; Wood, Land. & T. § 302.

Or as to the fifth point, that defendant below was entitled to a term of seven years, at least; the law touching the same being as follows: A demise for a year, and so on from year to year, is a lease for two years certain, at least.

Wood, Land. & T. § 292.

A lease for one year certain, and so on from year to year, creates a tenancy for two years at least.

Reg v. Chawton, 1 Q. B. 247.

A tenancy for one year certain, and so on from year to year, cannot be determined before the end of the second year.

Wood, Land. & T. § 31.

The first two years thus made his, and the special provision of "another five years," gave the lessee an estate for at least seven years; and the jury should have been so instructed.

But as to all the points, taken separately or together, it is impossible to discover where or how in the learned judge's charge the same were covered or referred to, or even suggested. He should have given the defendant below the benefit of either an affirmance or denial of each single and specific point.

Messrs. Matthew Ditmann and Charles Davis, for defendant in error:

A lease for no determinate length of time, but by which an annual rent is reserved, payable half yearly, etc., is a lease for a year.

Lesley v. Randolph, 4 Rawle, 128; 2 Bl. Com. 144, 145; Hey v. McGrath, 81* Pa. 310, 212.

Leases for uncertain terms are leases at will; the reservation of an annual rent turns them into leases from year to year.

Bree v. Lees, 2 W. Bl. 1173; Richardson v. Langridge, 4 Taunt. 131; 4 Kent, Com. 111, 112; Logan v. Herron, 8 Serg. & R. 473; Clark v. Smith, 25 Pa. 137.

The court below did, in effect, construe the lease in question, in charging the jury that, "If Jones continues after the expiration of the term, he may continue for another year, and so on, from year to year. This shows a yearly letting. Then by another clause he has the privilege of staying another five years. What, then, is the extreme length of his term and option? If the first term was for one year, with the privilege of another five years, he has had that."

At all events the court corrected this in its opinion refusing a new trial; and the verdict of the jury being in full accord with the opinion of the court the result reached was the same, and in this there was no error.

It is not the rule of law in Pennsylvania that "A lease for one year certain, and so on from year to year, creates a tenancy for two years at least." The rule is as laid down by Lord Chief Justice Holt, in Dod v. Monger, 6 Mod. 215, that "A lease for a year, and so on from year to year, is a lease binding but for one year."

The points were substantially answered in the general charge, and this is all that is required.

Patterson v. Kountz, 63 Pa. 246; Winsor v. Maddock, 64 Pa. 231; Smith v. Bouvier, 70 Pa. 325; Scheuing v. Yard, 88 Pa. 286.

Per Curiam:

Conceding that there was error in leaving to the jury to find the construction which should be given to the written lease, yet inasmuch as they found it what the court should have declared it to be, and what the learned judge in fact stated in discharging the rule for a new trial, the plaintiff in error has no just cause of complaint. He attempted by parol evidence to induce the jury to give an erroneous construction to the written instrument; but having failed in this, he must now submit to the verdict and the judgment entered thereon.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued Feb. 19, Decided April 11, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 93, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lehigh County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of covenant. Reversed.

This was an action by William Mersher against W. P. Krum and B. F. Peters, upon the following agreement, under seal:

"Articles of agreement made and concluded this 20th day of October, A. D. 1883, between Wm. Mersher of Washington Township, State of Pennsylvania, of the first part, and W. P. Krum and B. F. Peters of the same Township, County and State aforesaid, of the second part, viz.: the party of the first part agrees to sell to the party of the second part one half interest of a certain lease which he holds on the property of M. C. Hirsch, situated in Washington Township, Lehigh County, Pa., with all the slates on bank, tool shanty, machine truck, railroad iron, derrick, ropes, horse powers and all outstanding accounts for slates sold previous to this agreement, the said half interest Wm. Mersher has granted and sold to the said W. P. Krum and B. F. Peters for a certain sum conditioned for the said sum shall be $1,600, of which sum $200 is to be paid at the above date and the balance to be paid monthly out of the clear proceeds, that is after deducting all expenses. And out of the clear proceeds cash in hand he shall receive the balance that is out of the one half. Should the quarry prove a failure that no proceeds should be in hands of the second party, or that they should abandon the quarry, believing that the quarry would not be a paying one or a profitable one to them in their estimation, and if the quarry had not netted any clear profit to the second party at abandoning said quarry, then the second party shall not be responsible for any further payment, and this agreement shall be null and void and of no effect. And further, for the true and faithful performance of each and every of the above parties do hereby bind themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators and every of them firmly by these presents."

This agreement was duly signed and sealed by the parties.

The declaration alleged two breaches: first, that the quarry was a paying and profitable one, yet the defendants had not worked the same and paid the monthly installments; second, that they did not abandon the quarry as provided in the covenant; and then claims the balance of the consideration named in the covenant, to wit: $1,400.

It appeared at the trial that the defendants worked the quarry from October, 1883, to June, 1884. They put up at the quarry new machinery at a cost to them of $1,600. They expended in labor and other things, exclusive of the cost of the machinery, over $3,100. And the slate taken out by them while they worked the property did not exceed in value $1,110. Exclusive of the cost of the new machinery they sunk about $1,991 from October, 1883, to June 1884, and adding the cost of the new machinery, their total expenditures exceeded the value of the slate quarried, $3,591.

The plaintiff was told that the quarry was unprofitable, and that the defendants would surrender the lease. He made no objections; but asked for a week's time in which to try to sell. The defendants then surrendered the lease to the lessor Hirsch. Other facts are stated in the charge. During the trial the plaintiff asked a witness the following question:

What was the value of this property and the machinery on these premises when they left and gave it up to Hirsch? Objected to.

By the Court: The plaintiff has offered to show that the abandonment of the quarry by the defendants was not in good faith, and that the quarry was in a condition to have been worked profitably. In addition to that, he proposes to show that when the defendants did abandon the quarry, they sold or carried away a portion of the machinery and personal property, which the plaintiff had transferred to them by the written agreement, and he seeks to show the value of the property thus carried away, with a view of recovering for it. In addition to the demand to recover for what the profits were or would have been if the quarry had been properly worked, the plaintiff's position being that upon the abandonment by the defendants, the agreement, as stated in it, was null and void, and that the plaintiff's rights to the quarry, machinery and personal property there were then revived. To this the defendants object as incompetent and irrelevant, and not admissible under the pleadings; which objection is overruled and a bill sealed for the defendants. Fifth assignment of error.

A. It was worth $5,000 to any party.

The court charged as follows:

This action of covenant brought by William Mersher against W. P. Krum and B. F. Peters arises in this wise: it appears that Mr. M. C. Hirsch was the owner of a tract of slate land in Washington Township, and that he had leased it for the purpose of working to Messrs. Mersher, Blose and Fink. Some time in 1883, Mersher and the defendants agreed that he (Mersher) would sell out his interest to the defendants. There was a verbal arrangement to that effect. It seems that Hirsch knew of this and agreed to it. It appears further that it was agreed by words between the parties concerned that Mersher, Blose and Fink should cease to be the lessees of this property, and that Krum and Peters and several other persons should become the lessees; that in pursuance of that understanding Mersher gave up the lease, which he and others had, to Mr. Hirsch, and then Hirsch made a new lease to Krum and Peters and his associates (Gross, Fritzinger and one or two others), and that when that was done a writing was made between Mersher, the plaintiff, and Krum and Peters, the defendants, and with that writing and the contract embodied in it we have to do. On it this action of covenant is brought. It is dated the 20th day of October, 1883, and is between Mersher, Krum and Peters:

By this agreement it is agreed that the party of the first part (Mr. Mersher) sells to the party of the second part (Krum and Peters) the one half interest of a certain lease, which he (the said Mersher) holds on the property of Hirsch, situate in Washington Township, Lehigh County, with the slate on the bank, tools, shanties, track, railroad iron, derrick, ropes, horse power, and all the outstanding accounts for slates sold previous to this agreement. The said half interest of William Mersher is granted and sold to the said Krum and Peters for a certain sum, conditioned for, said sum shall be $1,600, of which $200 is to be paid at the above date, and the balance to be paid monthly out of the clear proceeds, that is, after deducting all expense, and out of the clear proceeds cash in hand he shall receive the balance, that is out of the one half; should the quarry prove a failure that no proceeds should be in hand of the second party, or that they should abandon the quarry, believing that the quarry would not be a paying one or a profitable one to them in their estimation, and if the quarry had netted any clear profits to the second party at abandoning the said quarry, then the second party shall not be responsible for any further payment, and this agreement shall be null and void and of no effect.

The parties could make their own agreement; and by that agreement they must stand, whether it is a hard bargain or not, whether it is a bargain more favorable to one side than to the other.

It is admitted that the $200 which was stipulated for at the time of the making of the agreement was paid, and the contest now is about the $1,400. The uncontradicted evidence on both sides is and the fact is conceded by the plaintiff, that on the 14th day of June, or thereabouts, 1884, Krum and Peters gave up the lease which they had to Hirsch, and it was ended.

By the agreement Krum and Peters reserved the right to give up the lease; and if they gave up the lease, then they were not obliged to pay after that, provided it was given up in good faith as I shall explain to you presently. You will understand by this agreement, under the construction which the court gives it, that Mersher was to receive, after the $200 had been paid down, one half of the profits for his pay —that is, after deducting the expense of working the quarry from it, if there was any profit, the profit to be divided by two and out of the one half Mersher was to be paid and out of nothing else; and the agreement says if there are no profits, he is to receive no further pay; and by that he must stand.

It has been proved to you, that is the uncontradicted evidence is, that a certain amount was expended between October, when this working was begun, and in June, when it was given up, and that a certain amount of slate was taken out. It was argued by plaintiff's counsel that there would be a profit if you did not take into account the machinery and labor. In the opinion of the court that argument is untenable. There was no profit. The plaintiff has not shown that there was any profit, nor does the defendants' evidence show any profit during the time Krum and Peters worked the quarry. The agreement says out of the profit Mersher is to be paid; and you have the fact that it is not proved that there was any profit during the time they worked, and the fact that the agreement was given up. The plaintiff, then, has no claim against Krum and Peters under his own writing, except on one theory; and the question arising upon that theory will be submitted to you.

The agreement says that if Krum and Peters should abandon the quarry, believing that the quarry was not a paying one or a profitable one to them in their estimation, and if the quarry had not netted clear profits to the second party at the time of abandoning the said quarry, the second party shall not be responsible for any further payments. The quarry was given up, but not with the consent of Mr. Mersher. They had a right to give it up under the writing of Mr. Mersher.

[The allegation of the plaintiff is that the agreement implies that the quarry was to be worked in good faith; that the quarry might have been worked so as to render a profit. I say to you that when this lease was given up in June, 1884, if it is proved that at that time by ordinary diligence and ordinary business enterprise and capacity it might have been made to pay a profit, Mr. Mersher may recover, because there is implied in this agreement a covenant or understanding that they shall work it in an ordinary workmanlike manner. Mersher's pay depended upon the profits of the quarry; and therefore the lessees, Krum and Peters, had a right to give up the lease, if they in good faith believed it could not be made to pay. The plaintiff says they did not give it up in good faith; that they gave it up from some other motives, and alleges that at the time the lease was given up the quarry might have been worked with profit by the defendants. If that is proved, the plaintiff may recover].

If the plaintiff recovers, it will be the balance which is owing on the $1,600; but before the plaintiff can recover on this theory and condition he must prove his case. The plaintiff must prove that the quarry could have been worked with a profit, and that it was not given up honestly and in good faith. The plaintiff has testified, as well as witnesses in his behalf, that the quarry at the time it was given up might have been worked with profit; and it has been shown to you on the plaintiff's part what the quarry was, and how it was worked, and what was taken out, and it was argued by plaintiff's counsel that it was profitable. On the defendants' part they allege they gave it a fair trial and that it was worked at a great loss; that the material was not good; that the slates were of such a quality that the product of the quarry would not be marketable. The plaintiff alleges that it was not worked skillfully all the time. From this evidence you are to ask yourselves whether it is proved that the quarry could have been worked at a profit at the time it was given up in June, 1884.

If the material in the quarry was as bad as the defendants say, it is very likely you will come to the conclusion that they could not work the quarry with a profit. This the plaintiff denies and says that the stone there was as good as the average in the region where the quarry was located, and that quarries there could be operated with a profit. The lease was given up in June, 1884. If the plaintiff has satisfied you that the quarry, when the lease was given up, was of such a kind and the material was of such a quality, and the quarry itself was of such a character, as to be workable with profit, the plaintiff can recover. If that is not shown, the plaintiff has no case.

If you consider all the evidence on that question and you are convinced that the quarry could have been worked with profit at the time it was given up, the plaintiff can recover; and in that event he may recover all that is owing to him under the stipulation to give him $1,600, $200 of which he already has. It is not enough for the plaintiff in order to recover to show that the defendants gave up the quarry and nothing more, because they reserved by the writing the right to give it up. [The plaintiff can recover on the ground, and on that ground only, that he has satisfied you that when they gave up the lease the quarry might have been worked with a profit.]

The defendants allege that $523.18 has been paid, and that they say is the $200 paid on the agreement which is not disputed, and the store bill of $123.18, and $200 on a note which it appears the defendants indorsed for Mersher and which they afterwards paid. The defendants say that the $200 was paid on the agreement, but the other $325.18 was not paid on account of the $1,600; that they have that as a separate claim, and they plead what they call "set-off" or "defalcation."

If the plaintiff has not shown that the quarry may have been worked with a profit, your verdict will be in favor of the defendants; and in that case the defendants claim their set-off of $323, which they say the plaintiff owes them outside of this transaction. The law says that where the jury find a set-off in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff they shall so certify. If you find in favor of the defendants—if you find the quarry could not be worked with a profit—you will say you find in favor of the defendants, and certify that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendants, in the sum of blank dollars, whatever you may estimate that amount to be.

The plaintiff claims the $1,600 stipulated in the agreement. He is willing to take that $523.18 as having been paid on the agreement. If you find in favor of the plaintiff, that would leave $1,086.82 on the $1,600 mentioned in the agreement, which amount he claims with interest from the time it should have been paid up to this day.

[You will take the case and inquire as to the main question, whether the plaintiff has shown that the defendants, when they gave up the lease, by ordinary business enterprise could have worked the quarry with a profit, and that it was not given up in good faith; and if you find that issue in favor of the plaintiff, he will be entitled to your verdict for whatever may appear to be due under the explanations I have given to you.]

If you find this issue against the plaintiff, your verdict will be in favor of the defendants; and then you will find in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff for whatever, if anything, is due on the store bill and the note paid; and in that event you may sign the certificate filling out the blanks, which I will send out with you. If you find in favor of the plaintiff, you will not need that paper; and in that case you will sign a paper stating your verdict and bring it into court in the morning.

The defendants submitted, inter alia, this point:

"Under all the evidence of this cause the defendants are entitled to a verdict."

Ans. "Negatived." First assignment of error.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff for $1,157.09.

The second, third and fourth assignments of error specified, respectively, the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. John D. Stiles & Son, Levi Smoyer and Edward Harvey, for plaintiffs in error:

Payment of the balance of the consideration was expressly restricted to the one half of the net profits to be realized. The contract is clear upon that point. The mode of payment is agreed upon—the fund out of which payment is to be made is designated—and the contingency upon which payment is made to depend is specified. By the term "profits" is meant the net return to the capital invested after deducting all expenses. As there were no profits there was no fund out of which payment could be exacted.

In Williams v. Hathaway, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 544, the plaintiff was not permitted to recover because by the terms of the contract he was restricted to a particular fund.

In Chambers v. Jaynes, 4 Pa. 39, the remedy was restricted to separate rents.

See also 1 Whart. Cont. p. 598.

By its very terms the contract made the defendants the exclusive and absolute judges of the conditions under which the agreement should become void. The obligation to perform was made dependent upon the contingency that the defendants would conclude, as a matter of opinion, that the quarry could be worked at a profit to them. It is only on the happening of the contingency, whatever it may be, that the obligation to perform becomes operative.

Benninger v. Hankee, 61 Pa. 343.

What does this contract mean but that the defendants will pay the balance of the consideration if they are satisfied the venture will be profitable? If that is the true construction then they are of necessity the exclusive judges of its conditions.

In Grafton v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 8 Exch. 699, the contract provided as a condition precedent that the coke should be furnished to the satisfaction of the inspecting officer of the company. It was held that this was the condition upon the performance of which the contract depended.

In Taylor v. Brewer, 1 Maule & S. 290, work was performed under a resolution that any service to be rendered by him should be taken into consideration, and such remuneration be made as should be deemed right. It was held that an action would not lie to recover a recompense for such work, as the resolution imported that the committee were to judge if any remuneration was due.

In Andrews v. Belfield, 2 C. B. N. S. 779, the contract provided that the carriage should be made in a manner which shall meet my approval, not only on the score of workmanship but also of convenience and taste. It was held that these words were an express condition that the carriage should meet the approval of the purchaser on the score of convenience and taste; and he was entitled to reject it, provided he did not act from mere caprice.

In McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray, 139, the plaintiff agreed to construct a bookcase in a "good, strong and workmanlike manner to the satisfaction" of one of the defendants. It was held that proof that it was constructed according to the terms of the agreement would not suffice to support the action, but that the plaintiff must prove that it was satisfactory to or accepted by the defendant. Morton, J., says in the opinion of the court: "Having voluntarily assumed the obligation and the risk of the contract, his legal rights are to be ascertained and determined solely according to its provisions."

In Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136, the plaintiff agreed to make the defendant a satisfactory suit of clothes; the defendant returned the delivered suit as unsatisfactory. It was held that an action could not be maintained.

In Zaleski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218, the plaintiff, a sculptor, made a plaster bust of the deceased husband of the defendant under an agreement that she was not to take it unless she was satisfied with it. When it was finished she was not satisfied, and refused to accept it. In a suit for the price it was found that the bust was a fair piece of work, a correct copy of a photograph furnished by the defendant, and that it accurately portrayed the features of its subject, and that the only fault found with it was that it did not have the expression of the deceased when living, which was caused by no imperfection in the work, but by the nature of the material. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

In Bernard v. Cushing, 4 Met. 230, the payee of a note, at the time it was signed by the maker, and as part of the same transaction, indorsed thereon a promise not to compel payment thereof, but to receive the amount when convenient for the maker to pay it; it was held that the payee could never maintain an action.

In Nelson v. VonBonnhorst, 29 Pa. 352, a party gave an instrument of writing, under seal, acknowledging an indebtedness to another in a certain amount, and which he agreed "to pay whenever in my opinion my circumstances will enable me to do so." It was held that such instrument imposes no legal obligation which can be enforced by action.

In Hartman v. Blackburn, 7 Pitts. Legal J. 140, a person got a set of teeth from a dentist under an agreement that they were to be satisfactory. It was held that he was the exclusive judge.

All the cases hold that it is not in compliance with such contracts to prove that the defendant ought to have been satisfied.

Gray v. Cent. R. R. Co. of N. J. 11 Hun, 70; Gibson v. Cranage, 39 Mich. 49; Hoffman v. Gallaher, 6 Daly, 42; Barlow v. Thompson, 46 Ind. 384.

In Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291, the words of the contract were: "Warranted satisfactory in any respect." The court below charged the jury that if they were of the opinion that the elevator was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was intended and the defendant ought to have been satisfied with it, the verdict might be for the plaintiff. This was held to be error.

The fair inference from the contract was that the elevator was to be satisfactory to the defendant; and while it could not be rejected for mere caprice, yet a bona fide objection by him to its working was a sufficient defense.

Where it is not alleged in the pleadings nor found in the decision that the defendant acted fraudulently or in bad faith, fraud or bad faith is not to be presumed.

Whart. Cont. p. 588.

Messrs. R. E. Wright's Sons and C. J. Erdman, for defendant in error:

Mersher sold his property to Krum and Peters for a consideration which was to be paid out of the income from the products of the quarry. There was, therefore, an implied covenant on the part of Krum and Peters that they would, in good faith, work the quarry with proper diligence, to the end that Mersher might receive the consideration for his sale.

In support of this proposition we refer to the following authorities:

A lease of the right to dig and mine coal, the lessee to pay three eighths of a cent for every bushel he may mine or dig, applies not only to the coal actually mined, but to what the defendant reasonably could and should have mined upon the land leased. For the quantity not mined, the measure of damages is the difference between the stipulated rate of compensation and the value of the coal left unmined.

Lyon v. Miller, 24 Pa. 393.

A lease of a stone quarry in consideration that the lessee shall pay to the lessor a certain price per perch for all stone taken out of it, is a contract on the part of the lessee that he will work the quarry; and upon his failure so to do the lessor may maintain covenant on the contract and recover damages. And one verdict and judgment on such contract, pending the lease, is not a bar to another, when the term is further advanced.

Watson v. O'Hern, 6 Watts, 362.

Where the right to mine ore or other minerals is granted in consideration of the reservation of a certain proportion of the product to the grantor, the law implies a covenant on the part of the grantee to work the mine in a proper manner, and with reasonable diligence, so that the grantor may receive the compensation or income contemplated when the agreement was entered into; but unless there are special reasons for equitable interference such covenant will not be enforced in a court of equity, as an adequate remedy is afforded by an action at law for damages.

Koch's App. 93 Pa. 434.

From these authorities it follows that so long as the plaintiffs in error retained the quarry and did not avail themselves of their right under certain conditions to abandon it, they were obliged to work it diligently, and that if the failure to realize the profits, out of which we were to be paid, arose from their clear breach of their implied covenant, they were chargeable with such profits as they might have realized through a proper performance of their implied covenant.

The agreement did not give the plaintiffs in error the right out of mere obstinacy and caprice and without honest cause to abandon the quarry, keep the personalty, and deprive the defendant in error of compensation. He did not agree to part with his property, leaving his compensation dependent upon the mere whim of the purchaser.

Where an offer of a reward is made to parties who come up to certain conditions determined by the promisor, or where an offer is made to architects to submit plans for a proposed building, such plans to be paid for if satisfactory, the duty of examination must not be exercised capriciously, but there must be a reasonable trial, although it is competent for the parties to leave the question absolutely to the determination of the employer, in which case it will be sufficient if he exercises his option in good faith.

1 Whart. Cont. p. 787; Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 298; 1 Pars. Cont. 542; Andrews v. Belfield, 2 C. B. N. S. 779.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the learned court below was in error in the interpretation of the clause of the contract which subjected its obligatory force to the will of the grantees. The language of this portion of the agreement is certainly inartistic and indeed uncouth. But it is not unintelligible.

It is practically conceded in the charge that "Krum and Peters had a right to give up the lease if they in good faith believed it could not be made to pay." We agree with this, but as we understand the charge, this is not the question upon which the case was given to the jury. On the contrary the court said: "I say to you that when this lease was given up in June, 1884, if it is proved that at that time, by ordinary diligence and ordinary business enterprise and capacity, it might have been made to pay a profit, Mr. Mersher may recover because there is implied in this agreement a covenant or understanding that they shall work it in an ordinary workmanlike manner."

And again: "If the plaintiff has satisfied you that the quarry when the lease was given up was of such a kind and the material was of such a quality, and the quarry itself was of such a character, as to be workable with profit, the plaintiff can recover. * * * If you consider all the evidence on that question, and you are convinced that the quarry could have been worked with profit at the time it was given up, the plaintiff can recover."

The same idea was repeated at the close of the charge, where it was characterized as the main question.

According to this view of the defendants' obligation it did not depend in any degree upon their own estimation or belief as to their ability to work the quarry at a profit; nor even upon the actual results of the best and most faithful efforts they could put forth with whatever capital or facilities they possessed. Instead of that the crucial test of liability as stated to the jury was the possibility of the quarry being worked at a profit with ordinary diligence by anybody or by any means.

That of course is a mere question of opinion, to be proved by witnesses who would testify as to their belief on the subject, and who might thus induce a jury to find according to their belief as to what could be done with the quarry. Such opinions as this are easily obtained from willing friends of the interested parties, as unhappily is the case in too many other kinds of cases. They cost nothing to the witness. He does not go through the hazardous ordeal of actually conducting at his own expense, the practical operations concerning which he testifies. He ventures nothing but an opinion and in that he assumes no risk. Upon reading the testimony in this case we find that it was tried upon this principle precisely. Witnesses were examined on behalf of the plaintiff, to prove that the quarry could be worked at a profit, and they gave their opinions to that effect.

It was proved most clearly for the defense that in point of fact no profit was made, but on the contrary, a heavy loss; and there was no proof in the case that in reality any profit was made, yet the jury were instructed that if they found that the quarry could be worked at a profit the plaintiff was entitled to recover. But the agreement provided for a very different standard of liability. The language is: "Should the quarry prove a failure that no proceeds should be in hands of the second party, or that they would abandon the quarry believing that the quarry would not be a paying one or a profitable one to them in their estimation, and if the quarry had not netted any clear profit to the second party, at abandoning said quarry, then the second party shall not be responsible for any further payment, and this agreement shall be null and void, and of no effect."

All this verbiage simply means that if Krum and Peters made no profit, and believed that the quarry was not a profitable one to work they could abandon the quarry and the contract was a nullity. In other words, the test of their right to terminate the contract was the fact that they had made no profit, and their belief that the quarry was not a profitable one to work. It was conceded they had made no profit, and the proof was most ample that they believed the quarry to be an unprofitable one to work, and they did actually abandon it, and surrendered the lease. Now, according to the terms of their contract, they were entitled to have their liability tried by these tests. Did they make no profit and did they really believe the quarry an unprofitable one? If so, they were not liable, and there could be no recovery. They had an undoubted right to contract in that way if the other party was willing, as he certainly was.

The books abound with authorities which prove this, but a single reference is sufficient. Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291.

In a contract for an elevator the words were "Warranted satisfactory in every respect." The court below charged the jury that if they were of the opinion that the elevator was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was intended, and the defendant ought to have been satisfied with it, the verdict might be for the plaintiff. We held that this was error. The fair inference from the contract was that the elevator was to be satisfactory to the defendant, and while it could not be rejected for mere caprice, yet a bona fide objection by him to its working was a sufficient defense. The present Chief Justice said, speaking of the charge of the court below: "In other words it may have been wholly unsatisfactory to him, yet if the jury thought he ought to have been satisfied he was bound to accept it. In effect that is it need not have operated to his satisfaction in any respect, but to the satisfaction of the jury which might be called to pass on the rights of the parties * * * He did not agree to accept what might be satisfactory to others, but what was satisfactory to himself. This was a fact which the contract gave him a right to decide. He was the person negotiating for its purchase. He was the person who was to test it and to use it. No other persons could intelligently determine whether in every respect he was satisfied therewith."

The foregoing reasoning applies with a still greater force to the present case. Krum and Peters were the persons who were to work the quarry. It was they who were to pay all the expenses and incur all the risk. This they must do in any event; and hence, they would be most anxious to provide for a means of extrication from what might prove to be a ruinous loss. For that very reason they stipulated for an absolute privilege to terminate the contract if they made no profit, and believed the quarry unprofitable to work. They did not choose to be subject to the opinions of others in this most important matter, and in this they were wise. Doubtless they knew, as nearly all men in the business would do, that the making of profits, on paper, is an affair of the simplest and easiest character. Thousands of men of good business capacity are being constantly led on to loss and great numbers to ruin, by the seductive array of profits, on paper, which are never realized.

Against the possibility of having their obligation to continue a losing contract to depend upon the easily obtained and loosely formed opinions of strangers, they took care to provide by their agreement, and they are now entitled to the protection for which they bargained. Of course they could not from mere caprice and without reason, say they were losing and thus terminate the contract. But that is a very different matter from being obliged to submit to the mere opinion of strangers, whether witnesses or jurors, on the question of a possible profit in conducting their operations. These views sustain the second, third and fourth assignments of error.

We also sustain the fifth, as we do not see the relevancy of the testimony there offered and admitted; and we are unable to discover any evidence of bad faith on the part of the defendants.

Judgment reversed.

CENTENARY METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF PHILADELPHIA, Plff. in Err.,

(Argued March 25, Decided April 18, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 203, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of scire facias upon a mechanics' lien. Affirmed.

At the trial the following facts appeared:

The edifice of the Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church at Spring Garden and Forty-First Streets, in West Philadelphia, was begun about the year 1876 and carried up the first story only, which was roofed and used for worship by the congregation until the year 1883. In the erection of so much of the walls a gray stone had been used, procured from the quarry of one Bunting at Forty-Fourth and Walnut Streets. In 1883 the defendant began the work of carrying up the walls and completing the second story of the building and adding wings.

The plaintiff, a stone mason, made application for the contract for laying the stone. He met the building committee of the defendant at the church, where the terms of the contract were agreed upon. Mr. Rudolph, the president of the board of trustees of the defendant, and Mr. Bailey, who was superintendent of the entire erection, and the Rev. Dr. Wood, the pastor of the church, were present at that meeting.

After this meeting at the church the agreement was written up by Mr. Bailey, and in a day or two the plaintiff called upon Mr. Rudolph and signed it.

The following is the contract:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 11th day of July, 1883, between Hiram Clime, stone mason, of Philadelphia, of the first part, and the Board of Trustees of Centenary M. E. Church, of the second part.

"Witnesseth, the said Hiram Clime agrees to do all the stone work according to the plans furnished by D. B. Price, architect, for the above mentioned stone work, at the rate of $4 per perch. The said Hiram Clime agrees to do the work in a good workmanlike manner, including the pointing and other work necessary to make a good job. In consideration of paying the said Hiram Clime $4 per perch for the new work he agrees to do all necessary repairs and pointing to the old work or present building without additional cost. The said Hiram Clime also agrees to push the work as rapidly as the committee requires.

"The committee agrees to pay the said Hiram Clime for the above work in installments, as follows: When the said Hiram Clime shall render an account of the number of stone masons and laborers actually employed on the building a payment shall be made on each Saturday (during the progress of the work) sufficient to pay the wages of the men, and when the two wings are level with the main building, whatever may be due as per agreement, and the balance when the work is finished."

The agreement was signed by Hiram Clime and Philip Rudolph.

Clime did the work according to the contract and filed a lien against the Church for the contract price and an amount beside, which he claimed as compensation for extra labor expended in working stone which the Church furnished for part of the edifice and which was harder to work than the stone from Bunting's quarry. The testimony on this point is sufficiently set forth in the opinion.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff for the full amount of his claim.

Messrs. Marshall G. Kinney, and Rudolph M. Schick, for plaintiff in error:

On the trial the plaintiff attempted to add a term to the contract by his offer to prove by himself that at the time the contract was signed Mr. Rudolph stated to him that the stone he would be required to work was to come from the Bunting quarry and that that was the inducement that led him to accept the contract.

The parol evidence which will be effective to reform a written instrument in such a case must be clear, precise and indubitable; that is to say, it must carry clear conviction to the minds of the jurors that the witnesses are credible, that the facts are distinctly remembered, and are truly and accurately stated; and to the mind of the court, that if the facts alleged are true, the matters in issue are definitely and distinctly established.

Cullmans v. Lindsay, 4 Cent. Rep. 748.

When such terms as "clear, precise, explicit, unequivocal and indubitable" are used by the courts in defining the requisite proof of a particular fact to be made out by verbal testimony, it is meant that a conviction shall be fastened in the minds of jurors as strong as verbal testimony is able to convey. It is meant that witnesses shall be found to be credible; that the facts to which they testify are distinctly remembered; that details are narrated exactly and in due order, and that their statements are true.

Spencer v. Colt, 89 Pa. 318.

It is not enough that there are parol stipulations contradictory of a written agreement, in order to change the legal effect. There must be fraud, accident or mistake, and the evidence of either must be clear, precise and indubitable.

Thorne v. Warfflein, 100 Pa. 526.

A party to a contract shall not testify his undisclosed purpose or intention to nullify words and acts relied upon by others which in themselves are prima facie evidence of the agreement. Minds cannot meet when one keeps to itself what he means to do.

Juniata Bldg. Asso. v. Hetzel, 103 Pa. 512; Spencer v. Colt, 89 Pa. 314; Cullmans v. Lindsay, 4 Cent. Rep. 747.

The court said in Phillips v. Meily, 106 Pa. 544, that the defense set up, if it amounts to anything, must be sufficient to reform the note, and the evidence must be strong enough to justify a chancellor in doing so. It is only where a chancellor would reform the instrument that parol evidence is admissible to contradict it. It is true, under our practice in Pennsylvania, it is accomplished through common-law forms. But the fact remains that the defense set up is purely equitable; and the judge ought not to submit the case to the jury unless the evidence is such that he would feel himself bound as a chancellor to reform the instrument.

The court should not, therefore, have submitted that point in the case to the jury.

Phillips v. Meily. 106 Pa. 544; Juniata Bldg. Asso. v. Hetzel, 103 Pa. 514; Brawdy v. Brawdy, 7 Pa. 157.

The verbal agreement relied on to establish the plaintiff's claim was an addition to a written agreement, and was supported by the testimony of only one witness who was not "corroborated by other facts which are equivalent to the testimony of an additional witness." That degree of proof is not sufficient to effect an addition to a written contract.

Juniata Bldg. Asso. v. Hetzel, 103 Pa. 507; Phillips v. Meily, 106 Pa. 544; Penn Iron Co. v. Diller, 4 Cent. Rep. 691; North & West Branch R. Co. v. Swank, 105 Pa. 555; Cullmans v. Lindsay, 4 Cent. Rep. 748; Jones v. Backus, 5 Cent. Rep. 138.

An answer is conclusive unless contradicted by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances.

Bisph. Eq. § 9.

That rule requires two witnesses to the substantial facts, or at least one witness and other attendant circumstances which supply the want of another witness.

3 Greenl. Ev. § 289.

The additional evidence must be a second witness or very strong circumstances.

In order to obtain a verdict the plaintiff must make out his case with reasonable certainty.

Wood v. Donahue, 94 Pa. 128, 132.

The true question, therefore, in trials of fact is not whether it is possible that the testimony may be false, but whether there is sufficient probability of its truth.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 1.

A thing is probable when it is likely, having more evidence than the contrary or evidence which inclines the mind to belief. If facts are adduced in proof of a proposition, they should at least render the contrary of the proposition unlikely.

Messrs. Ernest Lowengrund, Octavius A. Law and F. Carroll Brewster, for defendant in error:

When the Gorman stone was substituted for the Bunting stone Mr. Clime testifies: "I said to Mr. Bailey, 'I want you distinctly to understand these are not Bunting stones, and that it will cost me double as much to work these stones as to work Bunting's.' He replied that the church people would make it all right." This is evidence of a subsequent and not a contemporaneous alteration of the written contract, or rather the substitution of a new one; and no matter how flatly it is contradicted, is entitled to go to the jury.

Weaver v. Craighead, 104 Pa. 288.

Here it was proposed by the aid of parol evidence to define and identify, not to vary or contradict, the agreement. After the jury had been apprised of all that was said and all that was understood at the making of the contract, its terms were still that plaintiff should cut and work the stone at $4 a perch; but the kind of stone that was to be cut and worked was ascertained and specialized. Thus the tenor of the instrument was neither altered, varied nor contradicted, but was explained and made clear. If the contract was altered it was by the subsequent agreement on the part of the Church "to make it all right;" and such an alteration is not governed by the rules applicable to a contemporaneous variance. The numerous cases cited by plaintiff in error are not in point.

In Cullmans v. Lindsay, 4 Cent. Rep. 747, it was proposed to show by parol that a party to a contract was induced to sign it by the representation that it meant nothing.

In Spencer v. Colt, 89 Pa. 318, the purpose was to show that at the time of signing a bond and mortgage it was agreed by parol that only the mortgaged premises should be bound.

In Juniata Bldg. Asso. v. Hetzel, 103 Pa. 512, that a bond absolute on its face was to be resorted to only after the exhaustion of a mortgage.

In Penn Iron Co. v. Diller, 4 Cent. Rep. 691, that a permissive clause in a contract was intended to be obligatory.

In Phillips v. Meily, 106 Pa. 536, that a promissory note was given merely as a receipt for another note in the hands of the defendant belonging to the plaintiff; and so throughout the list. Everywhere the parol evidence would, if received, have entirely abrogated the written contract or changed it into something other than what its terms imported.

Whatever indicates the nature of the subject is a just medium of interpretation of the language and meaning of the parties in relation to it, and is also a just foundation for giving the instrument an interpretation, when considered relatively, different from that which it would receive when considered in the abstract. The object is to discover the intention; and to do this the court may put itself in the place of the party and then see how the terms of the instrument affect the property or subject matter. With this view, evidence must be admissible of all the circumstances surrounding the author of the instrument. In the simplest case that can be put, namely: that of an instrument appearing on the face of it to be perfectly intelligible, inquiry must be made for a subject matter to satisfy the description.

Greenl. Ev. §§ 286–288.

Extrinsic parol evidence is admissible generally to give effect to a written instrument by establishing its authenticity or applying it to its subject matter.

Starkie, Ev. 1021; 2 Whart. Ev. § 961 a; Add. Cont. 847; Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 367; Barnhart v. Riddle, 79 Pa. 92.

Parol evidence is not admissible to alter or contradict what is written, upon the very obvious principle that the writing is the best evidence of the intention of the parties, but parol evidence has many times been received to explain and define the subject matter of written agreements. Herein is no contradiction.

McCullough v. Wainwright, 64 Pa. 171; Miller v. Fichthorn, 31 Pa. 252; Baltimore etc. Steamboat Co. v. Brown, 54 Pa. 77; Gould v. Lee, 55 Pa. 99; Bertsch v. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. 4 Rawle, 130; Jackson v. Litch, 62 Pa. 451; Aldridge v. Eshleman, 46 Pa. 420; Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sailer, 67 Pa. 108; Teutonia Fire Ins. Co. v. Mund, 102 Pa. 89; Hoffman v. Ætna Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 405; Morris' App. 88 Pa. 368.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

Clime agreed to do all the stone work of the building according to the plans furnished by the architect, and also do all necessary repairing to the old work, for the consideration of $4 per perch for the new. Nothing is said of the kind of stone in the writing.

The first story of the building was erected in 1876, roofed and used for worship until 1883. That story was built of gray stone from Bunting's quarry, and is the work referred to in the written agreement to be repaired and pointed. J. W. Bailey had charge of the construction of the work, and after consulting the trustees made contracts. The defendant furnished stone from Bunting's quarry for the greater part of the work, but on Clime's complaint that he was losing time by delay in delivery, stone was furnished from Gorman's quarry. Thus far the parties agreed as to the facts.

Clime testified that the stone from Gorman's was flinty and dryer, harder, more treacherous and plucky; and that he said to Bailey: "I want you distinctly to understand that these are not Bunting's stone; that it will cost me double as much to work this stone as to work Bunting's. He replied that the church people would make that all right." And this testimony is uncontradicted.

There was testimony tending to show that at and before the signing of the instrument Rudolph and Bailey told Clime that Bunting was to furnish the stone; that Clime knew what that stone was, as he had previously worked it; and thereupon he made the contract.

The plaintiff was the sole witness to so testify, and on this point he was contradicted by Rudolph and Bailey.

The only assignment of error is that the court refused to charge that "The plaintiff has failed to establish his claim for extra work in cutting and dressing 2,000 feet (superficial measure) of stone at twenty-five cents per foot, amounting to $500, and the jury will disregard it in making up their verdict. All evidence relating thereto is withdrawn from the jury."

It was not contended in the argument that the point should have been affirmed for any reason other than that the plaintiff's claim involved a contradiction of or addition to the terms of the written agreement; and the defendant urged that the testimony was insufficient for reformation of the instrument. Perhaps the evidence was insufficient to reform the instrument; but if it was explanatory of the subject and consistent with what is written, and necessary for its interpretation, it was sufficient to submit to the jury. Had the plaintiff demanded a softer stone, easier to work than Bunting's, the defendant would have understood that it was intended, if not expressed, that the new work should be of the kind of stone which was used in the first story. They would not have been satisfied with a call for stone of like color, more expensive for them to furnish than Bunting's, even if more profitable for the contractor.

That the building has been already partly constructed of stone from a convenient quarry tends to show that the parties meant it should be finished with stone of the same kind, in absence of evidence to the contrary. That the larger portion was furnished from that quarry before any was obtained from another is a circumstance immediately following the making of the agreement.

It can hardly be doubted that the parties understood what stone should be furnished and used. A familiar principle is that the circumstances at the making of the instrument may be proved when by itself it is affected with uncertainty. The intention of the parties may be ascertained by extrinsic testimony, and this intention will be taken as the meaning of the parties expressed in the instrument, if it be a meaning which may be distinctly determined from a fair and reasonable interpretation of the words actually used. If the words are clear, a different contract from that expressed cannot be made by proof of outside circumstances. But when a matter necessarily pertaining to the subject of the contract is unmentioned therein, parol testimony is admissible to ascertain the meaning.

"It is a rule of interpretation that the intention of the parties to a contract is to be ascertained by applying its terms to the subject matter. The admission of parol testimony for such purpose does not infringe upon the rule which makes a written instrument the proper and only evidence of the agreement contained in it. * * * It may be shown that a sample, to which the terms of the contract are applicable, was exhibited or referred to in the negotiation, and other statements then made may be resorted to."

Accordingly, it has been held that in an action on a written contract relating to advertising charts, parol testimony is admissible to show the material of which the chart was to be made and the manner in which it would be published. Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365.

The rule of law which forbids parol evidence to be received to contradict or vary a written instrument has reference to the terms of the writing. Evidence to explain the subject matter of an agreement is essentially different from that which varies the terms in which the contract is conceived. Barnhart v. Riddle, 29 Pa. 92.

Parol evidence is not admissible to alter or contradict what is written, but is admissible to explain and define the subject of a written agreement. Gould v. Lee, 55 Pa. 99.

Parol evidence of the circumstances, and of what was said by the parties as to the stone to be used under the contract, does not contradict or change any part of the writing, nor does it add another promise or nullify any of the written terms. The plaintiff was to do the work, the defendant to furnish the stone, and each was bound to perform, one by furnishing and the other by using the kind of stone to which they referred at the making of their agreement.

Had it been attempted to vary or contradict the terms of the agreement, or to show that the instrument meant either nothing or something else than is written, then the doctrine so well advanced in the defendant's argument would apply with full effect.

Judgment affirmed.

Elizabeth S. DAVIS, Executrix of Samuel C. Davis, deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.
John TINGLEY.

An affidavit of cause of action in foreign attachment, which stated that a partnership had been formed between Davis, the plaintiff's testator, and Tingley, the defendant, to manufacture a certain patented article; that the plaintiff's testator was to be a silent partner; that they granted the patent right to the garnishee for a royalty, recited "to be paid to Tingley;" but that the grant was in consideration that the royalties should be paid to the plaintiff's testator and the defendant, and that the defendant received them for their joint benefit, held to be sufficient, in connection with the agreements of partnership and grant of the patent right.

(Argued March 31, Decided April 11, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 162, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review the action of the court in dissolving a writ of foreign attachment. Reversed.

On October 11, 1886, the plaintiff issued the writ of foreign attachment against the defendant. It was served on Charles G. Blatchley, as garnishee. On November 30, 1886, rule to show cause of action was taken and on December 11, 1886, the plaintiff filed her affidavit of cause of action. On December 18, 1886, the rule was made absolute and the attachment dissolved. On December 21, 1886, this writ was filed in the court below.

On December 23, 1886, a rule was entered on the plaintiff to show cause why she should not file, as part of the affidavit of cause of action, a copy of articles of agreement of copartnership dated January 1, 1871, and a copy of agreement made with Charles G. Blatchley dated June 6, 1871, referred to in her affidavit and produced at the hearing of the rule to show cause of action.

The rule was made absolute January 8, 1887. The agreements recited that all the parties were of the City of Philadelphia.

Further facts appear by the opinion.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court: 1, in dissolving the writ; and 2, in ordering the plaintiff to file certain papers so as to make part of the record in this case after this writ of error had been brought into the office of the court below.

Mr. William C. Mayne, for plaintiff in error:

The affidavit of cause of action as filed by the plaintiff in this case was sufficient.

I. Because the action of account render is a proper remedy.

Act of October 13, 1840, P. L. 7; Shriver v. Nimick, 41 Pa. 81; Persch v. Quiggle, 57 Pa. 258.

An action of account render lies between copartners.

Tutton v. Addams, 45 Pa. 70; Griffith v. Willing, 3 Binn. 317; Irvine v. Hanlin, 10 Serg. & R. 221; Knerr v. Hoffman, 65 Pa. 126; Adams' App. 5 Cent. Rep. 135, 113 Pa. 449.

II. Because an action of account render can be commenced by foreign attachment; for to entitle a party to the benefit of this process, the plaintiff must show that the damages are reducible to such a standard as will enable the court to fix the amount of the bail.

Carland v. Cunningham, 37 Pa. 228; Fisher v. Consequa, 2 Wash. C. C. 382; Sergeant, Attachments, 54.

When an action of account render is the only form of action between the copartners, it is very plain there is no debt that can be attached. But where the partnership is a single transaction, or where the action of assumpsit would also lie, as in Ozeas v. Johnson, 1 Binn. 195; Andrews v. Allen, 9 Serg. & R. 241; Van Amringo v. Ellmaker, 4 Pa. 281, the proceeding can be commenced by writ of foreign attachment.

Strock v. Little, 45 Pa. 416; Knerr v. Hoffman, 65 Pa. 128.

Where the ground of the damages is specified, it seems that it is not necessary even to specifically allege them.

Hanson v. Watson, 13 W. N. C. 534.

A declaration in account render as between partners is sufficient, if it charge the defendant generally with the receipt of money for their joint benefit; and if the plaintiff proves a receipt of money from anyone mentioned in his declaration, he is entitled to a general verdict.

James v. Browne, 1 Dall. 339 (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 165); Martin v. Smith, 5 Binn. 16; 2 Troubat & H. Pr. § 1697.

The affidavit presenting a meritorious cause of action, sued by a proper action, the amount of the bail susceptible of a standard to be fixed by the court, the rule to show cause of action should have been discharged, and the amount of bail entered by the plaintiff approved or bail in lieu thereof prescribed.

2 Troubat & H. Pr. §§ 2272, 2273.

The plaintiff had a right to a trial by jury.

Pleasants v. Cowden, 7 Watts & S. 379; Murdock v. Steiner, 45 Pa. 349; Lancaster Co. Bank v. Gross, 50 Pa. 224; Lorenz v. Orlady, 87 Pa. 226; Steel v. Goodwin, 4 Cent. Rep. 659, 113 Pa. 288.

Mr. Leoni Melick, for defendant in error:

The royalty was not to be paid by Blatchley to Davis and Tingley, but to Tingley alone.

The affidavit of cause of action does not show that the defendant below was a nonresident and not in the county when the writ issued.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant asserts that the attachment was dissolved for the sole reason that no cause of action was shown. At the hearing the two contracts referred to in the plaintiff's affidavit were before the court; and subsequently, by order of the court, copies of said instruments were filed.

Davis and Tingley on January 1, 1871, agreed "to form a copartnership for the manufacture and sale of articles under their patent, known as Tingley's Patent Contracting Band for Casks and other vessels." It stated in the instrument that "Said Tingley has recently added the very important improvement known as the New Revolving Ice Cream Machine;" and they further agree that "In view of the important addition of the freezer to the original list of articles made under the said patent, the said Samuel L. Davis agrees to furnish $600, free of interest, as additional capital for the business."

They also stipulate that "Davis shall act as a silent partner, and that his name shall not be used or known publicly in connection with this partnership." And Tingley agreed to carry on the business for a named compensation.

On June 6, 1871, Davis and Tingley granted to Blatchley the exclusive right to use both patents referred to in the articles of copartnership, in the manufacture of ice cream freezers, within the United States, for a royalty or license fee of 5 per centum of the sales of said freezers, to be paid to said Tingley. The recital in this grant shows that Davis was a patentee in the first patent; and hence, the necessity that he should be a party to the grant to Blatchley.

The grant stopped the manufacture of freezers by Davis and Tingley, but it made no other change in their business so far as appears at present. Davis was a joint owner in the first patent, and for a valuable consideration; he had an interest in manufacturing under the second; and unless he was to share in the royalties and license fees paid by Blatchley, he gave away his interest so far as related to the use of the patents for manufacturing said freezers in the United States.

Nothing appears to indicate a gift. The affidavit sets forth that the grant was made in consideration that the royalties were to be paid to Davis and Tingley, and that Tingley received the same for their joint benefit. Tingley was to carry on the business of the partnership in his own name, and the provision that he should receive the royalties or license fees was consistent with the terms of their partnership. It is hardly probable that the silent partner, in the firm which was using both patents, would have joined in a sale of an important part of the business, as well as of the right to use the patents, without any real consideration for himself.

We think the plaintiff's affidavit and the agreements show cause of action.

The judgment dissolving the attachment is reversed, and procedendo awarded.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 431, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before WOODWARD, A. L. J., are stated in the opinion.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in excluding evidence of the judgment, execution and sale on the ground that the plaintiff had not shown title or color of title, and in admitting evidence of the alleged parol sale.

Messrs. N. Taylor and C. W. Kline, for plaintiff in error:

When the purchaser at sheriff's sale has to bring his ejectment against the person whose land was taken in execution or any person coming into possession under him, he need do no more than show the judgment and proceedings under it.

Little v. Delancey, 5 Binn. 270.

As between the purchaser and the defendants in the action, the purchaser can recover on the strength of the sale and the sheriff's deed, nor can the defendants show title in another.

Green v. Watrous, 17 Serg. & R. 393; Snavely v. Wagner, 3 Pa. 275; Drake v. Brown, 68 Pa. 223; Ferris v. Irons, 83 Pa. 179.

Possession must be delivered in execution of an alleged parol sale of land. A previous possession will not withdraw a parol sale from the effects of the Statute of Frauds.

There must be valuable improvements put upon the property, such as cannot be compensated in damages.

Moore v. Small, 19 Pa. 461; Postlethwait v. Frease, 31 Pa. 472.

There must be more than oath against oath; the parol contract must be proved, not only to the entire satisfaction of the jury but also of the court.

Sower v. Weaver, 78 Pa. 443; Brawdy v. Brawdy, 7 Pa. 157; Lord's App. 105 Pa. 451.

Whether the evidence is sufficient to take the case out of the statute is a question for the court and not for the jury.

Overmeyer v. Koerner, 81* Pa. 517, and cases there cited.

When the parol contract is not unequivocally established as required by law, the court should so instruct the jury.

Bowers v. Bowers, 95 Pa. 477; Detrick v. Sharrar, 95 Pa. 527.

(No brief filed for defendant in error.)

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 18th of November, 1876, the defendant, Edward Kelly, was in the possession of the land in controversy, and at that date the property was sold by the sheriff of Luzerne County, on process regularly issued from a judgment of the Freehold Building & Loan Association, against the said Kelly, to E. V. Jackson, the plaintiff's vendor, and a deed executed to him which was acknowledged in due form of law, on the 29th of November, 1876. By this sale and deed whatever of right or title the defendant had was conveyed to Jackson, the sheriff's vendee, and as against Kelly, the judgment, process and deed, as aforesaid, were conclusive and the court should have required nothing else from the plaintiff to establish a prima facie case. Drake v. Brown, 68 Pa. 223.

Against this prima facie title the defendant set up an oral sale from Birkbeck to himself. This alleged sale is supported only by his oath, and that is positively contradicted by Birkbeck. This of itself should have determined the controversy against him. Sower v. Weaver, 78 Pa. 443.

But aside from this, the proof did not establish a single element necessary to relieve the sale from the ban of the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries. There was no evidence of the payment of purchase money, or of the valuable improvements; neither was possession taken in pursuance of the alleged sale, for according to his own oath he was in possession when he bought. This fact standing alone, although every other requisite to take the case out of the statute had been proved, was sufficient to cut up the defendant's professed purchase by the roots, and to leave him without the shadow of a defense. Myers v. Byerly, 45 Pa. 368; Christy v. Barnhart, 14 Pa. 260.

As what we have said does, in effect, sustain all the assignments of error we need not discuss them separately.

The judgment is reversed and a new venire ordered.

JANUARY Term, 1887, Nos. 158–161, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment discharging a rule to show cause why certain judgments and executions in attachment proceedings should not be set aside. Affirmed.

Reported below, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 206.

This is a contention between two sets of attachment creditors.

Herman F. Bachman, William Gerlach, Edward V. Maitland and William H. Lex obtained separate judgment against John J. Thomas, and caused attachments to be issued thereon against Thomas Shipley, executor of the will of Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased, to attach in his hands the interest of the defendant John J. Thomas in said estate, he being a legatee under the will of said Harvey. To each of the three former writs the sheriff made following return:

"Attached as commanded and made known to garnishee as follows: by leaving a true and attested copy of the within writ at the dwelling house of Thomas Shipley, executor, etc., residing at corner Locust and Magnolia Avenues, Germantown, with an adult member of his family, December 5, 1884, at 11.45, A. M., and by giving a like copy to John J. Thomas, defendant, and making known to him the contents thereof, December 5, 1884."

The return to the last writ was similar in all respects; save that it was served on the garnishee later in the same day, and on the defendant, December 6, 1884.

Judgments were entered upon the answers of the garnishee to the interrogatories filed, to bind only such sum or sums as should be found to be due to John J. Thomas as legatee and distributee, upon the settlement of the estate of said Harvey.

On December 4, 1885, Maitland, Gerlach, and Bachman issued writs of fi. fa. returnable the first Monday of December, 1885, under which the sheriff levied on all the real and personal property of John J: Thomas, the defendant, in the hands and possession of Thomas Shipley, as garnishee, and all the interest of the said John J. Thomas, of, in and to the estate of Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased, in the hands of Thomas Shipley, as executor aforesaid.

The sale was advertised for Wednesday, December 30, 1885.

No execution was issued in the Lex case. Subsequent to the service of the writs of attachment in the cases as above mentioned, Austin M. Purves, on a judgment obtained in the U. S. Circuit Court, caused an attachment to be issued against Thomas Shipley as executor of Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased, to which the marshall made the following return:

"Attached as commanded by going to Thomas Shipley on Monday, December 7, 1885, at 12.30 P. M., at his office No. 21 North Seventh Street, Philadelphia, and then and there declaring in his presence and in the presence of George Frescoln, of No. 21 North Seventh Street, and Elliston P. Morris, of 21 North Seventh Street, two credible persons of the neighborhood, that I attached the goods and effects of John J. Thomas, in the hands of the said Thomas Shipley, and particularly the interest of said John J. Thomas in the estate of Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased, in the hands of the said Thomas Shipley, executor of the will of said Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased, and made known to the said Thomas Shipley, executor aforesaid, garnishee, by giving him a true and attested copy of the within writ, and making known to him the contents thereof, on said December 7, 1885, at 12.30 P. M."

After the issuing of the executions in the cases of Maitland, Gerlach and Bachman, Austin M. Purves filed an affidavit which set forth the facts above stated, and alleged that the service of the attachments issued by the several plaintiffs above named are invalid, as not made in the manner provided by the Acts of Assembly, of April 13, 1843, P. L. 235, and June 13, 1836, § 48, P. L. 580; that the attachment issued upon the deponent's judgment has been duly served in accordance with the Act of Assembly aforesaid, and, therefore, is the first and only lien upon the interest of said John J. Thomas, in the estate of said Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased.

Upon this affidavit the court granted a rule to show cause why the judgments in favor of Lex, Maitland, Gerlach and Bachman against the garnishee, and the executions issued in favor of Maitland, Gerlach and Bachman should not be set aside and service of the writs of attachment quashed. After hearing, the court discharged this rule; and Purves took this writ, assigning such action of the court as error.

Messrs. J. M. & W. P. Gest, for plaintiff in error:

I. A legacy can only be attached under the Act of April 13, 1843, § 10, P. L. 235, Bright. Purd. 746, in the same manner as debts due are made subject to attachment by the Act of June 16, 1836, entitled "An Act Relating to Executions." §§ 32–37, P. L. 767, Purd. 745.

II. Under the above Acts a legacy like a debt due can only be "attached and levied in satisfaction of a judgment in the manner allowed in the case of a foreign attachment," that is under the Foreign Attachment Act of June 13, 1836, § 48, P. L. 580, Bright. Purd. 824, which provides, "In the case of personal property the attachment shall be executed as follows, viz.: 'The officer to whom such writ shall be directed shall go to the person in whose hands or possession the defendant's goods or effects are supposed to be, and then and there declare in the presence of one or more credible persons of the neighborhood that he attaches said goods and effects.' "

III. Goods and effects, including therein, debts due, can be attached by process of foreign attachment only in the prescribed manner; that is, by the declaration of the sheriff in the presence of one or more credible witnesses of the neighborhood, that he attaches said goods and effects,—and this is clear:

1. From the plain and direct wording of the Acts of Assembly.

2. From the nature of the writ and the attachment process in rem.

3. From the decided cases.

Hoolisten v. Goodale, 8 Conn. 332; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Pennock, 51 Pa. 244, 253; Hayes v. Gillespie, and Lambert v. Challis, 35 Pa. 155, 156; Vandergrift's App. 83 Pa. 126; Shriver v. Harbaugh, 37 Pa. 399; Jaffray's App. 101 Pa. 583; Morgan v. Watmough, 5 Whart. 125; Hunter v. Clarke, 16 W. N. C. 558; Wanamaker v. Stevens, 43 Legal Int. 56; Connell v. Godfrey, 22 Pittsb. L. J. 136.

IV. The attachment execution, assimilated to the foreign attachment both by its very nature and the Acts of Assembly, is really a combination of two writs: one, the attachment directed against the res or thing attached, and to be executed by the solemn declaration in the presence of a credible witness, and the other a clause of scire facias to the person garnished or warned of the attachment. Both commands of the writ must be obeyed, in order to perfect the attachment.

Wray v. Tammany, 13 Pa. 394; Gochenaur v. Hostetter, 18 Pa. 414; Lex v. Potters, 16 Pa. 295; Fitch v. Ross, 4 Serg. & R. 563; Childs v. Digby, 24 Pa. 23; Franklin v. Rush, 1 Phila. 571; Strouse v. Becker, 44 Pa. 206; Kase v. Kase, 34 Pa. 130; Stewart v. M'Minn, 5 Watts & S. 100; Lorenz v. King, 38 Pa. 93; Schober v. Mather, 49 Pa. 21; Poor v. Colburn, 57 Pa. 415; Skidmore v. Bradford, 4 Pa. 300.

V. Every question which has yet arisen upon the construction of the Act of June 16, 1836, on attachment executions, has been decided upon the analogies afforded by the Act of June 13, 1836, on foreign attachment, and the cases decided under that Act.

Neely v. Grantham, 58 Pa. 438; Baldwin's App. 86 Pa. 483; Roth's App. 94 Pa. 186; Raiguel v. McConnell, 25 Pa. 362; Shaffer v. Watkins, 7 Watts & S. 227; Reed v. Penrose, 36 Pa. 238; Hall v. Knapp, 1 Pa. 213; Fulweiler v. Hughes, 17 Pa. 447; Rhoads v. Megonigal, 2 Pa. 39; Layman v. Bean, 6 Whart. 181; Sheetz v. Hobensack, 20 Pa. 412; Silverwood v. Bellas, 8 Watts. 420; Mahon v. Kunkle, 50 Pa. 216.

VI. The provision in the Act of June 16, 1836, § 36, that the writ shall be served on the garnishee as a summons in a personal action, has no reference to the execution of the attachment itself, but was intended simply to point out the method in which an attachment properly executed might be perfected by the service of the scire facias contained in the writ upon the persons entitled to notice.

VII. If the property itself is not attached in the statutory manner, but the writ is served merely "as a summons" on the garnishee, the property or res is not brought within the jurisdiction of the court; and a judgment rendered in the suit is ineffectual to bind the property, and is absolutely void. Other attaching creditors, whose attachments have been levied on the res and who have thus acquired a valid lien upon it, have a right to intervene and show the invalidity of prior attachments.

Mr. Wm. Henry Lex, for Lex, Messrs. Harry L. Neall and James W. Latta, for Bachman, Gerlach and Maitland, defendants in error, and Messrs. Rufus E. Shapley and David W. Sellers, for the Sheriff of Philadelphia County:

I. The attachments of the defendants in error were issued under the provisions of the Act of April 13, 1843, § 10, Pl. 235, Bright. Purd. 746, against the distributive share of John J. Thomas, the defendant, in the hands of the executor of Samuel Harvey, Jr., deceased; and the attachments were executed and pursued to final judgment in accordance with the requirements of the law.

In the case of an absent foreign debtor, foreign attachment is an efficient remedy against his three classes of property, viz.: 1, real property; 2, personal property (goods and effects); 3, debts and choses in action.

Prior to the Act of June 16, 1836, a debtor's debts and choses in action could not be made responsible to satisfy his own obligations. That Act provided a remedy, commonly known as attachment in execution, by which this class of property could be taken in execution. To this end it operated primarily to transfer to the plaintiff the right to sue and recover from the debtor of the defendant and apply the results in satisfaction of the judgment, as fully and amply as the defendant himself might have done.

The Act in this particular has reference wholly to intangible things, and is essentially a garnishment, rather than an attachment.

In 1843 the Legislature extended the foreign attachment process so as to include the interest of an absent foreign debtor in either of the three classes of property obtained in the estate of a decedent by will or intestacy.

Act of April 13, 1843, § 10, P. L. 235.

This Act is utterly without provision for its enforcement except that the proceedings must be according to the terms of the Act of 1836.

II. Under the Act of June 16, 1836, debts due may be attached and levied in satisfaction of a judgment, in the manner allowed in the case of a foreign attachment; and section 36, in providing that the writ shall be served in the manner provided for the service of a writ of summons in a personal action, clearly regulates the manner in which the garnishment shall be made, and is, as well, declaratory of the manner allowed in the case of foreign attachment against a debt or chose in action.

King v. Hyatt, 41 Pa. 233.

In Pennsylvania the action of foreign attachment is not a purely statutory remedy, depending solely upon the statutes for its life and vigor, but is part of our common law, having been brought here, together with other customs, by the earliest colonists, who were largely citizens of the privileged Cities of London, Bristol and Liverpool. And if all the laws that are now, or ever have been, on the statute books of this Commonwealth were repealed, the process of foreign attachment would nevertheless be open to suitors as a remedy for the collection of debts.

Lyle v. Richards, 9 Serg. & R. 330; Duke of Yorke's Book of Laws, pp. 149, 150, 153, 162, 171, 212, 289; Sergeant, Attachments, p. 48; Craighle v. Notnagle, 1 Pet. C. C. 249; Schacklett's App. 14 Pa. 329.

There is no particular mode prescribed by the Act regulating foreign attachment for the garnishment of a debt or chose in action, although there is full and complete provision for the subsequent proceedings to compel the garnishee to answer as well for his debts to the absent defendant as for the real and personal property, goods and effects of said defendant in his hands or possession.

"Goods and chattels" is a term which includes not only personal property in possession, but choses in action and chattels real.

There has been a constant practice "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary" to garnish or attach a debt merely by service of the writ of attachment on the garnishee.

Per Curiam:

These four cases were argued together. Each presents the question of the sufficiency of the service of the writ of attachment which issues on a judgment. The property attached was not of that kind of movable property which the officer of the law could take into his possession. It was debts due from the garnishee to the defendant in the judgment. Whatever doubt may exist as to the manner of service necessary where the purpose is to reach some kind of property, it is clear that a debt may be attached in the manner these were; that is, in the manner provided for the service of a writ of summons in a personal action,

Judgment in each case affirmed.

SEFF'S ESTATE.

1. Where the maternal grandmother of a minor under fourteen years old petitions for the appointment of a guardian of the estate to which the petitioner alleges the minor is entitled, and the minor's father answers denying that the minor is entitled to any estate whatever, the proper practice is to take testimony to determine the truth of the respective allegations; but a decree appointing a fit person guardian on petition and answer will not be reversed.

2. A decree appointing a guardian of the person and estate of a minor, in accordance with the prayer of a petition, may be amended by limiting the guardianship to the estate, although the father of the minor has meanwhile filed an appeal from the decree.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 357, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Schuylkill County, appointing a guardian of the estate of two minors. Affirmed.

The petition of Elizabeth Olenick set forth that she was the grandmother of Solomon Seff and Isidore Seff, minor children of Selina Seff, late of the Borough of Pottsville, deceased, under the age of fourteen years; that they had no guardian to take care of their persons and estates; that there was a personal estate of about $2,500 belonging to them, left by their mother, and that said property was being used and employed by their father in business, and that she feared it might be lost or wasted, and therefore prayed the appointment of a guardian for them.

Harris Seff, the father of the children, filed an answer the same day, that this application was made without any notice to him, and without his knowledge or consent; that Mrs. Olenick was a resident of New York, and not on friendly terms with him, and was trying to make trouble between him and his children; that he resided in Pottsville, where he was permanently engaged in business, and had his said children living with him; that he was keeping, supporting and educating them, and was, as always, willing and able to provide for them, and to look after their welfare, and that there was no occasion for any interference between him and his children.

Afterward he filed a second answer in which he denied that said Selina Seff left any estate whatsoever, or that the children had any estate.

Afterward the court below, without taking testimony, entered the following decree:

"And now, February 21, 1887, upon reading within petition, the court appoints I. J. Lichtenberg, guardian of said minors, and directs that he give bond in the sum of $300 for each child, with surety to be approved by the court."

From this decree Harris Seff, in February 24, 1887, appealed, and on the same day, but afterward the court made this order:

"And now, February 24, 1887, it is hereby ordered that the above application be filed, and that the appointment of I. J. Lichtenberg, as guardian, made upon the 21st of February, last, be modified and changed so as to constitute and make the said Lichtenberg only guardian of the estates of the said minor children."

Mr. A. W. Schalck, for appellant:

The appointment of a guardian is a final decision upon the right to the care and control of the person of the minor, or to the possession and management of his estate, or to both, as the case may be. It is not an interlocutory order, but a definitive decree from which an appeal lies to this court.

Senseman's App. 21 Pa. 334; Heinemann's App. 96 Pa. 112; Pote's App. 15 W. N. C. 289.

Where the father is in full life, and within the jurisdiction of the court, he ought to have notice of the proceedings, and is entitled to be heard.

Senseman's App. 21 Pa. 333.

Testimony should have been taken, and the truth of the charges legally established by proofs.

Heinemann's App. 96 Pa. 112.

The modification of the order first made was beyond the power of the court. Filing the appeal suspended the court's jurisdiction.

"Any person aggrieved by a definitive sentence or decree of the orphans' court may appeal from the same to the supreme court:——— which appeal, thenceforth shall stay all proceedings in the orphans' court until the same be determined in the supreme court, and the record be remitted to the orphan's court."

Act of March 29, 1832, § 59, Purd. Dig. ed. 1883, p. 1286, pl. 62.

The power of the orphans' court to appoint a guardian is purely statutory.

"The orphans' court of each county shall have the care of persons of minors resident within such county, and of their estates; and shall have power to admit such minors when, and as often as there shall be occasion to make choice of a guardian, and to appoint guardians for such as they shall judge too young," etc.

Act of March 29, 1832, P. L. 191.

The court has no power to appoint a guardian for minors, simply because some one (perhaps an entire stranger or an interloper) asks it, or because some relative or pretended friend, out of whim or caprice, or perhaps from improper motives, demands it,

There must be "occasion" for it, a legal cause or ground for the action or interference of the court.

McCann's App. 49 Pa. 304; Gray's App. 96 Pa. 243

This occasion to warrant the action of the court, when questioned, must be legally shown, and the ex parte affidavit attached to the petition does not per se establish anything.

Pittsburg's App. 79 Pa. 317.

Mr. John W. Ryon, for appellee:

The Act of March 29, 1832, provides that the orphans' court of each county shall have the care of minors residing within such county, and of their estates, and shall have power to admit such minors, when and as often as there shall be occasion, to make choice of guardians and to appoint guardians of such as they shall adjudge too young or otherwise incompetent to make choice for themselves.

The orphans' court is to judge whether there is occasion for the appointment of a guardian and is to judge of the fitness of the person proposed for the guardian. A legal discretion is vested in the orphans' court to appoint guardians of the persons and estates of minors; and such discretion is not the subject of review in a court of error.

Gray's App. 96 Pa. 243; McCann's App. 49 Pa. 304.

Per Curiam:

As a matter of correct practice evidence should have been taken before making the decree; but modified as it has been, and being now restricted to a guardianship of the estate only, of the minor children, we cannot discover that the appellant is injured thereby. If they have no estate as he avers, the guardian will take nothing from him. If they have some which the appellant conceals, the necessity for a guardian is apparent.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

(Argued April 6, Decided April 25, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 274, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trespass on the case. Reversed.

The declaration was as follows:

Daniel McLafferty, Dennis McDevitt, Hugh Peyton, Charles Fay, Patrick McCormick, Thomas Caton, Charles Aikins and Patrick O'Brien were summoned to answer Hugh Sweeney of a plea of trespass on the case; whereupon, the said plaintiff, by Richard P. White, his attorney, complains. for that whereas the said plaintiff, heretofore, to wit: on the first day of April, 1884, at the county aforesaid was member of a certain beneficial society named, to wit: the Rev. Hugh McLaughlin Beneficial Association, and as such member, under the laws and rules thereof, was entitled to receive certain benefit and payments in case of his sickness, and the said defendants did then and there conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, unlawfully and unjustly, to expel the said plaintiff from the said society and to deprive him of his rights and membership thereof, and of the payments due and which were to fall due to him from the said society by reason of his sickness. And the said defendants in the pursuance of the said unlawful and wicked conspiracy, combination, confederacy and agreement, and for carrying the same into effect, did afterwards, to wit: on the day and year last aforesaid, took, pushed and shoved the said plaintiff, and caused and procured the said plaintiff to be taken, pushed and shoved from a certain room in which the said plaintiff was present at a meeting of the said society; hindered, prevented and totally excluded the said plaintiff from that time to again enter the said room and from attending or being present at the said meeting and the subsequent meetings of the said society, and hindered and prevented the said plaintiff from claiming, having or obtaining any benefits and payments from the said society by reason of his said membership and sickness.

By means of which several premises the said plaintiff has lost and been deprived of his rights and privilege of attending and being present at the meetings of said society, and of having and receiving sick benefits and payments from the said society. And other wrongs to the said plaintiff then and there did, to the damage of the said plaintiff $5,000; therefore he brings suit.

The defendants pleaded not guilty.

At the trial before PIERCE, J., the following facts appeared:

Plaintiff joined the "Rev. Hugh McLaughlin Beneficial Society" in 1869, and prior to 1880 had been drawing frequent benefits from the society. In 1880 he claimed to be sick again, and the stewards, whose business it was, visited him, and after paying him one week's benefits ($5) declined to pay him any more, because, as they alleged, they could see nothing the matter with him, and he declined to show them a certificate which he claimed Dr. Thomas G. Morton had given him. The stewards reported to the society adversely to plaintiff's claim for benefits. He then went to counsel, who in September, 1880, sent a claim to the society for $35, being seven weeks' benefits at $5 per week. Thereafter on September 7, 1880, the society voted to request plaintiff to arbitrate, and notified him of it the next day; but he declined to arbitrate.

His claim not having been paid, suit was brought by him against the society before a magistrate, and judgment obtained October 4, 1880, from which an appeal was taken to the court of common pleas.

April 5, 1881, John H. Kirk, a member, made a charge against Sweeney that he had violated the by-laws of the society by not having an arbitration to settle his dispute with the society before going to law; and May 10, 1881, a special meeting of the society was called to consider the charge, at which meeting Sweeney was present and took part—the vote on expulsion being 116 in favor to 29 against it.

January 6, 1882, the appeal was tried in the court of common pleas, before Biddle, J., and a nonsuit was entered, on the ground that plaintiff should have complied with the by-laws as to arbitration before bringing suit.

After the nonsuit in 1882 he alleges that he was ready to arbitrate; but as in the meantime he had been expelled, the society did not consider him a member.

In September, 1882, he filed a petition for a mandamus in Common Pleas No. 3, against the society, which it answered, to which answer a demurrer was filed. On March 24, 1884, judgment was entered for the relator on the demurrer.

On April 1, 1884, a regular meeting of the society was being held, when plaintiff and a stranger were discovered to be present. The secretary announced that he had business of importance to lay before the meeting, but could not do so as long as persons were present who were not members; whereupon, the stranger left. Plaintiff said he was as good a member as anyone present, and refused to leave, He now asserts that he said in a loud voice that the court had so decided. In this statement he is contradicted by almost every other witness. However, he did not show any authority of any kind from the court. No one present in the room knew of any decision of the court, except the secretary, and he has not been made a defendant. Plaintiff persisted in remaining. A member then offered a resolution as follows:

"Whereas, Hugh Sweeney appeared in this hall and claimed to be a member of this society, without any authority being shown by him for such claim, and having been requested by the president to leave the hall and Mr. Sweeney's refusal to do so,

"Resolved, That the president requests the assistance of police officers to put Sweeney out of the hall."

This resolution was agreed to, and in pursuance of it the president, McLafferty, requested the doorkeeper to call in an officer, who laid his hand on Sweeney's shoulder and told him to go out, which he did.

After plaintiff was put out the secretary read a communication from the counsel of the society which stated that No. 3 Court had decided to reinstate plaintiff, and which further advised an appeal to the supreme court. By a resolution the society decided to follow the advice of counsel and an appeal was taken.

In May, 1885, the supreme court affirmed the decree of the common pleas, and plaintiff then took a certificate of the decree to the society. Counsel advised the society that plaintiff was compelled to pay back dues before reinstatement; and when the president and secretary told plaintiff what counsel had advised, and that he must pay the back dues or they could not reinstate him, he procured an attachment to be issued against them for contempt in not obeying the decree, and they were fined.

Immediately thereafter plaintiff was reinstated by putting his name on the roll as usual, and he has continued a member since.

Of the defendants, Aikins never was a member of the society, and never was present; Thomas Caton was not present on April 1, 1884; Dennis McDevitt did not come in until just before plaintiff was put out.

The court, after reviewing the testimony and calling attention to the action of the defendants for which the action was brought, charged the jury as follows:

Now, you have heard the evidence and it is for you to say whether this was done in pursuance of an unlawful conspiracy on the part of the defendants in this action to deprive him, the plaintiff, of his rights of membership in this society.

[These societies are very beneficial to the poor, to the laboring classes, who most usually take advantage of them, and they ought to be encouraged in the line of their duty; but if they go beyond that and do what they ought not to do, then they are liable for their acts or omissions like other individuals or associations.

In this case it is alleged that he, the plaintiff, refused to arbitrate; and in refusing to do that refused to do his duty; and if these defendants, members of the society, did that which they ought not to have done, the law will visit upon them the damages for their misdoing, for any offense against the rights of a private member.

It is for you to say, however, whether what they did was in the line of their duties as members of the society or whether they went outside of their duties as members of the society to oppress this man. If they did that, then they would be liable for anything not in the line of their duty as members of the society.]

It is charged that the defendants, or this society or some of them, were not only depriving him of his rights as a member but also undertook to find fault with what the court had done. In that instance, however, the court vindicated itself and imposed a fine.

[There is one feature in the case that strikes me with considerable force; and that is, at the meeting in 1884, I think it was, they then knew or ought to have known that there had been a decision in favor of Mr. Sweeney and which they disregarded. Sweeney says that he told them of this; and it is admitted that the secretary of the society had with him a letter from the counsel for the society, notifying them of the decision of the Court of Common Pleas No. 3; notwithstanding which they undertook to expel him, and did put him out by main force. Even if the secretary had no such notice from the counsel, Sweeney, if you believe him, said enough to put them on inquiry, at least as to whether he had been sustained in court; but they went right ahead and put him out—expelled him.]

The defendants submitted, inter alia, the following points:

2. "There is no evidence in this case of any illegal combination between the defendants."

3. "Under all the evidence the verdict should be for the defendants."

After refusing these points the court added: "[Mr. White calls my attention to the fact that I have said nothing about punitive damages; that I intended to embrace that subject. If you are satisfied that the plaintiff was expelled improperly, you can visit upon the defendants what in the law are known as punitive damages; not simply compensatory damages, but done to punish the defendants; that is, if the act was done willfully and maliciously.]"

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff for $449.50.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets; the refusal of the points quoted, and the action of the court in admitting in evidence for plaintiff the record of the mandamus case, and in admitting in evidence for plaintiff facts before and after April 1, 1884, the date laid in the narr.

Messrs. Mann & Miles, Thomas P. Judge and E. Cooper Shapley, for plaintiffs in error:

An action does not lie against individuals for acts erroneously done by them in a corporate capacity, from which detriment happens to the plaintiff.

Harman v. Tappenden, 1 East, 271.

If an individual stockholder has suffered damages in a contract with the corporation, through the fraudulent and illegal acts of the directors, done by color of their office, his only remedy is against the corporation.

Smith v. Poor, 40 Maine, 415; Hilliard, Torts, 419.

Many acts which, if productive of harm to a single person, are mere torts, become crimes when they result in damage to a large number of persons; and all proceedings which are invasions of the rights or privileges, not of some one individual specially, but of the public at large, or which are detrimental to the general well being or to the interests of the State, similarly fall under the category of crimes.

Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 272, citing 1 Bennett, Lead. Cr. Cas. p. 174.

Under the principle of Hyatt v. Johnston, 91 Pa. 196, and many similar cases, the court should not have sent the case to the jury.

See also Newall v. Jenkins, 26 Pa. 159; Gaunce v. Backhouse, 37 Pa. 350; Kirkpatrick v. Lex, 49 Pa. 122.

In order to recover damages in an action on the case for a conspiracy, a criminal intent must be proved to exist in the minds of all the defendants. A transaction, honest in fact, yet against legal policy would not constitute a conspiracy.

Biever v. Herr, 1 Pearson, 510.

Admitting the record of the mandamus case was error.

It is a record between Sweeney as plaintiff, and the corporation as defendant, and is therefore between third parties and cannot bind defendants.

If it shows anything, it is that this action should be against the corporation, and not against the individual members.

A great distinction exists between tortious and contractual liability for acts ultra vires. It is no defense to legal proceedings in tort that the torts were ultra vires. If the torts have been done by the corporation, or by their direction, they are liable for the results, however much in excess of their powers such torts may be.

Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 265, citing Sharp v. Mayor, 40 Barb. 273; Salt Lake City v. Hollister, Book 30, U. S. Sup. Ct. Reports, 176, L. C. P. Co. decided May 10, 1886.

Admitting evidence of facts before and after April 1, 1884, was error.

The narr. averred one date only, viz.: April 1, 1884. As this is a quasi criminal action, plaintiff should have been confined to his narr. In any event, facts subsequent to the date laid should not have been admitted.

This is not similar to a case where the narr. charges the occurrences as having happened between two dates.

The narr. charges one specific act at a meeting of the society on a certain date. Defendants were entitled to know what they would have to meet. To allow evidence as to other dates and other acts is to mislead defendants.

Messrs. Thomas E. White, George H. Earle, Jr., and Richard P. White, for defendant in error:

Parties who by concerted action prevent a citizen from obtaining the fruits of a decision of the courts are personally liable to him.

Findlay v. McAllister, 113 U. S. 104 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 930).

If a wrong doer in fact had authority from a corporation so to act, both are liable.

Bates v. Pilling, 6 Barn. & C. 38.

Any other rule would be absurd; for the law would indeed be easily evaded, if wrong doers must escape by simply announcing that they intended to commit their torts for others.

Where a state official invades the rights of a citizen under the express mandate of that State's law, he is liable as a trespasser, unless he can establish the State's constitutional right to pass the law.

Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 282 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 185).

While the continued, joint, persistent and known invasion of the plaintiff's rights by the defendants is ample evidence that they conspired to so injure him, it is settled that the gist of actions of conspiracy is the wrong done; and proof of the conspiracy is only essential as to defendants who took no other part in the perpetration of that wrong, further than combining to commit it; and as the direct participation of each of the defendants has been shown, the question of conspiracy becomes of but little moment, although largely discussed by defendants.

Laverty v. Vanarsdale, 65 Pa. 507.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

The testimony adduced by the plaintiff, in the court below, and as we have it now before us, exhibits no cause of action against the defendants. There is not the slightest evidence of a conspiracy to deprive him of the rights and benefits of the association to which he belonged. He was expelled in a regular manner, and by the decisive majority of ninety in a vote of 116.

The action was that of the corporation, and was final and conclusive, until reversed by the judgment of the court of common pleas. When that court gave its judgment in his favor on the mandamus, it was his business to serve the decree, in a regular manner, on the officers of the society; and if, in that case, they did not restore him, he had his remedy by attachment, which, it seems, he finally resorted to.

But when he appeared at the April meeting, he appeared, so far as the association knew, as an intruder without right, and on being requested, as he was, by a vote of the members then present, to retire, he should have quietly obeyed; and not having done so, he made himself liable to forcible expulsion. His declaration that he had been restored by the judgment of the court, even if heard by a majority of those present, was not the kind of information that they were bound to regard; they had a right to require the production of the order of the court; and even after that, they were entitled to a reasonable time for its consideration, and for that purpose might well have ordered him to retire from the lodge room.

Instead of pursuing this regular and quiet course, he chose to intrude himself on the society and attempt his own restoration, in a manner which accorded rather with his own will than with propriety and law. The result of his experiment is on himself; fortunately, it was not at all serious; and as he was finally restored to his membership he has nothing of which to complain. But had the result been more serious than it was, it could not have been visited on the defendants, since they did nothing in the transaction but what they were warranted to do in the exercise of their corporate rights.

The judgment of the court below is now reversed and set aside.

Louiza DURAIND, Trustee, Appt.,
v.
George L. DYCH, Admr., et al.

An instrument in the form of a deed, purporting to convey lands to a trustee, in trust for the trustee's children, the grantor reserving the right to collect the rents, issues and profits for her own use during life, was duly signed and acknowledged, but not in the presence of the trustee or cestuis que trustent, and no consideration paid; and it was retained by the grantor in her possession until death. Held, that it was not a valid deed.

(Argued March 29, Decided April 11, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 117, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from decree of Common Pleas No. 2, of Philadelphia County, dismissing a bill in equity to compel delivery of deed. Affirmed.

The facts appear by the opinion of the court on exceptions to the report of William Kelley, Esq., Master, the opinion being by FELL, J., as follows:

The bill in this case was filed to compel the delivery to the grantee of a deed, executed by Marie F. Duraind, now deceased, and found in her trunk, by the administrator of her estate, and to restrain the defendants from interfering with the control of the property described in the deed.

The master finds that Marie F. Duraind was the owner in fee of a lot of ground, situate at the corner of Twelfth Street and Sheaf Alley, in the City of Philadelphia.

In August, 1879, about four years and six months before her death, she directed her attorney to prepare a deed conveying the property to Louiza Duraind, the widow of her deceased brother, in trust for her, the said Louiza's, six children, reserving to the grantor "the right to collect the rents, issues and profits of the said property for her own use during her life."

In pursuance of this direction the deed was prepared and handed to her on the 8th of August, 1879, and on the same day taken by her to a notary and acknowledged. The only explanation of her intention made to anyone was to her attorney, to whom she said that, in case of her death, she wished all of her property to go to the children of her deceased brother James, as her sister Josephine had treated her badly, and she was determined that she should have none of her property.

The deed was retained by the grantor and was found in her trunk after her death, which occurred January 31, 1884. The fact of its existence had never been communicated to the trustee or any of the parties in interest, all of whom resided in California. The consideration named, $10,500, was, of course, not paid, and the receipt at the end of the deed was unsigned.

At the time that this deed was prepared, another deed to the same party and upon the same trust, for a property at Jenkintown, Pa., was prepared. Both deeds were received by her from her attorney and acknowledged by her at the same time. She afterwards sold this property and deposited the money received therefor in a savings institution in Philadelphia, where it was at the time of her death. The last mentioned deed was also found in her trunk, but was torn in two. Upon this finding of facts, the master recommends a decree dismissing the bill.

[Excepting the reservation in the deed, this case does not differ materially from Critchfield v. Critchfield, 24 Pa. 100.] In that case a father executed a deed for land to his son, but retained the deed in his possession until his death. The son had no knowledge of the deed, which had not been recorded, until it was found among his father's papers. Notwithstanding evidence that the father had said to a stranger that he had given the land to his son, that he would keep the title during his life, but that the son would get the land after his death, it was held that the intention of the grantor that the deed should be delivered after his death was insufficient, and no title passed.

It was urged upon the argument of the case before us that as the grantor had reserved an interest, she had a motive for retaining the deed, and that its retention by her was not inconsistent with the belief that she regarded it as a completed intrument; and Scrugham v. *Wood, 15 Wend. 545, and Souverbye v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 240, were cited in support of this view.

The facts in Scrugham v. Wood are very similar to those of the case under consideration, except that the deed was acknowledged by the trustee and recorded. A father in that case conveyed his property in trust for the benefit of his children, he to possess and enjoy the premises during life, to enable him to apply the proceeds to their support and education. The deed was signed by the grantor and the trustees, acknowledged by all the parties, recorded, and after his death found among his papers. It was held to be valid.

In Souverbye v. Arden it was held by the court that "A voluntary settlement fairly made is always binding in equity upon the grantor, unless there be clear and decisive proof that he never parted or intended to part with the possession of the deed; and if he retain it, there must be other circumstances besides the mere fact of his retaining it to show that it was not intended to be absolute." In this case the fact of the conveyance had been, at the time it was made, communicated to all the parties in interest, and the deed delivered to the trustee. It afterwards came into the possession of the grantor, and the attempt was to defeat the deed by proof of a subsequent condition.

In Garnons v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 671, a leading case upon the subject, in which there is a full discussion of the authorities referred to in the preceding cases, a conveyance was made by an attorney to secure an indebtedness to his client for money misapplied. The misapplication of the money and a promise to secure him were communicated to the grantee. The deed was handed by the grantor to his sister to hold for the grantee. Upon the trial the distinct question was whether the delivery to the third party was a good delivery; and the jury were instructed that if the delivery was a parting with the possession and the power and control over the deed for the benefit of the grantee, in order that it might be delivered to him in the grantor's lifetime or after his death, the delivery was good; but if delivered for safe keeping for the grantor, to be subject to his future control and disposition, it was not a good delivery. On this instruction the jury found the delivery good, and, upon the argument of a motion for a new trial, the correctness of the instruction, as well as the sufficiency of the evidence to justify such a finding, was raised. The court held the instruction to be correct, and that the evidence justified the finding of the jury. The further question was considered, "whether where a deed is duly signed and sealed, and formally delivered with apt words of delivery, but is retained by the party executing it, that retention will obstruct the operation of the deed;" and it was said: "Where an instrument is formally sealed and delivered, and there is nothing to qualify the delivery except the keeping of the deed in the hands of the executing party, and nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately, it is a valid and effectual deed; delivery to the party who is to take under it, or to any other person for his use, is not essential."

In all of the cases cited in support of this opinion, Boughton v. Boughton, 1 Atk. 625; Clavering v. Clavering, 2 Vern. 473; Naldred v. Gilham, 1 P. Wms. 576, and Lloyd v. Bennett, 8 Carr & P. 124, there had either been an actual delivery to a third party or a formal delivery of the deed.

These cases do not in any degree affect the settled rule that [delivery is essential to the validity of a deed] and that a mere intention to convey, where the conveyance is voluntary and the determining act is unexecuted, is without effect.

---

* See note, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

After the delivery the deed may remain in the possession of the grantor; but delivery, actual or constructive, is essential to its validity. Acts of the grantor in relation to the deed, such as recording, may give rise to the legal presumption of delivery. Stewart v. Riddett, 3 Md. 67.

The recording of a deed is a publication and places the title under the control of the grantee as effectually as the delivery of a deed. [It is, moreover, an act inconsistent with any other thought than that the grantor has finally and completely devested himself of the title. The signing and acknowledgment of a deed cannot be said to have this effect. They are preparatory to a conveyance, and indicate only an intention. This intention, where the act is voluntary, the grantor is always free to change until the deciding and determining act is performed].

In the case before us the grantor did change her mind as to one of the properties, having destroyed the deed and conveyed it to another party for a valuable consideration; and [as to the remaining property there is only evidence by the deed, and by her language to her attorney that she at one time contemplated a conveyance to the complainant; but the fact remains that she never carried this intention into effect].

If the deed in this case is imperfect by reason of a want of delivery, the complainant cannot obtain relief in a court of equity. Equity will not aid an imperfect voluntary conveyance, even when by accident the deed was not delivered. Clavering v. Clavering, 2 Vern. 473.

No imperfect conveyance, which is also merely voluntary, will be aided or enforced in equity. Bisph. Eq. 101 and cases there cited.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court:

In dismissing the first exception to the report of the master as follows: "1. The master erred in finding that the deed for the premises in controversy was never delivered, and was therefore inoperative to vest title in the complainant as trustee."

2. In dismissing the second exception to the report of the master as follows: "2. The learned master erred in finding as follows: 'That the case in question so strongly resembles that of Critchfield v. Critchfield, 24 Pa. 100, and the law as held in that case is so clearly applicable to the facts of the present case, that in the opinion of the master it is ruled by it.'"

3. In dismissing the third exception to the report of the master as follows: "The learned master erred in suggesting a decree dismissing the bill."

4. In dismissing the exceptions to the master's report, 5, 6 and 7—the portions of the opinion in brackets.

Mr. Jerome Carty, for appellant:

"It is certainly the tendency of all modern authorities to maintain the general doctrine, which may be stated as a formula: that whenever the party has the power to do a thing (statutory provisions being out of the way), and means to do it, the instrument he employs shall be so construed as to give effect to his intention." Bond v. Bunting, 78 Pa. 210.

Mere possession of a deed by the grantee is no more tangible evidence of absolute delivery than possession thereof by the grantor.

Rhine v Robinson, 27 Pa. 30.

Nor is actual delivery to the grantee necessary. Nor is recording absolute delivery, but only evidence thereof.

Chess v. Chess, 1 Penr. & W. 32.

When an instrument is formally sealed and delivered, and there is nothing to qualify the delivery but the keeping of the deed in the hands of the executing party—nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately—that is a valid and effectual deed, and delivery to the party who is to take it, or any other person for his use, is not essential.

Garnons v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 671, and Lloyd v Bennett, 8 Carr. & P. 124.

Deeds acting under the Statute of Uses may give an estate of freehold to commence in future.

2 Preston, Con. 127.

A grant to A, merely, creates a life estate only; but when a party pays his money, and the intention is clear that a fee was to be conveyed, a use which chancery would execute is raised.

Lynn v. Downes, 1 Yeates, 520; M'Girr v. Aaron, 1 Penr. & W. 49.

Wherever a deed of conveyance, etc., is made, and the intention of the grantor, etc., is clear, and a technical principle might defeat the intention, courts will declare the grantor a trustee and the deed a covenant to stand seised for the use of the grantee.

Martin v. M'Cord, 5 Watts, 495; Allison v. Kurtz, 2 Watts, 188; Wilt v. Franklin, 1 Binn. 519; Witman v Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 88.

The words bargain and sell make a covenant to stand seised.

4 Cruise, Dig. title 32, chap. 10, § 1.

A bargain and sale for a pecuniary consideration to commence in futuro will operate as a covenant to stand seised according to the intention, without technical words.

Jackson v. Swart, 20 Johns. 85; Barrett v. French, 1 Conn. 354; Wallis v. Wallis, 4 Mass. 135.

A deed to a son reserving a life estate to the grantor is a covenant to stand seised for grantee.

French v. French, 3 N. H. 258; Jackson v. McKenny, 3 Wend. 233; Jackson v. Sebring, 16 Johns. 515; 9 Wend. 641.

In Critchfield v. Critchfield the decision of the court is entirely based upon the disputed facts as found by the jury, which negative the idea or intention of delivery on the part of the grantor.

Mr. Thomas Greenbank, for appellees.

The citations by the appellant fail to meet the point of the case or to sustain the positions assumed.

In Rhine v. Robinson, 27 Pa. 30, it is held that possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence of delivery.

In Chess v. Chess, 1 Penr. & W. 32, the court says: "A delivery is essential to the proper and legal execution of a deed, and the delivery may be to the party—to one authorized by the party to receive it, or to a stranger for the use of the party. The placing of a deed on record by the grantor is not absolute delivery, but only evidence of it, of which the jury may judge."

In Garnons v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 671, the syllabus is misleading. Both in that case and in Lloyd v. Bennett, 8 Carr. & P. 124, there had been an actual delivery to a third party.

The remaining cases in appellant's book relate to the construction of deeds or bequests for charitable uses in which no question of delivery arises.

The rule in regard to the delivery of voluntary deeds is the same as in regard to gifts of chattels. A gift is not consummate and perfect until a delivery of the thing promised; and until then the party may revoke his promise. Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281.

Where the donor retains the control of a voluntary bond, given or assigned, he may cancel or destroy it. If the determining act be in fieri, the intention to deliver does not execute the gift. Trough's Est. 75 Pa. 115.

Per Curiam:

A delivery is essentially necessary to give effect to a deed. The signing and sealing thereof are insufficient to bind the grantor, or to pass title to the vendee therein named. In the present case no question of presumptive or conditional delivery either to the vendee or to any person for her arises.

It is conclusively shown that although the deed was signed and acknowledged, yet in fact it remained in the possession of the person who signed it until her death. Neither the grantee named, nor the persons for whose benefit it professed to be made, gave any consideration therefor, nor were any of them present when it was signed or acknowledged; and they had no knowledge of its existence during the life of the maker. In law it was not a deed.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

v.
PENNSYLVANIA & NEW YORK CANAL & R. R. CO.

1. Under the Acts of February 25, 1826, and April 9, 1827, the Board of Canal Commissioners had power to purchase lands through which the Pennsylvania Canal was intended to pass, without limitation either as to amount or quality.
2. Land so purchased became ipso facto canal land and appurtenant to the canal.
3. Until the Act of April 9, 1827, the board received authority to sell the remainder not occupied by the canal; but whether they should make such sale or not was left entirely to their own discretion.
4. Land so purchased and not sold by the board although only partially occupied by the canal, passed by a sale under the Act of April 21, 1858, of that portion of the canal "with all the property thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining," and proclamation and deed in accordance with the Act.

(Argued March 15, Decided April 25, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 219, E. D,, before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Bradford County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before Morrow, J., were as follows:

In the construction of the Upper North Branch Division of the Pennsylvania Canal in Athens Township, Bradford County, the line of the canal passed through certain land of John Spalding, and the west end of a dam built across the Chemung or Tioga River, for the purpose of feeding the canal with water, was built upon said land, as well as a lock. This dam was one of the largest and most important works of the State, appurtenant to the canal, and its erection consumed a vast amount of timber, earth and stone, all of which were necessarily obtained from the land in suit, and in fact could not be obtained elsewhere, except at an increased and unwarranted expense. The same materials were in constant demand for the maintenance and repair of the dam, and the amount of land required to furnish the necessary material, not only for the construction of the dam, the lock, and the canal, but also constantly needed for their maintenance, could alone be determined by the commissioners.

February 25, 1826, P. L. 55, the Legislature provided for the commencement of the "Pennsylvania Canal;" and sections 7 and 8 of said Act, P. L. 57, authorized the purchase of lands, and provided the mode of procedure in ascertaining damages, etc.

April 9, 1827, P. L. 192, the Legislature provided for the further extension of the Pennsylvania Canal, and by the same Act, pp. 197, 198 (where private property may be in a great measure destroyed by the public works, and when in the opinion of the commissioners it would be more advantageous to purchase the land than pay the probable amount of an assessment of damages), said commissioners were authorized to purchase such lands on behalf of the State, and to sell the remainder not occupied by the canal, and convey to the purchasers respectively the estate and title thus acquired.

September 25, 1838, the canal commissioners, being of the opinion that the erection of the dam and canals materially injured the farm of John Spalding, so as to destroy it for farming purposes, voted to pay said Spalding $4,000, in full compensation for all damages by the building of said dam and canal, and as full pay and consideration of the purchase money of said Spalding's farm or tract of land through which said canal passes (including all that farm and land connected with it), upon said Spalding's conveying said farm to the Commonwealth in fee simple.

September 18, 1839, John Spalding conveyed to the Commonwealth the said land, being seventy-two acres and 180 perches, more or less, by deed, which was recorded in Bradford County, January 31, 1840, in Deed Book No. 16, p. 348.

Under the authority of the Act of 1858, P. L. 414, the Upper North Branch Division of the Pennsylvania Canal, inter alia, was sold to the Sunbury & Erie Railroad Company, with all the property thereto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and all the estate, right, title and interest of the Commonwealth therein, the deed for which, dated May 19, 1858 (that was made by the Governor in pursuance of the Act), has since been lost. May 19, 1858, the Governor made proclamation, in pursuance of the sale of all the property.

May 25, 1858, the Governor assented to the sale by the Sunbury & Erie Railroad Company to the North Branch Canal Company, of that part of the canal inter alia beginning at the line of the State of New York, in the County of Bradford, and thence down through the said County of Bradford, etc., embracing the land in question.

May 25, 1858, the Sunbury & Erie Railroad Company made deed to the North Branch Canal Company, which was recorded in Bradford County, June 8, 1875.

April 12, 1859, P. L. 530, the Legislature passed an Act for the assessment and recovery of damages upon the Upper North Branch (and Wyoming) Canal.

March 20, 1865, P. L. 427, the Legislature authorized the North Branch Canal Company to change their name, style and title to the Pennsylvania & New York Canal & Railroad Company, and to construct a railroad along and upon or near the towing path or berme bank of its canal. The railroad was constructed, and continues to be operated.

This action was begun by the said Pennsylvania & New York Canal & Railroad Company, against N. C. Harris and others in possession. The defendants, having no paper title, relied entirely on their possession.

The court below charged the jury as follows:

This is an action of ejectment brought by the Pennsylvania & New York Canal & Railroad Company against N. C. Harris and A. C. Elsbree, to recover a lot of land in Athens Township, containing seventy-two acres and 130 perches. The land is on the west of the Chemung River—the dam that was built across the river when the North Branch Canal was constructed, abutted against this land. From the river it extends west, over a high hill. It is a narrow strip, about one mile long.

After the suit was brought, the defendants disclaimed any right, title or possession to all that part of the land lying east of a certain dug road that crossed it along the side hill. This piece contained thirty-nine acres and sixty-one perches. They are in possession of all the land (thirty-three acres and sixty-nine perches) lying west of the dug road, and claim to hold it as against the plaintiff.

In the construction of the North Branch Canal, a dam was constructed across the river at Athens and the west end of it abutted against the land of John Spalding. The canal commissioners, under authority of law, purchased Spalding's land December 18, 1839, for $4,000, in pursuance of a resolution to that effect adopted September 25, 1838. The deed is to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and bears date December 18, 1839, and covers the land in dispute.

In pursuance of an Act of Assembly, the state canals were sold, and the title to the North Branch Canal became vested in the North Branch Canal Company, May 19, 1858. In 1865 this Company's name was changed to the Pennsylvania & New York Canal & Railroad Company and was authorized to construct a railroad along, upon or near the towing path or berme bank. The road was constructed and passes through the land in suit some little west of the Chemung River, and west of the canal.

The plaintiff claims that all of the Spalding farm passed to it under the sale of the state canals, for the reason that it was appurtenant to and part of the canal.

The defendants claim that it was not appurtenant nor necessary to operate the canal. They have given no evidence. Their possession is sufficient to protect them, and there can be no recovery here until the plaintiff has shown a better title. This depends upon the construction of the Acts of Assembly under which the canals were sold. They provide that the sale shall convey all the property appurtenant to the canal or in any wise appertaining thereto, and all the estate, right, title and interest of the Commonwealth in and to the same—and all claim and demand whatsoever, etc.

[The defendants ask us to submit to you whether this land was necessary for the use of the canal—that is, the thirty-three acres and sixty-nine perches. This we refuse to do, and say our opinion is, under the evidence, and the Acts referred to, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.]

This affirms the plaintiff's points, and denies the points of the defendants.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff.

The assignments of error specified, inter alia, the portion of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. Edward Overton, Jr., and John F. Sanderson, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiff was never in possession of the land in controversy, and it was therefore incumbent on it to show a good title thereto in order to recover against the defendants who are in possession.

Shumway v. Phillips, 22 Pa. 151.

The lot in controversy was not purchased for canal purposes, but under the Act of 1827, which expressly authorized the purchase for the State of lands not required for the canal, when a portion of them had been destroyed by the public works.

In the case of the Plymouth R. R. Co. v. Colwell, 39 Pa. 339, it was said: "They (the company) had very express authority by the incorporating law to buy, hold and sell lands; and in locating their road they probably found it expedient to buy the Larkins farm rather than pay damages for crossing it. But lands so bought and not actually dedicated to corporate purposes are bound by the lien of judgments," etc.

The Act of 1858 authorized the sale of the public works but not the sale of any other property belonging to the State.

A contract between the Commonwealth and a private person is ordinarily to be construed in the same manner as a like contract between natural persons.

Commonwealth v. Pa. R. R. Co. 51 Pa. 351.

The title of the plaintiff extends only to such lands actually and permanently occupied by the State for canal purposes.

Western Pa. R. R. Co. v. Sharp, 26 Pittsb. L. J. 129.

"Any ambiguity in the grant must be construed against the corporation and in favor of the public."

Comrs. v. Gas. Co. 12 Pa. 321.

While the rule is that "The words of an instrument shall be taken most strongly against the party employing them," yet "Where a question arises on the construction of a grant from the Crown, the rule under consideration is reversed, for such grant is construed most strictly against the grantee, and nothing will pass to him but by clear and express words."

Broom, Legal Maxims, 260.

The land was clearly no part of the North Branch Canal. When it was purchased by the State the canal board put upon record their reasons for purchasing it. They deemed it to the advantage of the Commonwealth to buy a farm, the portion of which lying on the flats had been injured, and which might be utilized for a water power, rather than pay damages to the owner. The part now in controversy could by no possibility be used in connection with the canal. It was several hundred feet higher than the canal and more than half a mile from it. "What is necessary to the enjoyment of the thing devised passes with it as an appurtenant without express words, but what is merely convenient does not."

Howell v. McCoy, 3 Rawle, 256.

This land was not necessary to the enjoyment of the canal.

"Town lots held by a railroad company do not pass by a sheriff's sale upon a mortgage of the road with its corporate privileges and appurtenances, unless directly appurtenant to the railroad and indispensably necessary to the enjoyment of its franchises."

Shamokin Valley R. R. Co. v. Livermore, 47 Pa. 465.

It is only such property belonging to corporations as is appurtenant and indispensable to its construction, and fitting it for use, that can claim to be exempt from taxation.

Railroad v. Berks Co. 6 Pa. 70.

Town lots owned by the corporation are no part of the railroad.

Youngman v. Elmira etc. R. R. Co. 65 Pa. 278.

The report of viewers must show that the land taken is necessary for railroad purposes.

O'Hara v. Pa. R. R. Co. 25 Pa. 445.

Messrs. Davies & Hall and Henry Streeter, for defendant in error:

This land was purchased by the canal commissioners under the Act of February 25, 1826, P. L. 57, as follows: "That it shall and may be lawful for the said board, or a majority of them, to agree with the owner or owners of any land through which the said canal is intended to pass, for the purchase, use and occupation thereof, on behalf of the State."

The land was not purchased under the Act of April 9, 1827, P. L. 198, which expressly stated that "Nothing therein contained shall be construed as limiting the powers already granted to the canal commissioners for the purchase of lands through which the canal was expected to pass." The land was wholly destroyed for farming purposes in the opinion of the commissioners.

But even if the land in question had been purchased under the Act of 1827, this would not materially affect the title of the defendant in error to these lands. It is true the canal commissioners had the right to sell such portions of the land so purchased as they might think unnecessary for the canal. But they, and they only, had this right and this discretion. They never did sell any of these lands, and the right to so sell or part with them under the Act of 1827 ended with the expiration of their powers. And from their not having sold any of this land, under the authority of that Act, it should be presumed that they considered it all necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the canal.

The action of the canal commissioners was conclusive of the question as to the amount of land necessary for the convenient use of the canal. The time to dispute their discretion was before them, in the way pointed out by the Act of Assembly creating the board.

It was not for the appraisers of damages to determine that the Commonwealth should take less than a fee, nor even what should be the duration of interest in what was taken for temporary use. This was to be determined by the board of canal commissioners. It was what was required by the board for the use of the State that they were to value and describe; and it was of that thus required and described, not of that which the viewers might think necessary, that the law defined the seisin of the State.

Haldeman v. Pennsylvania R. R. 50 Pa. 425.

The question, Who has authority to judge of such encroachments, the canal commissioners or the jury? is begged when it is left to the jury to say whether the canal commissioners act arbitrarily or not.

Downing v. McFadden, 18 Pa. 337. See also Ridge Turnpike Co. v. Stoever, 6 Watts & S. 378.

The extent of the transfer to the defendant in error is to be determined by the Act of Assembly authorizing the sale, and the Governor's proclamation showing what was sold and transferred.

There is no ambiguity in either the Act of Assembly or the proclamation; and therefore the cases cited by counsel, that grants are to be construed in favor of the Commonwealth, are not applicable.

The construction of this Act of Assembly is for the court, and not for the jury; but the court in construing it must look into the circumstances under which it was made, as evidencing the intention of the parties.

Cox v. Freedley, 33 Pa. 124.

In order to interpret this Act of Assembly and this proclamation and give each clause in them its full meaning, we must look at things as they then existed, and the canal as it then was. To give a particular description was impossible. The canal property was over 100 miles long. Its boundaries were irregular. In some places its title extended only so far as its permanent monuments had been built on the ground. In others the title extended as far as the descriptions contained in deeds and releases, which had been placed on record. The property varied in width from about sixty feet, when it passed through flat and level land, to that of many rods when it passed through deep cuts or along steep hillsides. Besides this, there were many pieces of land used in connection with toll houses, lock houses, weigh locks, basins, docks, besides lands overflowed by the back water from the dams, necessary for the convenient use of the canal, of different sizes, irregular shapes, in some cases with undefined or perhaps undefinable boundaries. As these pieces of land could not be particularly described, it was necessary to convey them by general words, and we claim that those used in the Act are the most general and sweeping that could have been selected.

The property is to be conveyed with the appurtenances. Later cases have modified the rule stated in Howell v. McCoy, 3 Rawle, 256, as to what will pass under the term, appurtenances.

Appurtenances do not pass alone on the ground of absolute necessity, as some of the more ancient cases seem to show, or on the principles governing right of way, of necessity. One general test is how far the incidents claimed are necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of what is expressly granted.

Wright v. Chestnut Hill Iron Ore Co. 45 Pa. 482; Buckholder v. Sigler, 7 Watts & S. 154; Grubb v. Guilford, 4 Watts, 223; Grubb v. Grubb, 74 Pa. 33.

The construction of the dam would consume a vast amount of earth, stones, timber and other materials, and for its maintenance and repairs the same would be constantly needed. A piece of land from which these materials could from time to time be obtained would be necessary for the convenient and economical use and maintenance of the canal at this point.

By the Act of Assembly, all the property of the State in the said public works was to be conveyed. Property signifies every species of property; it is nomen generalissimum, and comprehends all his earthly possessions. It is equivalent to a disposition of all I am worth in the world; whatever else I am worth in the world; whatever else I have in the world; all my substance; which has been construed not only to pass lands but to pass the fee simple.

Rossetter v. Simmons, 6 Serg. & R. 456; Stoever v. Stoever, 9 Serg. & R. 445; Foster v. Stewart, 18 Pa. 23-25; Morrison v. Semple, 6 Binn. 98.

But even the word, property, was not considered strong enough to describe all that the grantors intended to convey; and it is mentioned as "property thereto belonging, or in any wise appertaining." Webster defines the word appertain: "to belong to, whether by right, nature or appointment."

The Commonwealth alone can object to a want of capacity in a corporation to hold lands which it was not authorized to purchase. It takes and conveys to its alienee a defeasible title.

Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. 313; Goundie v. Northampton Water Co. 7 Pa. 233.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

The case before us involves nothing of material consequence and might well be affirmed, with little or no discussion. It is admitted that the defendants have no title whatever to the land described in the writ. If it belongs not to the plaintiff, then it does belong to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and although it may belong to the latter, yet it is not now and never was open to settlement, warrant or patent; nor is it property over which the land-office has ever had jurisdiction.

The defendants rest their defense solely on the ground of possession, a ground sufficiently substantial if it be found that the plaintiff has not a superior right. It is conceded that the Pennsylvania & New York Canal & Railroad Company, through the Sunbury & Erie Railroad Company, and the North Branch Canal Company, was and is the vendee of the Commonwealth as to all the property belonging or appurtenant to the North Branch Canal; but it is alleged that the land in suit was not so appurtenant, and this because it was not necessary for the use of that improvement; hence, although the grant to the Company above named was, "of the upper North Branch Canal, with all the property thereto belonging, or in any wise appertaining," it did not convey the land in controversy. That is, as the defendants contend, although this whole tract of seventy-two acres was bought by the canal commissioners for the use of the canal, and on part of which the canal was actually located, they have nevertheless the right to define what was necessary for that purpose; to run off what they may think was really appurtenant to the state works, and settle upon and occupy the balance.

The mere statement of this claim, involving, as it does, an assumption so unwarranted, ought of itself to settle this controversy; for the question naturally presents itself: Who gave these men the authority to say what should or should not be canal property, or to limit the power of the state officers? If the Commonwealth treated this as canal property, and as such conveyed it to her grantees, we cannot understand by what warrant private citizens undertake to sit in judgment on and annul her acts, and the resolutions of her officers. But, passing this feature of the case, let us see how, in fact and in law, this matter stands. By the Act of the 25th of February, 1826, P. L. 55, the canal commissioners were authorized "to agree with the owner, or owners of any land, through which the said canal is intended to pass for the purchase and occupation thereof, on behalf of the State."

Here was the grant of a power certainly of sufficient breadth and generality; their purchases were to be confined to lands through which the canal was intended to pass, but there was no limitation either as to amount or quality; that was left to their sole discretion. They might be extravagant to the last degree; they might buy 100 acres where but ten were necessary, but there was no power which could call them to account, or reverse their judgment, except that by which they were created: the General Assembly of the Commonwealth.

Again; if they did so purchase, under the provisions of the said Act, whether economically or extravagantly, the land so purchased was canal land—appurtenant to the canal, for they had no power to purchase for any other purpose. The land-office had nothing to do with it, nor was any department of the Government authorized to sell or otherwise dispose of it. Hence, but for section 16 of the Act of the 9th of April 1827, P. L. 201, lands so purchased must have remained canal property as long as the State retained its improvements.

In such case, however, that is, had neither that Act nor one similar to it been passed, it is very clear that all the property purchased by the commissioners under the Acts of 1826 and 1827 would have to be regarded as belonging to the public works; and in case of the sale of those works and their appurtenances, all such property must pass and be held by the Commonwealth's vendee. But the latter Act put no compulsion on the commissioners; authority was thereby given to them "to sell the remainder not occupied by the canal, and to convey to the purchasers respectively the estate and title thus acquired;" but whether they should make such sale or not was left entirely to their own discretion.

We have, then, in this department of the Commonwealth (called the "Board of Canal Commissioners," which said board represented the public works and nothing else), the power to purchase lands for the use of the state canals and for no other purpose; the power also to sell them, should it seem to that board necessary; so, from this, it would seem to follow as a corollary that the judgment of this board must be final, since there was no tribunal in the State having power to revise that judgment.

If, then, it purchased the land in controversy for the use of the canal, and never declared any part thereof unnecessary for such use by putting the surplus on the market for sale, by what authority may either a lower court or this court revise and correct the act and judgment, or discretion, of this governmental department, in which was vested all right, title and power in and over the canal lands?

It may be that the canal commissioners acted improvidently in buying the whole of John Spalding's farm for canal purposes when but part of it was necessary for such purposes, or in not running off and selling the surplus, but when we have made this admission, what then? Who can revise and annul their deliberate act? They certainly did need part of it for the use mentioned; and in their resolution of September 25, 1838, they declared that the erection of dam No. 1 so impaired the land of Spalding as to render it unfit for farming purposes; and as the erection of the said dam would create a good water power on said land, therefore, they directed the superintendent of the Tioga line to pay to Spalding the sum of $4,000, for the fee of the whole tract. Thus was the land in controversy bought expressly for the use of the canal by the properly constituted authorities of the State, and it is not within our province to say that they did not act providently.

Did the State still own the canals, the idea that the defendants could squat upon the lands connected with them, and set at defiance the power of the commissioners, on the plea that they were not necessary for the purposes for which they were bought, would be too absurd to talk about. But the plaintiff is the vendee of the State, and by its deed it took that over which the canal commissioners had control for the State; and it now represents both the State and the canal board, so that if the defendants could not claim as against the canal board, prior to the time of the sale, neither can they now claim as against the Pennsylvania & New York Canal & Railroad Company.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

v.
Esther PHILLIPS et al.

At the time of assessment of taxes for 1876, Thomas Hughes owned an improved lot on Hazel Street in the fourteenth ward in Wilkesbarre, and a vacant lot on Parrish Street in the same ward. Taxes for that year were duly assessed against the first lot: "Bridge tax eighteen cents, and county tax $2.88, total $3.06;" and against the second lot: "Bridge, six cents and county ninety-six cents, total $1.02." In March, 1878, the receiver of taxes made return to the county commissioners on the exoneration claimed by him for 1876, and the only return concerning property of said Hughes was: "Hughes, Thomas—vacant lot — sold three years ago— Bridge, twenty-four cents, county $3.84." The county commissioners thereupon exonerated the receiver, and in 1880 certified to the county treasurer both of said lots as delinquent, and thereafter they were sold for said taxes. Held, in an action of ejectment to obtain possession of the Hazel Street lot under the tax sale, that the return was made too late and was too defective in form to constitute a valid basis for the sale.

(Argued April 12, Decided April 25, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1877, No. 121, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, to review a judgment overruling exceptions to the report of a referee granting a compulsory nonsuit in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

At the trial before the referee, George W. Shonk, Esq., the following facts appeared:

In the year 1876, at the time when the taxes of that year were assessed, Thomas Hughes was the owner of an improved lot on Hazel Street, in the fourteenth ward in the City of Wilkesbarre, being the premises in controversy, and also owner of a vacant lot on Parrish Street, in the same ward.

The taxes for the year 1876 were duly and lawfully assessed against the former property as follows: bridge tax, eighteen cents, and county tax, $2.88; a total of $3.06.

The second lot for the same year was assessed as follows: bridge, six cents, and county, ninety-six cents, total, $1.02.

On March 6, 1878, George M. Miller, receiver of taxes for the City of Wilkesbarre, made his return to the county commissioners of Luzerne County on the exoneration claimed by him for the year 1876, and the only return concerning said Thomas Hughes or his property was as follows:

"Hughes, Thomas—vacant lot—sold three years ago—Bridge, twenty four cents, county, $3.84."

The county commissioners thereupon exonerated said receiver of taxes from the aforesaid taxes.

The county commissioners, influenced no doubt by the fact that the amount of said taxes thus exonerated was exactly equal to the amount of taxes assessed against said two properties, disregarded the return of the receiver of taxes, and in the year 1880 certified to the county treasurer both of the said lots delinquent, as follows: "Vacant lot, Hughes, Thomas, Parrish Street, six cents bridge, 96 cents county." Also, "House and lot, Hughes, Thomas, Hazel Street, bridge tax eighteen cents, county tax $2.88."

The county treasurer, after duly advertising the two properties, September 14, 1880, sold the property in controversy to the county commissioners and made a deed to them in which the only description was, "house and lot, Thomas Hughes, Hazel Street, fourteenth ward, Wilkesbarre, for taxes of 1876."

At the expiration of five years the commissioners duly made and passed a resolution to sell all lands which had been held by them for five years or more, in pursuance of which, after due and legal notice, they, November 5, 1885, sold said lot on Hazel Street to William H. Vandermark, plaintiff, who received a deed December 14, 1885, containing a description as last above given, under which he claimed title in this action.

The defendant moved for nonsuit on the ground that under the Act of April 21, 1856, the county treasurer had no authority to sell the lands in question, they having been returned and the taxes exonerated, March 6, 1878, and that the return was otherwise defective.

1. Section 3 of the Act of April 21, 1856, Purd. 1674, pl. 13, as amended by the Act of February 23, 1858, provides as follows: "It shall be the duty of * * * all collectors of any taxes whatsoever, to make return to the county commissioners of any exonerations claimed by them, on or before the first day of February in each year; and it shall not be lawful for the said county commissioners to grant any exonerations after that time, nor for the county treasurer to sell any lands which shall have been returned and taxes exonerated after time."

The referee held that the Act of April 21, 1856, had not been repealed prior to the time these taxes were returned and exonerated; that the provisions therein are mandatory on the officers, and their observance a condition precedent of their right to sell the land; that a sale of land not thus returned, as in the present case, is void, and the purchaser takes no title; that the return of the collectors was not sufficiently definite to enable the owner, the officer and the public to identify and determine therefrom the exact property which is delinquent and liable to sale, and that such uncertainty would vitiate the sale; whereupon, the referee granted the nonsuit and subsequently refused to strike the same off. Exceptions filed by the plaintiff to his report were overruled in the court below by WOODWARD, J., and the report confirmed; and the plaintiff took this writ, assigning such action of the court as error.

Mr. Michael Cannon, for plaintiff in error:

Any negligence by the assessors or collectors in that respect for failing to make their return in a given time cannot defeat the deed or sale made by the county treasurer, all irregularities of that character being cured by the Act of 1815.

Heft v. Gephart, 65 Pa. 510; Hubley v. Keyser, 2 Penr. & W. 501; Devinney v. Reynolds, 1 Watts & S. 333; Crue v. Burke, 25 Pa. 377.

It was the assessment of the land and the levy of taxes thereon that made the charge against the land, and not the collector's return, the return being only evidence of its nonpayment or collectibility.

Cohn's App. 10 W. N. C. 230, is a case directly in point. The collector's return was not made for two years after assessment and levy of the taxes, and it was held right.

Messrs. Allan H. Dickson and Q. A. Gates, for defendants in error:

The return is a condition precedent to sale of seated land. The Act of 1844 does not extend the unseated land laws to seated lands in general.

Potter's Dwar. Stat. 257; East Union Township v. Ryan, 86 Pa. 459; Bennett v. Birmingham, 31 Pa. 15.

In this case a house and lot on Hazel Street and a vacant lot on Parrish Street were assessed to Thomas Hughes. The collector returned a vacant lot of the size of the Parrish Street lot. The treasurer sold to the commissioners a house and lot on Hazel Street; hence, the lot returned was never sold, and the lot sold was never returned. It seems beyond dispute, then, that this land on Hazel Street, which is the subject of this ejectment, never came within the operation of the unseated land laws; and the treasurer had no more right to sell it than any other land not returned.

The return was not made in time.

Act of April 21, 1856, § 3, P. L. 477, Purd. Dig. 1674, pl. 13, as amended by Act of February 23, 1858, P. L. 45.

In the case of Hess v. Herrington, 73 Pa. 445, it does not appear that any duplicate was ever issued to a collector for the unseated land tax, and no question was raised as to the time of return.

The return here is too indefinite and misleading to authorize a sale.

Dunn v. Ralyea, 6 Watts & S. 479; Philadelphia v. Miller, 49 Pa. 449; Lyman v. Philadelphia, 56 Pa. 501; Strauch v. Shoemaker, 1 Watts & S. 177; Hess v. Herrington, 73 Pa. 447; Brotherline v. Hammond, 69 Pa. 134.

The præcept from commissioners to tre surer of unseated land must describe the land ordered to be sold; otherwise, it confers no authority on treasurer to sell.

Stewart v. Graffies, 8 Serg. & R. 344.

This was a sale of a lot for a joint tax on two lots, and it is therefore void.

Stark v. Shupp, 8 Cent. Rep. 146.

Per Curiam:

There is no error in this judgment. The return of taxes was made too late in time, and too defective in form, to constitute a valid basis for a sale of the land in question.

Judgment affirmed.

City of PHILADELHPIA, Plff. in Err.,
v.
William R. MATCHETT.

Satisfaction of a municipal claim for water pipe, entered of record in accordance with an ordinance of the councils of Philadelphia, not only discharges the lien but operates as an estoppel to prevent the City from denying payment when a subsequent purchaser of the land, against which the claim was filed, applies for a permit to introduce water from the pipe to the premises.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 137, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment for the defendant in a case stated in an action of trespass on the case. Affirmed.

Reported below, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 272.

The case stated was as follows:

It is hereby agreed that an amicable action be entered in the above entitled suit, and that a case stated therein be agreed to, as follows, to wit:

That in and prior to the year 1872 the German Hospital, a charitable corporation, was, inter alia, the owner of a lot of ground in the City of Philadelphia, situate on the east side of Twentieth Street, extending from Norris Street to Park Avenue (now called Diamond Street), containing in front on said Twentieth Street, 500 feet, and extending in depth eastward of that width along Norris Street and Park Avenue or Diamond Street 150 feet, on which were erected the buildings of said hospital, and the said lot and buildings were occupied by it for the purposes of a charitable hospital until the month of October, 1872, at which time the said hospital was removed to the new buildings of the corporation situate at Twentieth Street and Girard Avenue in said City, but that the said lot continued in the ownership of said corporation until the time hereafter mentioned, but after the last mentioned date was no longer used for the purpose of a hospital.

That some time in the year 1873 the City of Philadelphia laid a water pipe in the said Twentieth Street along the whole front of said lot.

That on the 11th day of March, 1874, the said City, through its solicitor filed in the district court, as of March Term, 1874, No. 12, a claim for $400 for said water pipe laid in front of said lot. A copy of the docket entries of said claim is hereto annexed as part hereof marked exhibit "A."

That on the 12th day of December, 1874, an ordinance of the select and common councils of the said City was duly approved by the mayor thereof, ordaining that "The said solicitor be authorized and directed to enter satisfaction on the claims of the City against the German Hospital for water pipe laid in front of their property on Twentieth Street from Diamond to Norris Street, D. C. M. T. 1874, No. 12, C. C. D." A copy of which said ordinance is hereto annexed, as part hereof, marked exhibit "B."

That the said city solicitor on the 22d day of December, 1874, entered satisfaction of record of the said claim for water pipe against said lot, as appears by the docket entries, a copy of which is hereto annexed.

That the said German Hospital, by indenture dated the first day of December, 1879, duly recorded in Deed Book L. W. No. 66, page 29, etc., granted and conveyed the said lot of ground, inter alia, to George Sergeant in fee.

That the said George Sergeant, by indenture dated the second day of December, 1879, and recorded in Deed Book L. W., No. 71, page 12, etc., granted and conveyed the said lot, inter alia, to John D. Lankenau in fee.

That the said John D. Lankenau, by indenture dated the 12th day of May, 1885, and recorded in Deed Book G. G. P., No. 40, page 298, etc., granted and conveyed the said lot, inter alia, to the said William R. Matchett in fee.

That, prior to the delivery of the last mentioned deed, the said William R. Matchett caused certificates of search to be procured from the office of the court of common pleas (which since the adoption of the Constitution of 1874 includes searches in the late district court) and also from the city solicitor's office, which said certificates are dated the 21st day of May, 1885, and show no municipal claim for water pipe, or any other claims, against said lot. A copy of said searches is hereto annexed as part hereof, and marked exhibit "C."

That, prior to the payment of the purchase money of said lot, the said William R. Matchett knew that the said water pipe had been laid in front of the same, that the said claim had been filed therefor, and that the said claim had been satisfied of record by the then city solicitor, and relying on these facts, neither he nor anyone on his behalf, before paying said purchase money made any inquiry at the water department, to ascertain there if the said pipe had been paid for.

That, by inquiry at the said office of the water department, he would have ascertained that said pipe had not been paid for. That there is connected with said water department a search office, and that for a fee of twenty-five cents, as provided by a resolution of councils, dated the 4th day of March, 1884, searches are now, and have been since the last mentioned date, issued by the chief engineer of the water department. That no such search was ordered or requested in this case. A copy of the form of such search is hereto annexed as part hereof, marked exhibit "D."

That since the passage of the Ordinance of January 29, 1855, it has always been within the power of a purchaser to ascertain by inquiry at the water department whether pipe has been paid for. It has been customary for some years past for attorneys and conveyancers in Philadelphia to make inquiry at the water department to ascertain as to the payment of pipe.

That, as a matter of fact, the water pipe in question has not been paid for, but that the said William R. Matchett was not aware of said fact at the time of the payment of the purchase money of said lot. The admission of the fact that said pipe has not been paid for is not to prejudice the right of the defendant to argue that the plaintiff is estopped from alleging such fact as against him.

That the said William R. Matchett has caused a row of dwelling houses to be erected on said lot, which are now nearly completed, and it became necessary to connect the water pipes of said houses with the said water pipe in the street for the purpose of introducing water into the said houses.

That on the 23d day of November, 1885, the said William R. Matchett applied to Charles H. Russell, the officer at the water department of the said City, duly authorized to issue permits for the introduction of water into buildings, who was duly appointed by William Ludlow, chief engineer of said water department, and that said application was refused, unless the said William R. Matchett would first pay into said department the cost of laying said water pipe in front of said lot, in pursuance of an Ordinance of councils of the 29th day of January, 1855, a copy of which is hereto annexed as part hereof marked exhibit "E."

That the said William R. Matchett on the 28th day of November, 1885, presented his petition to this honorable Court for a writ of mandamus to the said William Ludlow, chief engineer, and Charles H. Russell, permit clerk of said water department, commanding them to issue to him a permit to introduce water from said pipe into said houses; whereupon, a writ of alternative mandamus was awarded to which the said William Ludlow, chief engineer, made return and an issue was joined thereon and the case argued before this honorable court and held under consideration; and thereupon at the suggestion of said court an agreement between the said plaintiff and the said defendant was entered into, providing that the said plaintiff should grant the said permit, upon the said defendant entering into a covenent to pay the cost of laying said water pipe, if upon a case stated reciting the foregoing facts, the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was not estopped from alleging that the said pipe had not been paid for, and that defendant was not entitled to use said water pipe without paying the cost of laying the same, which said covenant has been duly signed and delivered to the city solicitor, and thereupon the said permit was duly issued to the said defendant.

If upon the foregoing facts the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is not estopped as to the defendant from alleging that said water pipe has not been paid for, and that the said defendant is not entitled to introduce water into his said houses from said water pipe, without first paying the cost of laying the same, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiff in the sum of $500; otherwise, judgment to be entered for the defendant, costs to follow the judgment, with right in either party to take a writ of error to the supreme court.

It is further agreed that either party shall have the right to refer to all statutes of the State and ordinances of councils bearing on the creation and organization of the water department for the furnishing of water to citizens, the laying of water pipes, and the remedies for the collection of the charges therefor, with the same force and effect as though the same were incorporated herein at length.

The exhibits referred to in the case stated were as follows:

Copy of Ordinance of Councils.

Section 2. "That no permit for the use of water shall be issued, unless at the time of the application the person or persons shall exhibit the receipt of the proper officer for the amount of assessment, or other satisfactory evidence of payment thereof, for the expense of laying the water pipe on the premises for which the permit is requested."

Judgment was entered for defendant on the case stated, and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. Frank M. Riter and Robert Alexander, Assistant City Solicitors, and Charles F. Warwick, City Solicitor, for plaintiff in error:

It is admitted that the pipe has not been paid for.

The Ordinance of January 29, 1855, provides that "No permit for the use of water shall be issued unless, at the time of the application, the person or persons shall exhibit the receipt of the proper officer for the amount of assessment or other satisfactory evidence of the payment thereof for the expense of laying the pipe on the premises for which the permit is granted.

This ordinance, if valid, must be complied with by the chief of the department.

The supplying of water and gas to a city is not a municipal duty; hence, when the city undertakes to do so it acts not by virtue of any rights of sovereignty, but exercises merely the functions of a private corporation.

Western Saving Fund Society v. City of Phila. 31 Pa. 175; Wheeler v. City of Phila. 77 Pa. 338.

The introduction of water by the city into private houses is not on the footing of a contract but of a license which is paid for.

Smith v. City of Phila. 81 Pa. 38.

It may very well be that when a license has been given by the city to the owner of a house to use the water, such license may not be withdrawn arbitrarily or from mere caprice. But it is equally clear that the city may adopt such rules in regard to the use of the water, and the payment therefor, as the municipal authorities shall deem expedient.

Girard Life Ins. Co. v. Phila. 88 Pa. 393.

This very ordinance was before the supreme court and sustained in the case of Philadelphia v. Cooke, 30 Pa. 56.

In the case of Girard Life Ins. Co. v. Philadelphia, above quoted, a mortgagee of a property purchased at a sheriff's sale. There was nothing upon the court record to show that the water rent was in arrears, yet the court compelled him to pay all arrears at time of sale; otherwise, to submit to the cutting off of water under the Ordinance of March 22, 1862.

In the present case the defendant could have easily ascertained the fact that the pipe was not paid for. To inquire and take searches at the office of the water department is now the settled practice with conveyancers and lawyers in passing titles.

There are miles of unpaid pipe in the City, for which no lien exists. Liens have in some cases expired by limitation and in others been discharged. Every man is bound to know the law. The law is that the City can make its own rules in selling water; and one rule, made and enforced for thirty years past, is that it will not furnish water before the pipe through which the water runs is paid for. Concerning this it is the business of a purchaser of land to inquire. To inquire whether a lien has been discharged, has expired, or has been satisfied, is not sufficient. The regulation of the business being that the pipe must be paid for to the satisfaction of the chief of the department, the inquiry of the purchaser must be: Has the pipe been paid for? And this inquiry must be made at the water department.

The relator, having failed to make this inquiry, has no legal right to say he was misled.

For what reason councils directed the lien to be satisfied is not known to the City.

To make a gift to the hospital was beyond the power of councils. There is no charter right to do it.

Dechert v. Commonwealth, 4 Cent. Rep. 754; Hodges v. *Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Bergner v. Harrisburg, 1 Pearson, 291.

The property in front of which the water pipe is laid is a vacant lot not used by the German Hospital, and consequently the lot is not exempt from frontage charges or taxes under the Act of May 12, 1874, exempting hospitals, etc.

If the ground were exempt, the owner must comply with the ordinance. The lien is by force of statute. The collection by lien under the statute is considered by the court as an exercise of the taxing power of the State, and in that way a lien for frontage becomes a tax. The Ordinance of January 29, 1855, is not an exercise of any taxing power of the State, it is simply a business regulation of a corporation.

If extinguishment of lien by judicial sale and payment to sheriff is neither actual nor constructive payment, certainly the satisfaction of claim without payment is no payment of the debt. Hundreds of verdicts have been rendered in the courts against the City on pipe claims, because the property liened was rural; yet it has never been supposed the City could be compelled to furnish water until the pipe was paid for, as required by the ordinance. If such be the case, the City will lose at least $100,000 of pipe debts where liens have been lost by adverse decisions on rural property defenses.

*See note, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

There is no equity in the position of the defendant. He has not paid for the pipe, and seeks to throw on his fellow citizens a burden of $500 which he should bear. He was not deceived. He could have ascertained in a minute whether the pipe had been paid for by inquiring at the proper office. The fact that he got no receipted bill from his vendor should have put him on inquiry. The fact that an ordinance directed the satisfaction was evidence that no money had been paid. When money is paid the city solicitor has full authority to satisfy without an ordinance.

If the City had said to the defendant, This pipe is paid for, and the defendant had acted upon that assertion, of course the City would be estopped from asserting the contrary. All that Matchett alleges is that the City said "This municipal claim is satisfied." The City contends that a satisfaction of a claim is not necessarily a payment of the debt. The City has two remedies, entirely distinct, by which to compel the payment of a claim for pipe, one given by statute, and the other by ordinance.

There is nothing which makes it compulsory upon the City to file a claim. The claim when filed will expire in five years, unless revived. It may be discharged by a sheriff's sale, and in other ways the remedy given by statute may fail; but the remedy provided by ordinance is good until actual payment.

A purchaser of real estate has no right to rely solely upon the lien records. In buying real estate if a man desires to know upon what terms he can get the use of water, he must go to the office of the water department, and there inquire.

It has been decided in the case of Norris v. Brady, 5 Whart. 541, that the satisfaction of a judgment on a bond accompanying a mortgage does not impair the same debt secured by the mortgage; and it has also been decided in Fleming v. Parry, 24 Pa. 47, that the satisfaction of a mortgage does not in conclusion of law discharge the bond secured by it. And it is said in the last named case "That there is no magic in an entry of satisfaction, either on a judgment or a mortgage, which can prevail against the truth and equity of the transaction."

See also Jones v. Johnson, 3 Watts & S. 276.

Mr. William C. Hannis, for defendant in error:

While it is now admitted that an inquiry at the water department would have developed the fact that said pipe had not been paid for in the ordinary way in cash to that department, yet it does not follow that the City satisfied said claim without receiving a consideration therefor. It is admitted that the consideration did not pass through the water department; but here is a hospital whose wards are always open to citizens or persons hurt in the employ of the City, and the consideration of this fact doubtless induced the select and common council and the mayor to order the city solicitor to enter satisfaction of record on the claims of the City against the German Hospital for water pipes laid in front of its property; and this the councils had undoubted power to do.

Tagg v. City, 18 W. N. C. 79; Lewis v. Lutz, Sharswood's Orig. MS. Vol. 10, p. 137; Tatham v. Phila. 2 W. N. C. 564.

This ordinance, declaring that the City was satisfied as to this claim, emanates from the same body; it is of as high authority as, and later in date than the Ordinance of 1855, which provides that a permit shall not be granted unless satisfactory evidences of payment be exhibited.

The City as against the defendant, who is an innocent purchaser, is estopped by its solemn declaration of record from now alleging that said pipe has not been paid for.

By these declarations in the ordinance and on the court record that her claims for water pipe were satisfied, of which facts the defendant had knowledge before he bought, as found by the case stated, the plaintiff misled the defendant from making that inquiry which he otherwise might have made, and thus he was induced to pay over his purchase money, believing the pipe to be paid for, without retaining any part of the purchase money from his vendor, and against whom he has no claim to recover it back; for clearly, the claim being satisfied, there was no liability of either his grantor or of his property for this alleged claim of the City, and even the liability of the hospital was barred more than six years by the Statute of Limitations.

Webster defines satisfaction: "Payment of a legal debt or demand, the discharging or canceling of a judgment or a mortgage by paying the amount of it." Satisfy is defined: "To make payment."

When the councils, the mayor and the city solicitor publicly declared that this claim for water pipe was satisfied, and thus used a word which invariably means payment, what duty was there imposed on the defendant to go further? This word "satisfied" is the common word applied whenever mortgages, judgments and all other claims of record have been paid; and the defendant was justified in believing, from the use of this common word, that the claim had been paid.

The argument that if, after learning of this declaration that the claim had been satisfied, the defendant, instead of relying on it, had inquired of the clerk at the water department he would have found that the declaration was not true, was strongly pressed on this court in Brooke v. New York etc. R. Co. 16 W. N. C. 514, which was a case of a false bill of lading fraudulently issued by defendant's shipping clerk, for goods which had never been received; and it was urged that if plaintiff had not relied on the declaration contained in bill of lading, but before advancing money on it, had applied to defendants, they would have at once learned that the bill was fraudulent, and that the statement in it, that the goods had been received, was false. The court disregarded this argument and upheld the plaintiff's claim that the defendants were estopped from showing that the statements contained in the bill of lading were false.

So in Bank v. Bank, 50 N.Y. 575, which was a false certificate of a check, and was pronounced genuine by the teller whose certificate it purported to be, the defendant bank claimed that the plaintiff had ample time and opportunity to catch the thief and recover his money; but the plaintiff showed that he had taken none of those steps, because of his reliance on the teller's statement that the certificate purporting to be signed by him was genuine; and the court upheld the claim of the plaintiff, on the ground of estoppel, holding that he had a right to rely on the declaration of the teller.

So in Knights v. Wiffen, L. R. 5 Q. B. 660, the person who relied upon the declaration took no active steps to retrieve his position, which he could and would have done had it not been for his reliance on the declaration; and he was damaged. The right of estoppel was upheld, and it was maintained upon the ground of the plaintiff's relying upon the statement and taking no steps further in consequence of the statement.

So in Casco Bank v. Keene, 53 Maine, 103, the plaintiff held a note purporting to be signed by defendant. Hearing that it was forged, he asked the defendant about it, who, looking at the note, admitted the signature to be genuine. The plaintiff, in reliance on that statement, refrained from all proceedings against the person who passed the note, to secure payment from him, which he would otherwise have taken; it was held that he was entitled to rely on this statement and refrain from further inquiry; and having sustained an injury thereby, the defendant was estopped from denying his signature.

So in Miller's Appeal, 84 Pa. 396, an owner of land, ignorant of her title, in good faith induced a party to purchase it from a third person, and afterwards, learning of her title, brought ejectment against the purchaser, and urged that if he had examined the records he would have learned of her title. But the court held that his very reliance on her acts and representations took from him an opportunity of knowledge; and it did not lie in her mouth to reproach him with ignorance of the law, or the maxim caveat emptor.

A party relying on a representation and refraining from taking any other steps which would have discovered the truth and, being injured in consequence, may hold the party making the representation estopped from setting up the truth.

Kiefer v. Rogers, 19 Minn. 32; Wannell v. Kem, 57 Mo. 478; Steele v. St. Louis etc. Ins. Co. 3 Mo. App. 207; Tobin v. Allen, 53 Miss. 563; Voorhis v. Olmstead, 66 N. Y. 113.

The records of the water department are not public records, like the court records, and therefore are not constructive notice of anything which may be contained in them. Nor was there any legal duty imposed on the defendant to apply there for information. The resolution of councils of the City of Philadelphia of March 4, 1884, creating a search office in the water department has not the force of a law, is constructive notice to no one, and amounts to no more than the by-laws of a private corporation. Nor does it anywhere appear in the case stated that the defendant or his conveyancer had actual notice of such a search office.

Baldwin v. Phila. 99 Pa. 164.

When one by his words or conduct willfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is precluded from averring, against the latter, a different state of things as existing at the same time.

Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & Ell. 469; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 654; Cornish v. Abington, 4 Hurlst. & N. 549; Bank v. Bank, 50 N.Y. 582; Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417; Hawkins v. Church, 23 Minn. 258.

When the conduct of a party has been such as to induce action by another, he shall be precluded from afterwards asserting, to the prejudice of that other, the contrary of that of which his conduct has induced the belief.

Gray's App. 10 W. N. C. 458; Waters' App. 35 Pa. 525; Brooke v. R. R. Co. 16 W. N. C. 514; Lawrence v. City, 14 W. N. C. 421.

But the City urges that there is no magic in the entry of satisfaction and cites cases to show that when a judgment has been satisfied of record, that the fact does not necessarily extinguish another lien given for the same debt. In all the cases on this point the contention is between the original parties, or their assignees for the benefit of creditors, who are not purchasers, and that there is not a case in the books where the lien of a satisfied judgment has been restored to the prejudice of a purchaser for value who bought in good faith, relying on the record as it was exhibited at the time of his purchase.

Duffey v. Houtz, 105 Pa. 96.

This is not a case of mere silence or negligence, on the part of the City, as was Girard Life Ins. Co. v. Phila. 88 Pa. 393. The City may not be obliged to speak or act, and in such cases caveat emptor may prevail; but when it does speak, it must speak the truth or be bound by what it has said, whether it be true or not, as to any person who has been induced to change his position, relying on such declaration.

Philadelphia v. Cooke, 30 Pa. 56, has no bearing on the question at issue here. It was a suit against the City to recover back money paid for a water pipe, on the ground that a sheriff's sale of the property produced enough to pay the claim in full, and therefore the City should have collected the money from the sheriff and not from the plaintiff below. The court held that the money paid was not paid under protest, that there was no duress of property, and consequently, it was a voluntary payment which could not be recovered back.

Per Curiam:

The learned judge committed no error in entering judgment in favor of the defendant on the case stated. He purchased with knowledge that the claim in question had been satisfied of record by the city solicitor, and relying thereon he paid over the whole purchase money to his vendor. He took possession and has erected a row of dwelling houses on the lot. To now permit the City to remove that satisfaction would not only be in conflict with the principle of equitable estoppel, but would work great injustice to the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

Eliza Ann WILDONER'S APPEAL.

DAVENPORT'S ESTATE.

A grandfather,—the guardian of the estate of his infant grandchild, who lives in his family from childhood to death, during minority, and is sickly and unable to work,—is entitled to reasonable compensation out of the estate, for the grandchild's support.

(Argued April 15, Decided April 25, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 316, E.D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Luzerne County, confirming a guardian's account. Affirmed.

In the final account of Charles Davenport, guardian of the estate of Charles F. Davenport, a deceased minor, the accountant charged himself with pension money and bounty amounting to $1,674.33, and claimed credit for $4,045.85.

Among the credits claimed were these:

Paid D. L. O'Neill, attorney, for filing partial account	$ 10 00
Paid car fare and expenses, witnesses, etc., on pension case	50 00
Paid board, clothing, mending, washing, medical attendance, medicine and schooling from July 16, 1867, date from which pension was allowed to Oct. 28, 1880, when ward arrived at sixteen years, twelve years, three mos., at $10 per month	1,474 00
Fees of guardian	123 70
Paid justice for executing pension vouchers	9 50
Two years' board of ward from 16 years to 18 years with clothing and medicine	384 00
One year's board, attending, nursing and medicines at $25 per month	300 00
One suit of clothes during nineteen years	16 00
Nursing and other attendance and board during nine months from January 1, 1885, to Oct. 1, 1885, the date of death of ward, at $5 per day	1,350 00
Cash given him to pay Henry Long	10 00
Cash given him to get suit of clothes	50 00
Paid D. L. O'Neill for filing this account	20 00

The exceptions filed by Eliza Ann Wildoner, the mother of the minor, specified, inter alia, these items.

Upon dismissing the exceptions the court below delivered the following opinion:

A minor is incapable in law of making either a valid will or an assignment of his estate; so we must dismiss these facts out of the case.

In 1882, when the ward was past seventeen years of age, this guardian, who was also the grandfather of the child, was before this court asking for past and future allowance for the support of the ward. The ward was then a witness, and testified in behalf of the guardian, expressing a willingness that his guardian should be paid for his care and support. On his deathbed, only twenty-nine days before he would have attained his majority, he expressed to his neighbors and former companions a desire to live only until he could according to law, settle with his grandfather, and allow him his entire estate for his kindness toward him.

The mother of the boy married in 1869 and left the child wholly with his grandfather, but now seeks to acquire all of the pension money which was received for the child during his last illness. The entire estate consists of pension money received from 1867 to 1882 at the rate of $10 per month and $100 bounty. When this case was before us in 1882 it presented features entirely different from those presented now. Then the evidence exhibited the ward as a stout, healthy, lazy boy, indulged by his grandparents in idleness, and general vagabondage, and we refused to make any allowance for such care and support. Now, however, the evidence clearly shows that the child, although large, was weak and sickly, unable to work and carrying with him inherited and rapidly developing seeds of consumption, of which he died. Under all the circumstances we cannot now say that the guardian did anything but his duty in smoothing the brief pathway of this youth to the grave.

Perhaps no one who has never had the experience can appreciate the task and burden of nursing the sick, especially with such a disease as this was, and perhaps no one ever desires to use money for any purpose more than to be indulged and favored and watched under such circumstances. The entire fund added up in a column looks large, but when our view of the case is taken $10 per month looks small enough for the care and support of this boy under all the circumstances, during all the years and especially the last two or three of his life.

We do not balance the legal authorities, for they are all based upon a different state of facts. We can only say that in our judgment justice between the parties can only be done according to law by allowing the guardian the entire fund received by him for his ward for support of the child, his expenses in securing the fund, and his settling the account. We, therefore, enter judgment that there is nothing due either the ward's estate or the guardian. The guardian must pay the cost of this proceeding, for not keeping an account and for not having the court adjust the matter of allowance in the start or having some express agreement with the mother.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in holding generally as matter of fact that the child, although large, was weak and sickly, unable to work and that the guardian did his duty; in holding as matter of law that the guardian was entitled to the entire fund received by him for his ward for support of the child and his expenses in securing the fund and settling the account; in not sustaining the exceptions filed to the said guardian's account before confirmation of the same; and in entering judgment that there is nothing due the ward's estate.

Messrs. John Lynch, and E. A. Lynch, for appellant:

The guardian stood in loco parentis to his ward, and therefore cannot legally charge for his support.

The ward earned his support while living with his guardian, who therefore cannot charge for the same.

In Seibert's Appeal, 19 Pa. 49, it is held that "If a testator, by benevolent manifestations, may put himself in loco parentis, so as to entitle a stranger to maintenance, much slighter circumstances will bring the case of a grandchild within that rule."

In Duffey v. Duffey, 44 Pa. 399, a daughter of the plaintiff died leaving children. Three of them, being very young, were taken from the funeral to their grandparent's home. Their father married again and died four years after. The grandparent presented a bill of $690 for boarding and clothing of the children. The court held that he could not recover; that a a grandfather is liable to relieve and maintain his destitute grandchildren when their necessities require it, and that their relationship excludes the implication of a promise to pay him.

In Douglas' Appeal, 82 Pa. 169, it was held that where a stepfather takes his stepdaughter to live with him as one of his family, he is not entitled to be repaid for expenditures made for her during her minority.

In Brown's Appeal, 8 Cent. Rep. 919, 112 Pa. 18, the guardian received pension money for his ward and paid it, under advice of counsel and a special contract to the stepfather of his ward for support; and it was held that he could not be surcharged with the amount so paid the stepfather. But in the case at bar there was not only no such contract, but such a distinct understanding between the mother and the grandfather as precludes any presumption of compensation.

In Rickman's Appeal, 61 Pa, 251, it was held that to recover for maintenance after the death of the ward, the stepfather must prove a contract with the ward's guardian.

In Horton's Appeal, 94 Pa. 62, the ward was a niece of the wife of guardian and lived with him. She worked for him, and he boarded, clothed and schooled her as one of his own children. There was no contract, and the court held that the guardian was not entitled to a credit in his account for support.

In Beam's Appeal, 96 Pa. 74, the guardian was an uncle (by marriage) of two wards, and charged in his account $2 per week for board, in all $557. The court disallowed the claim, because of the relationship and the fact that they were members of his family.

Suppose the situation were reversed and the mother was a claimant for the services of her boy, against the grandfather, for wages earned as a servant; the court would promptly defeat such a claim.

In the case of Lantz v. Frey, 14 Pa. 201, it was held that a female living with her stepfather, while in her minority, is not entitled, after arriving at full age, to recover from him wages for services rendered, without proof of a contract express or implied. Such a contract will not be implied as to one standing in loco parentis, merely from the fact of such service having been performed.

Patton v. Conn, 5 Cent. Rep. 228; Wall's App. 2 Cent. Rep. 330; 2 Kent, Com.; Cummings v. Cummings, 8 Watts, 366; Defrance v. Austin, 9 Pa. 309; Candor's App. 5 Watts & S. 513; Smith v. Milligan, 43 Pa. 107.

If it was necessary to expend the money for the support and care of the ward, it was the duty of the guardian to follow the Act of Assembly, particularly when he was aided by counsel from the inception of this trust. It matters little to an orphan child whether his interests are sacrificed and his prospects blighted by well meaning ignorance or by willful malice. Either is within the definition of misconduct, a word which applies not to the motive but the act.

Act March 29, 1832, P. L. 192; Nicholson's App. 20 Pa. 54; Wall's App. 104 Pa. 15; Pennock's Est. 32 Legal Int. 169; 2 Rhone, Orphans' Court, Pr. 237, pl. 12, 13, 15.

The attempt to conclude the mother and heir of the ward's estate, because of an alleged assignment and will in favor of the guardian, cannot of course prevail. They were both executed at the same time, and but a few days before the ward's death, when he was not of age, and was weak in mind, and destitute of all information about his estate.

The fact that the ward was induced to execute the papers in question is a strong circumstance, showing that he did not comprehend the condition of the estate according to the guardian's account, and that he at least believed there was something due him.

Act April 8, 1833, P. L. 249, § 3; Will's App. 22 Pa. 325; Eberts v. Eberts, 55 Pa. 110; Kinter's App. 62 Pa. 318; Milligan's App. 82 Pa. 389.

Acquiescence in, or acknowledgment of the invalid act, cannot be invested with greater vigor than the deed itself by which the act was done. The policy of the law which denies the capacity to do the act as clearly denies the capacity to confirm it, except in the legal mode. If, through the administration of equity, we can produce a result which the law denies ab initio on grounds of public policy, then estoppel or compensation, its equitable equivalent, will accomplish what the law and policy have forbidden.

Glidden v. Strupler, 52 Pa. 400.

Mr. G. R. Bedford, for appellee:

Seibert's Appeal, 19 Pa. 58, only decided that a legacy to a grandchild, payable at twenty-one years, carried interest needed for his support meantime.

Duffey v. Duffey, 44 Pa. 399, was a suit by a grandfather against the father for support of the latter's children. No contract or even request on part of the father was shown, and no claim was made until after the father's death.

In Douglas' Appeal, 82 Pa. 169, it was shown that the ward performed "a good deal of work," and it did not appear that the guardian stepfather was of insufficient ability.

Brown's Appeal, 8 Cent. Rep. 919, 112 Pa. 18, upon its reasoning, as well as the conclusion reached, is an authority in our favor.

In Rickman's Appeal, 61 Pa. 251, it did not appear that the stepfather was unable to afford the support.

In Horton's Appeal, 94 Pa. 62, it was shown that the guardian frequently declared that he had taken his ward as one of his own children and would treat her as such, and that he did not want anyone to send her to school. It was also shown that the ward was healthy and performed regular services, and it was further found as a fact by the examiner that the ward was eligible to admission to the school for soldiers' orphans. Added to this the guardian was of sufficient ability.

In Beam's Appeal, 96 Pa. 74, it was found as matter of fact that "The services of the ward were the equivalent of the board charged."

In Nicholson's Appeal, 20 Pa. 54, the maternal relatives offered to maintain the minors free of all expense.

Wall's Appeal, 104 Pa. 15, is not in point. It only held guardian liable to account notwithstanding lapse of time, etc.

As to the suggestion that "If the situation was reversed and the mother was a claimant for the services of her boy, against the grandfather, the court would promptly defeat such claim," it is sufficient to say that the cases cited on the question were all actions at law dependent on contract, and moreover the support and care of the infant in almost every instance, as in the present, were more than equivalent to the services claimed for. On the other hand the authorities are abundant in favor of the decree appealed from.

In Harland's Accounts, 5 Rawle, 323, it is said: chancery will allow even for past maintenance, where the father was not of competent ability.

In Strawbridge's Appeal, 5 Whart. 568, a mother was allowed in settlement of her account for support of her minor son during sixteen years.

In Davies v. Howard, 4 Mass. 97, a father was allowed for support of his children, he being of little property, although he made no charge against them and manifested no intention of doing so.

In Brown's Appeal, 8 Cent. Rep. 919, 112 Pa. 18, a stepfather was allowed for support of a minor child in addition to use of real estate, and although the minor did chores, etc. The question was on the reasonableness of the guardian's agreement.

In Pennock's Estate, 11 Phila. 75, a mother was allowed for past support, the court saying that it may ratify what it might direct and will authorize a reimbursement for expenses.

In Longaker's Appeal, 36 Legal Int. 73, it was said that when the amount paid for maintenance or education of minors is within such limits as ought to have been decreed upon application, it will be allowed on settlement of the account.

In Simon's Estate, 42 Legal Int. 445, a guardian was allowed on the settlement of his account for support of his ward, although no previous order for maintenance had been made by the court.

In Sellick's Appeal, 42 Legal Int. 456, 16 W. N. C. 320, it was held: 1. The absence of an order of court making an allowance for the support of a ward will not prevent the court from making a proper allowance upon the settlement of the guardian's account when the circumstances require it. 2. The pension when granted related to and was paid from the death of the father. There is no legal objection therefore to making the allowance extend backward to the beginning of the pension, if the real needs of the ward require or justify it.

From these authorities it is manifest that where one even stands in loco parentis and is of insufficient means, he will be allowed for the support of his ward whether or not he manifested any previous intention to charge for it, and whether he applied originally to have an allowance fixed by the court in advance or claims the same upon the settlement of his account. Indeed, in a case like the present one it would be impossible to fix in advance a proper allowance, for neither the court nor the guardian could anticipate the prolonged illness of the ward, wearying alike to him and to those who had the care of him.

Per Curiam:

We discover nothing in this record which demands a reversal of the decree. The conclusion of the learned judge is well sustained by authority and by the justice and equity of the case.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

Alfred S. ACUFF'S APPEAL.

1. The opening of a decree in equity rests in the sound discretion of the common pleas; and unless the discretion has been abused, a refusal to open the decree will not be reviewed in the supreme court.
2. Under the Act of April 1, 1874, an appeal from a decree in equity cannot be taken after the expiration of two years.

(Argued April 20, Decided May 2, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 463, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Common Pleas of Montgomery County, for the plaintiff in a bill in equity. Appeal quashed.

This was a bill in equity filed by Milton Newberry, executor of Eliza Acuff, deceased, against Alfred S. Acuff, to annul an instrument in writing and strike from the record the judgment entered thereon.

The facts as they appeared before H. K. Weand, Esq., the Master appointed by the court, were stated in his report which was as follows:

The undersigned Master appointed in the above case respectfully reports that he met the parties interested in the above case, and after hearing their proofs reports the following conclusions of fact and of law:

Eliza Acuff died on or about May 2, 1882, having first made her last will and testament, dated December 31, 1878, and a codicil thereto dated the third of February, 1881, both duly proven the 8th of May, 1882. The plaintiff was appointed executor of said will. In said will and codicil the testatrix discriminated against her son Alfred S. Acuff. When the will and codicil were offered for probate before the register of wills, Alfred S. Acuff filed exceptions thereto on the 15th of May, 1882. These exceptions were dismissed by the court, and probate granted.

The executor advertised the real estate for sale on the 12th of October, 1882, and on the same day Alfred S. Acuff appeared in the prothonotary's office, at Norristown, and presented a paper for filing, purporting to be a judgment note of Eliza Acuff to the order of Alfred S. Acuff for $6,000, dated July 27, 1881, at one year with interest, witnessed by Thomas F. Tyson. Judgment was entered upon this note in judgment docket H, 1, p. 220. As soon as the fact that this judgment had been entered of record was communicated to Mr. Fox, attorney for Eliza Acuff's estate, proceedings were commenced to have the judgment set aside and the judgment stricken from the record, upon the ground that the name of Eliza Acuff to said note was a forgery and that Alfred S. Acuff knew that it was not her genuine signature.

Afterwards Alfred S. Acuff was indicted and tried in the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery County for the offense of forging, uttering and publishing said forged note.

The testimony given on the trial of said case has been offered before the Master to have the same force and effect as if the witnesses had been produced before him and testified to the same facts.

Pending these proceedings Alfred S. Acuff and wife made a deed of assignment of their property for the benefit of their creditors, to Benj. P. Wertsner as assignee. He was represented before the Master by counsel.

The Master finds from the testimony that the name of Eliza Acuff to the judgment note, dated 12th of October, 1882, upon which judgment was entered in docket H, 1, p. 220, was not the genuine signature of Eliza Acuff, but that the same was a forgery, and that no consideration passed to Eliza Acuff for said note; and further that the entry of said judgment after the death of Eliza Acuff gave it no lien as a judgment.

As a result of this finding, the Master recommends a decree: 1, that said judgment be stricken from the record; 2, that said judgment note be marked canceled by the prothonotary; 3, that Alfred S. Acuff pay the costs of this proceeding.

Subsequently the court entered the following decree:

"And now December 8, 1883, the report of the master having been filed in open court and no exceptions having been filed thereto before him, it is now ordered and decreed as follows: that said report be now confirmed, and 1, that the judgment entered in judgment docket H, 1, p. 220, wherein Alfred S. Acuff is plaintiff, and Eliza Acuff defendant, be stricken from the record; 2, that the note upon which said judgment was entered be marked canceled; 3, that the defendant pay the costs of this proceeding."

On April 30, 1884, the plaintiff filed a bill of costs amounting to $132.50. No further proceedings were had until September 23, 1885, when the defendant filed a petition in which, after setting forth the docket entries, he alleged:

"That at the time the master's report was filed, to wit: December 8, 1883, your petitioner was out of the jurisdiction of the court and was not aware of it; and he is informed and believes that the filing of said master's report was assented to by his family and by Mr. Rogers appearing as counsel for your petitioner, by agreement with the plaintiffs in said bill, and their counsel, Messrs. Hunsicker and Fox, upon consideration that if the defendant, who, September 8, 1883, had been convicted of the forgery of said note, would return into the jurisdiction of the court and consent to the cancellation of said note and judgment, they and the prosecutors, petitioner's sister et al., would recommend no imprisonment, and a decree should be made as above stated and set forth, striking his said judgment from the record and canceling his said judgment note.

"Your petitioner was informed by his family that he should return to the jurisdiction of the court, and the plaintiffs and prosecutors promised that he would receive, and they only would ask, a nominal sentence for the conviction aforesaid. He returned January 5, 1884, and was sentenced by the court of quarter sessions of said county to an imprisonment of ten days and to pay a fine of $500 and costs; the court sentencing first only to pay a fine, when it was found that by law there must also be an imprisonment, when the sentence to ten days' imprisonment was added.

"Your petitioner was convicted September 18, 1883, of the crime of the forgery of said note, and the same day a motion was made by him for a new trial.

"September 21, 1883. Reasons for a new trial were filed. October 8, 1883. Additional reasons for a new trial were filed by permission of the court. Since said trial and conviction your petitioner has found abundant evidence to sustain his defense in said suit; that he did not know the master's report had been filed until after his sentence; that no exceptions were filed to it; and that he was not aware (till after his imprisonment) of the said decree of the court having been made.

"Your petitioner is informed and believes that such consideration for such a report in equity and decree thereon is invalid and void, contrary to public policy, prejudicial to petitioner's right, and against the law.

"Your petitioner therefore prays the court to open said decree in said equity case, and direct the cause to proceed; to reinstate said judgment in said decree mentioned, and that the third paragraph of said decree, 'that the note on which said judgment was entered be canceled,' be annulled and set aside; and that Your Honor grant such other and further relief as to the court shall seem meet."

On the same day the court granted a rule to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted; whereupon, the plaintiff Newberry filed an answer in which he alleged:

"1. The said rule was improvidently granted in the absence, and without the knowledge of this respondent or of his counsel.

"2. The court had no authority to entertain the said petition, the said decree having been entered December 8, 1883, and being final and conclusive.

"3. The estate of the said Eliza Acuff, deceased, was finally settled, and the account of this respondent as her administrator, filed on the first day of February, 1884, and finally confirmed by the court. Distribution of the said estate was made upon the basis and faith of the said decree, and the said Alfred S. Acuff on the 18th day of March, 1885, received his share of the balance of the estate in the hands of this respondent, as administrator aforesaid.

"4. The conviction and sentence of the said petitioner for the forgery of the instrument upon which the judgment was entered is final and conclusive evidence that the said instrument was null and void, and that no order the court could make would restore the dead instrument to life.

"5. It is wholly untrue that this respondent made any promise or interfered in any way for the purpose of screening the petitioner from punishment, or to mitigate his sentence for the crime of which he had been convicted. Respondent is informed and believes it to be true that the petitioner absconded after his conviction, and remained in concealment out of the jurisdiction of the court for a long time, to evade the punishment of his crime. Respondent had nothing to do with inducing him to return, and would not have interfered by any recommendation as to his sentence.

"6. It could do the petitioner no good to open or set aside the decree in equity, inasmuch as the instrument being already dead, no proceeding could be had upon it.

"7. The petitioner was represented in the equity suit by able counsel, who faithfully attended to his interests throughout. The case was heard and decided by an able auditor, upon overwhelming evidence; and it contained nothing to which counsel could have filed exceptions."

Subsequently the court entered this decree: "Now, March 1, 1886, the testimony taken by the defendant in support of the above stated rule being mostly inadmissible and altogether unsatisfactory to establish that any injustice has been done him; and, it being admitted that the executor of the last will and testament has fully accounted for and distributed the estate of Eliza Acuff upon the faith of said decree and in accordance with said will, the petition of the said Alfred S. Acuff is refused and the rule thereupon granted is discharged, at the costs of the petitioner."

The assignments of error specified this decree and the decree of December 8, 1883.

Messrs. H. B. Dickinson and George N. Corson, for appellant:

The report of the master shows that he received illegal testimony upon which his report is based.

Rule 78 prescribes that the decree of the court shall recite that "This cause came on to be heard at this term and was argued by counsel; and thereupon it is ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows:" then follows the decree, which "shall be drawn by the solicitor of the party in whose favor it is, who shall, unless otherwise herein provided, serve a copy thereof on the solicitor of the adverse party, with notice of the time, which shall not be less than three days thereafter, when the same shall be submitted to court." 79. It nowhere appears that this was done. No exceptions were filed; and the court below seems to have been left under the impression that the defendant did not object; in other words, that he now entered the plea of guilty.

The appellant here was utterly ignorant of this decree in equity. He thought that the case was abandoned, or dropped. If the appellee had petitioned the court in the usual way, to open the judgment, an issue would have been awarded and a trial had, with the right to appeal by the party aggrieved, under the Act of April 4, 1877.

The proceedings in this case were not according to the common law or common practice, in law or equity.

A question of fact in a civil court is carried over to the criminal court, a conviction procured, a sentence of ten days pronounced which had to be fulfilled before it could be reversed or reviewed in the supreme court; and then this conviction with the evidence in the criminal court is carried back to a master in the civil court, as proof upon which the court of common pleas strikes off a $6,000 judgment!

If the witnesses who testified in the former criminal case were dead at the trial of the civil case, their testimony taken when all parties were in full life would be admissible perhaps under the authorities; and documentary evidence in a former trial, as a warrant or survey, is admissible; Bratton v. Mitchell, 3 Pa. 49; but there is no authority for reading to a master, in a subsequent hearing in an equity suit, the testimony of living witnesses in a prior criminal prosecution.

Forney v. Hallagher, 11 S. & R. 203; Stiles v. Bradford, 4 Rawle, 394.

The Act of March 28, 1814, providing that depositions to be read in a former cause, may be read in a later cause between the same parties upon the same subject, does not apply to this case, or to testimony in a criminal case.

Messrs. G. R. Fox & Son, for appellee:

The petition for rehearing was not filed until September 23, 1885, nearly two years after the final decree in equity, and six months after Acuff had received his said share. The rule of court (Rule in Equity 86) provides that "A rehearing may be granted at any time, within the discretion of the court; but when the decree has been executed, parties who have acted on the faith of such decree shall not be prejudiced by such decree being reversed or varied."

Per Curiam:

The appeal from the first decree was not taken in time to authorize as to review it under the statute. The refusal of the court to open the decree rests in the sound discretion of the court, and the record shows no fact which will permit an appeal to lie.

Appeal quashed.

Court of Chancery.

Alfred J. CLAYPOOL et al., Exrs.,
v.
Joseph NORCROSS et al.

A clause in a will was as follows: "The residue of my estate to be kept in reserve for further consideration in the way of charitable purposes in a liberal way, not to any particular creed or sect of religion." Held, that the intention of the testatrix was to give the residue of her estate to the executors named in the will, in trust for such charitable purposes as they may think proper.

(Decided April 28, 1887.)

BILL for construction of will. On final hearing on pleadings.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Mark R. Sooy, for complainants:

The next of kin insist that the testatrix died intestate in respect to the residue on the following grounds: 1, that there is no gift of the residue; 2, that if there is, it is void for uncertainty.

The intent of the testatrix must govern, if it can be effectuated without violating the principles of law.

Den, McMurtrie, v. McMurtrie, 3 J. S. Green, 287; Den, Nelson, v. Combs, 3 Harr. (N. J.) 28; Hesketh v. Murphy, 9 Stew. Eq. 304; Wisner v. Barnet, 4 Wash. C. C. 631, 637; Denise v. Denise, 10 Stew. Eq. 163, 169.

That the testatrix intended to give the residue of her estate to charitable purposes seems to be clear. That intention can be gathered from the language she has used. Her words are: "The residue of my estate to be kept in reserve for further consideration in the way of charitable purposes." This is equivalent to a direction to her executors to keep in trust for charitable purposes the residue of her estate. She does not say that the residue is kept in reserve; but it is to be kept. Here is more than a statement. It is a direction, a direction to her executors. The executor is a trustee of the estate of the testator. Such a direction is equivalent to a bequest of the residue of testatrix's estate for the purpose mentioned.

"A will speaks only from the death of the testatrix."

Inhabitants of Phillipsburgh v. Bruch, 10 Stew. Eq. 485; Thornal v. Force, 2 Stew. Eq. 220.

Construing this will, as speaking from the death of testatrix, and we have her saying "The residue of my estate to be kept in reserve." By whom? Not by herself, for she was dead, but by her executors. The direction is to them. They are to keep the residue in reserve for their consideration in the way of charitable purposes. This construction is favored by the words immediately following "in a liberal way, not to any particular creed or sect of religion."

These expressions are but suggestions for the guidance of the trustees in the distribution of moneys given to them by this clause. Testatrix's direction is that they shall dispose of the residue for charitable purposes. But, placing implicit reliance on their discretion, she leaves them the sole judges of the particular objects of her bounty, suggesting, however, that the gifts to be made by them be liberal, and be restricted to no particular creed or sect of religion.

In construing this clause some help may be derived from the use of the word "residue."

Johnson v. Poulson, 5 Stew. Eq. 390.

The residue of testatrix's estate is what remains after the legacies, debts and charges have been abstracted. It has not yet been precisely ascertained. It is this sum when ascertained that is to be kept in reserve for further consideration in the way of charitable purposes.

Will this residuary clause admit of the construction thus put upon it? If so, it must prevail. It is apparent that she never intended the residue of her estate to fall to her next of kin. It was to be held in reserve for further consideration; but in what way? Not in the way of benefiting her next of kin, but in the way of charitable purposes. By necessary implication therefore she intended to disinherit her next of kin. The court will not adopt, therefore, any construction that will let in the heirs or next of kin, if another construction consistent with her intention to promote charitable objects be possible.

Van Duyne v. Van Duyne, 1 McCart. 398; Jarm. Wills, p. 643; Hesketh v. Murphy, 9 Stew. Eq. 309; Perry, Trusts, § 709.

Doubts should be so construed as to prevent intestacy.

Yawger v. Yawger, 10 Stew. Eq. 216; 1 McCart. 124.

Is the bequest void for uncertainty? Courts are slow to hold a charitable bequest void for uncertainty. Where it is possible to give a meaning they will do it, that the will of the testator may be operative. "It has become a settled and I think a reasonable rule of law, that a devise is never to be construed void for uncertainty but from necessity. If there is a possibility of reducing it to a certainty, the devise is good."

Den, Emans, v. Emans, 2 Pennington (N. J.) 970.

"It is only when a reasonable construction and the discovery of the intent of the testator are utterly hopeless that all effect should be denied to the will."

Den v. Crawford, 3 Halst. Law, 118.

"It must be an extreme case in which the court will decree the will void for uncertainty."

Den, McMurtrie, v. McMurtrie, 3 J. S. Green, 276.

"In order to avoid a will for uncertainty, it must be incapable of any clear meaning."

Stewart v Stewart, 4 Stew. Eq. 398, 405.

"The court will not hold a devise or bequest to be void for uncertainty, unless it is wholly unable to discover the testator's meaning."

Cleveland v. Carson, 10 Stew. Eq. 377, 380.

If an uncertainty exist at all (supposing there was an intention on the part of the testatrix to give something by this clause) it must be an uncertainty in respect either to the subject of the bequest, or to the persons intended to take under it as trustees, or to the objects or beneficiaries of the trust.

1. There is no uncertainty in the subject. It is the residue of the testatrix's estate. That is capable of being precisely ascertained.

2. There is no uncertainty in the persons who are to take as trustees. They are the executors. The direction to keep the residue in reserve is given to them. They are named in a subsequent clause of the will. They are trustees by implication.

Van Duyne v. Van Duyne, 1 McCart. 402; Dorr v. Wainwright, 13 Pick. 328; Pettingill v. Pettingill, 60 Maine, 411, 423; Nutter v. Vickery, 64 Maine, 490, 494.

There is no uncertainty in the objects or beneficiaries of the trust. True, the will does not specifically name the persons or institutions that are to receive this charity. It leaves the beneficiaries to be chosen and named by the executors, the persons appointed to distribute the charity.

Perry, Trusts, §§ 709, 732; DeCamp v. Dobbins, 2 Stew. Eq. 36; Brown v. Pancoast, 7 Stew. Eq. 321; Hesketh v. Murphy, 8 Stew. Eq. 23.

The direction given to the executors to hold this residue in reserve for charitable purposes, carries with it by implication the power to select the particular beneficiaries.

Hesketh v. Murphy, 9 Stew. Eq. 304.

Mr. C. E. Hendrickson, with Mr. B. Gummere, for defendants:

The testatrix does not make any bequest or disposition of her residuary estate, but expressly reserves the disposition of it for further consideration.

Her exact words are: "The residue of my estate to be kept in reserve for further consideration," etc.

It is a general rule in the construction of wills that the language used shall receive its ordinary interpretation, except where some other is necessarily or clearly indicated.

1 Redf. Wills, par. 16, p. 431.

The ordinary meaning or definition of keep is "to cause to remain in a given position, as within one's grasp or control;" "to maintain hold upon," and of the word "reserve," "the act of reserving or keeping back" or "that which is reserved or kept back," and of the word "consideration" "the act of considering;" "continuous and careful thought;" "contemplation;" "deliberation."

And with these definitions in mind, and in the absence of other expressions of the testatrix, indicating a clear meaning to the contrary, we must infer that the testatrix meant, as to the balance of her estate undisposed of by the legacies previously given in said will, that she was not then prepared to make a disposition of it, that it should be reserved or kept back in her own control until she had further considered and deliberated upon the objects and method of such disposition.

A fair construction of the language it seems to me indicates that this clause of the will speaks from the date of the will and not from the death of the testator. If so, then the clause must be so read.

Thornal v. Force, 2 Stew. Eq. 220; 1 Redf. Wills, 425; Jarm. Rule 4.

This view is further strengthened and fortified by the words "further," "to be kept in reserve for further consideration," etc.

This imports that the disposition of the residue had been under consideration by some one, and by whom else could it have been so under consideration than by the testatrix who alone had the power to consider upon and determine what disposition she should make of her property?

This word "further" indicates clearly that the testatrix is speaking at the date of the will and not at her death; it could not apply to anyone else, for no one else had considered it; and she could not further consider after she was dead—the word applies and makes sense in the construction we contend for: that she reserved the residue for her further consideration.

The words "further consideration" thereby clearly point to the testatrix as the one by whom the residue was "to be kept in reserve for further consideration in the way of charitable purposes," etc. They show that she had been considering the propriety of a bequest of the residue of her estate to some object or trust of a charitable nature, not based upon any test of religious creed or sect, but that she had not yet settled the matter in her mind.

Again; in the phrase "in the way of charitable purposes" the words "in the way of" import rather an act of the mind of the testatrix considering the matter of a bequest in the way of or in the discretion of charitable purposes, rather than having fixed upon charitable purposes as the settled object of a bequest.

The vagueness and uncertainty of the words of the clause when claimed to support a bequest are in strange contrast to the certainty and definiteness of the testatrix in all her other bequests, but are in entire harmony with the insistment of the defendants that said clause imports an undefined and unsettled purpose to devote the residue of the estate to charity and a reservation of the disposition of said residue for further consideration.

1 Redf. Wills, § 3, p. 421; § 12, p. 430; Rule 17, note 1, p. 428; Hall v. Warren, 9 H. L. Cas. 420; S. C. 7 Jur. N. S. 1069.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

Rachel N. Murphy, deceased, by her will, among other bequests, gave to the "Little Sisters of the Poor" and the "Working Girls' Home" (both institutions located in Philadelphia) $500 each and she then provided as follows: "The residue of my estate to be kept in reserve for further consideration in the way of charitable purposes in a liberal way, not to any particular creed or sect of religion," and she appointed the complainants executors. The question presented is whether the gift of the residue is a valid charitable bequest.

That the language of the clause was not used to signify an intention upon the part of the testatrix to withhold the residue for future disposition by herself, or in other words that she did not mean to express an intention not to dispose of it by the will is clear from the consideration of the language of the clause. Had she intended so to withhold it, why should she have designated the manner in which the residue was to be disposed of: "in a liberal way, not to any particular creed or sect of religion"?

It would also seem from the initial clause of the will: "I, Rachel N. Murphy, herewith take my final leave of the world," that she did not contemplate any further testamentary or other disposition of any part of her property. By the words "to be kept in reserve" she meant "to be held in trust;" and by the residuary clause she intended to give the residue to the executors in trust to be disposed of by them for such charitable purposes as they might in their discretion see fit to apply it to; she, at the time, expressing a wish that they should act therein with a liberal spirit so far as religious tenets were concerned, and that they, therefore, should not in the distribution confine their gifts to any particular religious sect or to those who professed belief in any particular religious creed.

It is to be observed that the direction is that the residue is "to be" kept (not is kept) in reserve, etc. That is equivalent to and is intended as a direction to keep the residue in reserve. It is not to be supposed that if the testatrix had intended merely to express an intention to withhold the residue for further disposition, she would have considered it necessary to speak with any particularity as to her design in reference to it. It would have been enough to say that it was withheld for further consideration and disposition. But the language is that it is to be reserved for further consideration "in the way of charitable purposes in a liberal way, and not to any particular creed or sect of religion."

This language is clearly a direction as to the disposition to be made by those charged with the duty of disposing of the residue. It seems to me quite clear that the testatrix intended by the clause under consideration to dispose of the residue, and that in the language she has used she must be regarded as speaking at the time of her death and not at the time of making her will. Courts deal liberally in the construction of bequests for charity, and in some cases sustain such bequests, where if they were to an individual they would not be sustained. The testatrix intended to give the residue to the executors. Although they are not named in the clause, the gift is to them by implication; and it is in trust for such charitable purposes as they may think proper.

John H. SHARP
v.
Alfred HIBBINS and Wife.

1. A partner, who, after the dissolution of the firm has disposed of the partnership property, collected debts due the firm and paid debts due from it, can not be excused from accounting to his copartner on the ground that he has paid out more for the firm in paying its debts than he has received from the assets.
2. The property of the wife of a partner can not, at the suit of his copartner, be charged with moneys drawn by her husband upon his own account from the firm's funds in bank and expended by him in improvements upon her land and in the payment of interest on a mortgage upon the property, where there is no proof that it was done surreptitiously or of fraud on her part, and it appears that it was done with the knowledge of the other partner.

(Decided April 28, 1887.)

BILL for an account. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs. Dismissed as to Mrs. Hibbins.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. James W. Field, for complainant.

Messrs. G. P. Kingsley and E. M. Colie, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

Sharp and Hibbins were partners in business in Orange in this State. The copartnership began in 1872 and was dissolved by mutual consent in 1877. Sharp brings this suit against Hibbins and his wife, to obtain from the former an account of the partnership affairs and assets which at the dissolution of the copartnership were left in his hands, and to charge the real estate of Mrs. Hibbins with moneys which (according to the allegations of the bill) were taken by Hibbins from the funds of the firm and expended upon that property in paying interest upon a mortgage thereon and in improving the property with buildings, etc.

That the complainant is entitled to the account which he seeks there can be no question. The proof is that Sharp and Hibbins were copartners from August 1, 1872, to January 20, 1877; that at the dissolution of the copartnership all the assets were, as before stated, left in the hands of Hibbins, upon an agreement on his part with Sharp that he would settle the affairs of the concern. He has acted under that agreement, has disposed of the property, collected the debts due to the firm and has, as he alleges, paid debts due from it, but he has never accounted with Sharp in the matter. It is urged on his behalf that he should not be required to account, because it appears by his testimony that he has paid out much more for the firm in the payment of its debts than he has received from the assets.

Sharp is entitled to an accounting notwithstanding this claim. The court will not in such a case as this take the account at the hearing; the only material evidence on this part of the case is that which bears upon the question whether the complainant is entitled to an account or not. Gresley, Eq. Ev. 240; Hudson v. Trenton Locomotive etc. Co. 1 C. E. Green, 475.

The claim to a lien upon the separate property of Mrs. Hibbins is not established. There is no proof that the property was not hers bona fide. Nor is there any proof of fraud on her part. If her husband expended money drawn by him from the firm's funds, in improvements upon her land and in the payment of interest upon the mortgage upon the property, there is no proof that it was done surreptitiously; but on the contrary it would appear that it was done with the knowledge of the complainant. The expenditure for the green houses built on her land appears to have been made in 1873; and the payments of interest upon the mortgage were made half yearly from November 25, 1872, down to April 10, 1876.

The money drawn for those purposes was drawn by Hibbins upon his own account from the firm's bank account. It is true they were not charged to him, but the reason was that neither the complainant nor Hibbins kept any account of the moneys drawn by them for their own account, except the checks themselves by which they were drawn. There is neither charge nor evidence of fraud in these matters.

The complainant is entitled to no lien upon Mrs. Hibbins' property. As to her the bill should be dismissed, with costs.

Samuel LIPPINCOTT, Exr., of Ann H. Pancoast,
v.
Samuel BARTON et al., Executors of David C. Pancoast.

1. This court has jurisdiction to compel an account for waste done only as incidental to relief by injunction to stay the commission of further waste, and that only to prevent a multiplicity of suits.
2. A suit in equity can not be maintained by an executor to recover the value of trees cut from the realty belonging to the estate of his testatrix; if he is entitled to recover, he can do so by an action at law for the proceeds, as for money had and received, or for the trespass in cutting or trover in converting.

(Filed ——— — 1886.)

BILL to recover value of trees cut by tenant by the curtesy. Dismissed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. T. Hilliard, for complainant.

Mr. E. S. Fogg, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

This bill is filed by the executor of Ann H. Pancoast, deceased, to recover the value of trees cut by her husband David C. Pancoast, who continued in possession as tenant by the curtesy of her lands after her death. The defendants, against whom the suit is instituted, are the executors of the tenant for life.

It is claimed that this suit may be maintained in this court, for the waste committed, on the ground of equitable conversion, and upon the ground of injustice to Clement G. Lippincott, one of the grandsons of David C. Pancoast, by whose will he has but $100 bequeathed him, while by the will of Ann H. Pancoast he has an equal interest with the other legatees.

Neither of these alleged grounds brings the case within the jurisdiction of this court. I have examined a number of authorities, and none of them goes so far as to sustain the complainant's insistment.

In Ware v. Ware, 2 Halst. Ch. 117, the doctrine, which is expressed in all the other authorities, is that an account for waste done is only incidental to relief by injunction against further waste. 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. part 2, p. 1024; Jesus College v. Bloom, 3 Atk. 262; Winship v. Pitts, 3 Paige, 259; Story, Eq. §§ 515, 518.

From these and other cases it appears that this court only has jurisdiction to compel an account as incidental to the right of an injunction to stay the commission of further waste, and that only in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Grierson v. Eyre, 9 Ves. 341, 346; Watson v. Hunter, 5 Johns. Ch. 169; 1 Add. Torts, 319.

Nor can I conceive of any principle upon which this complainant can stand in this court for the recovery of these moneys. If he is entitled to them, he can recover them by an action at law for money had and received, or for the trespass in cutting, or trover in converting. Rev. p. 396, § 5.

UNITED NEW JERSEY R. R. & CANAL CO.,
v.
LONG DOCK CO. *et al.

1. A mortgage upon after acquired property attaches to such property, subject to existing equitable liens thereon, although it is prior to them in point of time.
2. (Decided April 30, 1887.)

BILL for relief. On exceptions to Master's report. Overruled.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cortlandt & Wayne Parker, for the exceptions.

Messrs. J. R. Vredenburgh, and J. D. Bedle, contra.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

By the decree in this cause it was decreed (11 Stew. Eq. 142) that the Long Dock Company should bear its proportion (with interest) of a certain payment of $500,000 made by the complainants to extinguish the outstanding title of the State in certain lands assigned and conveyed to the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company, under a certain agreement made between the last named Company and the Long Dock Company, in a partition of lands by and between them; that the sum so to be paid was to be in proportion to the interest of the Long Dock Company in the whole property and was, therefore, $\frac{188}{800}$ thereof; that the Long Dock Company should, under the before mentioned agreement, pay to the complainants the like proportion of the costs of the defense of the latter in a suit brought in the Circuit Court of the United States by Garret E. Winants against them, with interest from the time of the payment of those costs; that the Long Dock Company should also pay the costs of this suit; and that the complainants were entitled, under that agreement, to a lien for those moneys upon the lands conveyed under the agreement to the Long Dock Company.

---

*See United New Jersey R. R. & Canal Co. v. Long Dock Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 56.

It was referred to a master to ascertain and report the amount of those moneys, and also what equities, if any, the other defendants in this suit have in the last mentioned property, or any part thereof, superior to those of the complainants as adjudged by that decree; and if any such equities exist, to ascertain and report the owner, amount and order thereof. The master reported that the proportion of the money expended to extinguish the State's title, to be paid to the complainants by the Long Dock Company, was, with the interest thereon, $286,037.71, and that the amount due the complainants for the Long Dock Company's proportion of the costs of the defense of the Winants' suit, was $131.66, and that the complainants are entitled to interest thereon from November 1, 1870, and that none of the other defendants have any lien superior to that of the complainants under the agreement.

Exceptions were filed by Fisher Ames Baker and William D. Shipman, trustees for the holders of mortgage bonds of the Long Dock Company under a mortgage given by that Company in 1865, and exceptions were filed by other defendants also. The questions discussed and submitted upon the hearing of the exceptions were as to whether the complainants' lien under the agreement is superior to the lien of the mortgage held by Baker and Shipman, trustees, and whether the complainants are entitled to interest upon the money reported to be due to them in respect of the costs of defense of the Winants suit, from the time of payment of such costs by the complainants or only from the time of demand by them upon the Long Dock Company of payment of that Company's proportion thereof; which demand, it is alleged, was not made earlier than one year before the commencement of this suit.

The above mentioned mortgage of 1863 (it is dated May 25, 1863) was given by the Long Dock Company, pending proceedings in this court for partition of the property known as Harsimus Cove. Those proceedings were begun August 15, 1857, and the Long Dock Company was a party thereto. There was a decree for sale of the property made September 21, 1862, under which it was sold, and it was purchased by Peter Bentley and Moses Taylor, as trustees in trust for the beneficial owners of the property; and the premises were conveyed to them, accordingly, by deed dated August 24, 1863.

The trustees conveyed away part of the property before the 10th of September, 1867, the date of the before mentioned agreement; and at that date, by that agreement, which was made by and between the trustees, the parties who were beneficially interested as owners in the property at the time of the partition sale and the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company, which company appears to have acquired all the interests of those owners except the Long Dock Company, it was agreed that the remaining property should be divided in a specified way between the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company and the Long Dock Company, and should be conveyed to them accordingly. Conveyances were made in pursuance of the agreement, by deeds dated October 1, 1867.

By the agreement it was declared that the title of the whole tract divided between the two companies should, for the sake of convenience of division, be deemed equally good and valid, and that if at any time afterwards either of the companies should be dispossessed of any portion of the tract conveyed to it or its assigns by virtue of the agreement, or should be put to any cost or expense in defending its title thereto, or in extinguishing any outstanding title or claim against such portion, the other company should bear its proportion of such loss and expense, according to its proportion of interest in the entire property; which proportion of loss and expense should be a lien upon the part set off and conveyed to it. As already stated, the money which has been declared to be a lien upon the property set off and conveyed to the Long Dock Company was paid to extinguish the outstanding title of the State to land set off and conveyed under the agreement to the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company, and to defend its title to part of that property against the claim of Garret E. Winants.

The lien of the complainants is superior to the mortgage of 1863. That mortgage, as already appears, was taken pending the proceedings in partition. When the property was sold under the decree in that suit and bought in by the trustees, the legal title of the mortgagor was extinguished and the mortgage attached (but in equity only) to the interest of the mortgagor in the property, which interest was then merely equitable.

In the division under the agreement all the land allotted and conveyed was, for convenience of partition, regarded as being held by good title; and an equitable provision was made by mutual arrangement to secure the parties against loss by reason of such assumption. Without such arrangement, of course, the partition which was made would not have been made. In that partition the Long Dock Company obtained its share in property of good title; while on the other hand the other party received its share in land with a title so defective that it required a large expenditure of money to perfect it. The Long Dock Company, therefore, but for the provisions of the agreement, would have had so much the advantage of the Railroad Company in the partition. In order to prevent such injustice on either side, and to protect each party in the premises, it was necessary in such a partition to make the arrangement which was made in the agreement in that behalf or some such provision. The proceedings in partition were conducted in good faith, and the agreement also was made and carried out in good faith. Under the circumstances the interest of the Long Dock Company to which, in equity, the lien of the mortgage of 1863 attached itself was the land obtained in the partition under the agreement, subject to the lien for the payment to perfect the title of the land assigned and conveyed to the Railroad Company.

In Westervelt v. Haff, 2 Sandf. Ch. 98, where a mortgage was executed by a tenant in common, upon his interest in land pending suit for partition of the premises, and he became the purchaser of part of the property at the sale, and the amount of his share of the proceeds was allowed to him upon his bid, it held that although if a stranger had bought the property, the lien of the mortgage would have been cut off, yet since the mortgagor had bought it the lien still subsisted in equity upon the land so purchased, but only to the extent of the mortgagor's interest in the proceeds of the sale of the whole of the lands held in common and sold under the decree. The liens of mortgages given upon the property by the purchaser to other tenants in common, for their shares of the proceeds of the sale, were held to be of course prior to the lien of that mortgage. A voluntary partition of land between the owners thereof is not binding upon the holders of the existing liens upon the property, unless they consent thereto. Emson v. Polhemus, 1 Stew. Eq. 439.

But in the case under consideration, the lien of the mortgage of 1863 was extinguished (except in equity) by the sale under the decree in partition. The lien being a creature of equity it will not be so maintained as to effect any injustice. It should not be maintained beyond the extent of the mortgagor's interest in the property; that is, it should be held to be subject to the lien in favor of the complainants. The mortgagor acquired the property under the agreement and it took it subject to that lien. The lien is, in effect, a lien for purchase money and is paramount to the mortgage. The obvious principle upon which in U. S. v. New Orleans Railroad, 12 Wall. 362 [79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 434]; Williamson v. N. J. etc. R. R. Co. 1 Stew. Eq. 277, and Coe v. N. J. Midland R. Co. 4 Stew. Eq. 105, and other like cases it has been held that a mortgage upon after acquired property attaches to such property, subject to existing equitable liens thereon, although it is prior in point of time to them, is applicable here. To give to the mortgage of 1863 the benefit of the allotment and conveyance to the Long Dock Company, free from the lien under the agreement, would give to the mortgagees an advantage by increasing their security at the expense of the complainants. The principle of the maxim Nemo debet locupletari ex alterius incommodo is evidently applicable.

There is another consideration not without weight in this matter, viz.: the fact that the agreement was made and acted upon twenty years ago, and that, upon the faith of it, the complainants expended the large sum of money, to secure the payment of which (to them) this suit was brought. In all the twenty years the mortgagees have accepted and have had the benefit of the arrangement. Had the claim for compensation been upon the side of the Long Dock Company, those mortgagees would have been entitled to and could have claimed the benefit of it and of the lien given by the agreement.

In order to dispose of the exception based upon the allowance of interest upon the proportion of the costs of the defense in the Winants suit, which, under the agreement, the Long Dock Company was bound to pay—the exceptants insisting that it should not have been allowed from any period earlier than the time of demanding payment of such proportion from the Long Dock Company—it is enough to say that the master followed the plain and explicit direction of the decree.

The exceptions will be overruled, with costs.

NEW YORK.

COURT OF APPEALS.

Re Petition of Lewis H. CLARK, a Taxpayer, etc., Appt.,
v.
Andrew F. SHELDON, as County Treasurer, etc., Respt.

1. Section 4 of chapter 907 of Laws of 1869, as amended by chapter 288 of Laws of 1871, providing for the appropriation of all taxes, except school and road taxes, collected from railroads, to the payment of municipal bonds issued to aid in the construction of such railroads, is applicable to any municipality which has bonds outstanding issued under any Act in aid of the construction of any railroad within its borders.
2. It makes no difference as to the duty of the county treasurer under said section 4, that the taxes to constitute the sinking fund for the payment of such municipal bonds were not expressly collected or paid over to him for that purpose.
3. The provisions of said section 4 are not in conflict with the Constitution; their meaning is reasonably plain, and it is practicable to execute them.
4. It is no defense to a proceeding under said section 4 by a taxpayer to compel the county treasurer to apply taxes towards the payment of municipal bonds as provided by said section, that the petition does not put the amount of taxes claimed to be applicable to that purpose high enough; notwithstanding this, the county treasurer may, upon a hearing by the county judge, be compelled to set aside for a sinking fund all the taxes which may appear to have been paid to him and devoted by the statute to that purpose.
5. Nor is it an answer to such proceeding that if the county treasurer should set aside the taxes for a sinking fund to pay such municipal bonds, there would be a deficiency in other funds.

(Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming an order of the County Court of Wayne County dismissing a petition under the Laws of 1871, chapter 288. Reversed.

The facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Mr. J. Welling, for appellant:

The county treasurer has the duty put on him by the act of ascertaining the amount of taxes received by him from the railroad companies, and can do so by the statement received by him from the board of supervisors and by the examination and return of the town collector.

Section 4, of chapter 907, Laws 1869, as amended by chapters 283 and 925 of Laws of 1871, says: "It shall be the duty of said treasurer with the money arising from taxes, levied and collected as aforesaid, to purchase bonds," etc.; and the same section authorizes any taxpayer of a town bonded in aid of a railroad "to apply to the county judge, on petition, for an order directing said county treasurer to execute the provisions of this Act."

And it is the duty of the county judge, upon a proper case being made, to issue an order directing said county treasurer to execute the provisions of the Act.

This sum of $427.69, admitted by defendant's answer, belonged to the Town of Sodus. As soon as received by the collector or treasurer, it was to be applied by the defendant, as Treasurer, in purchasing its bonds, or by him set apart as a sinking fund for the redemption and payment of them.

Bridges v. Supervisors, 92 N. Y. 577–8; People, Martin, v. Brown, 55 N. Y. 186 and cases cited; Ross v. Curtiss, 31 N. Y. 606.

The defendant, having received the money, $427.69, applicable to the redemption and payment of the bonds and interest thereon, cannot justify his refusal to invest it as required by this Act, upon the ground that the law devoting it to that purpose is unconstitutional.

People, Martin, v. Brown, 55 N. Y. 180–196.

The onus of pointing out the precise amount the treasurer should invest or set apart should not be thrown upon a taxpayer, especially in a case when the officer "has made no attempt" to comply with the requirements of the statute. Neither has the taxpayer the means of accurately ascertaining the amount, while the treasurer has.

Phelps v. Williams, 5 Alb. L. J. 204.

The Act of 1869, § 4, applies to "any town, village or city * * * which has issued, or shall issue bonds to aid in the construction of" a railroad assessed in said town, city or village. "Every town" here means "all towns."

Heaton v. Wright, 10 How. Pr. 79–83; Crabbe's Synonyms, ed. 1879, pp. 761–2, title, "Some-Any."

The devotion of these taxes to the redemption of the bonds, is a benefit to the towns which have aided in creating the property from which the taxes are received, and which is a public use for and benefit to the whole people of the State.

Duanesburgh v. Jenkins, 57 N. Y. 188–9; Bank of Rome v. Rome, 18 N. Y. 38; People v. Mitchell, 35 N. Y. 551; Starin v. Genoa, 23 N. Y. 439; Clarke v. Rochester, 28 N. Y. 605; Bridges v. Supervisors of Sullivan Co. 92 N. Y. 579.

The Legislature could properly and did, by section 4, donate these taxes in aid of towns which had bonded to aid railroads, to lighten, the burden of taxation necessary to pay their obligations entered into in aid of a public benefit.

People, Williams, v. Dayton, 55 N.Y. 380,381; Town of Guilford v. Supervisors, 13 N. Y. 149; People, Griffin, v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 N. Y 419; Brewster v. Syracuse, 19 N. Y. 116–118.

That these taxes were ostensibly raised for specific purposes, to which they were appropriated by other statutes than that invoked by the petitioner, afforded no excuse or defense to the Treasurer for not investing or holding them, as required by the Act of 1869.

People, McConnell, v. Baker, 29 Barb. 81, 84, 87; Bridges v. Supervisors of Sullivan Co. and People, Griffin, v. Mayor of Brooklyn, supra; Gordon v. Cornes, 47 N. Y. 608; Monroe Co. Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 365; Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y. 124; People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328, 340.

The Legislature, in respect to taxation, being the representative of the people or in effect the people themselves (and having uncontrollable power over the whole subject of taxation, its object and purposes, exemption therefrom and details) must necessarily have absolute control over the product of taxation or taxes.

The Legislature possesses almost unlimited power of taxation, and it may appropriate public money for improper purposes, or give it away, by the requisite vote; yet we cannot deny the power, however unwisely used. The duty of courts ends with determining the question of power. The Legislature possesses the power to donate public funds to private use.

People, Williams, v. Dayton, 55 N. Y. 380, 381.

Independently of express constitutional restrictions it, the Legislature, can make appropriations of money whenever the public well being requires or will be promoted by it; and it is the judge of what is for the public good.

Town of Guilford v. Supervisors; People, Griffin, v. Mayor of Brooklyn, and Brewster v. Syracuse, supra.

The further ground upon which these Acts were held unconstitutional in Phelps v. Williams, 4 Alb. L. J. 204, viz.: that the Acts did not distinctly state the tax and the object to which it is to be applied, and the sum appropriated, is untenable, as shown by the case of Bridges v. Supervisors of Sullivan Co. 27 Hun, 175, 177; 92 N. Y. 570.

Mr. C. H. Roys, for respondent:

The respondent, the County Treasurer, owed no duty to the petitioner or to his town, because the taxes, less the school and road taxes, or so much thereof as was necessary, had not been collected from the two railroads mentioned in the petition, and paid over to him, to be invested as a sinking fund.

The excepted school and road taxes must first be ascertained and separated from the total tax.

It is not the duty of the county treasurer to ascertain the precise amount of the school and road taxes collected from the railroads, which is a part of and is mingled with the total.

Presumptively the town officers or board of supervisors should ascertain the amount of the school and road taxes, because they assess the valuations of the railroads and levy and apportion the various taxes, and have the information that will enable them to determine such amount. But they have not done it. The petition does not state, nor do the proofs or appeal book show, how much of the total taxes of $2,602.09 paid by said railroads is made up of the school and road taxes, nor what amount would remain after excepting and deducting therefrom the school and road taxes.

But the separation of these school and road taxes from the total taxes collected from the railroads is a fact antecedent to any duty by the treasurer; and as it must be conceded that such separation had not been made or attempted, the proceedings and petitions were properly dismissed.

After the school and road taxes are ascertained and separated from the total $2,602.09 and the balance struck, another fact must then be found before the treasurer is set in motion by the statute, viz.: How much out of this balance is it necessary, according to the statute, to set aside as a sinking fund? Who shall determine how much is necessary? The statute does not require the treasurer to make this determination, and he could not make it if it did require him to. The sources of information are elsewhere, and not under his control.

Laws, 1869, § 6, chap. 907.

The Sinking Fund Act further provides that after the school and road taxes are excluded, and after it is ascertained by somebody how much of the balance is necessary for sinking fund purposes, then, and not until then, shall this last determined amount be paid over to the county treasurer, to be by him invested.

The petition and proceedings were properly dismissed by the county judge, because they are not authorized by the Act under which they are presented and prosecuted.

The prayer of the petitioner is for an order directing and compelling the Treasurer to take and set apart as a sinking fund the sum of $427.69 for payment of the bonds of the Town of Sodus.

The petition does not inform us what this sum of $427.69 represents, or what taxes make it up. The petition tells what it is not, by describing it as "other than school and road taxes."

The sum of $427.69 is made up of two sums: $149.97, representing the state tax, and $277.72, representing the county tax.

This state tax of $149.97 was imposed by chapter 453 of the Laws of 1881 (and by other appropriation and supply bills of the Legislature for that year) for specified purposes other than a town bond sinking fund. As this appropriation Act is contradictory to and irreconcilable with the Acts of 1869 and 1871, under which the petitioner would seize the state tax, these last mentioned Acts must be held to be repealed as to such part.

Excelsior Petroleum Co. v. Embury, 67 Barb. 261; People, Navano, v. Van Nort, 64 Barb. 205; Hartman v. Mayor of N. Y. 51 How. Pr. 351.

This state and county tax of $427.69 cannot be taken and used as a sinking fund as required by the petitioner, under the Acts of 1869 and 1871, because that money has been imposed and collected as taxes and paid over to the County Treasurer by and in pursuance of other statutes and for other and entirely different purposes.

People, Fiedler, v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 114; People, Martin, v. Brown, 55 N. Y. 180.

The prayer of the petition was properly denied, because to grant it would be taking so much money out of the County Treasurer's hands that is there for other persons and objects, and would create a deficiency; and those creditors and objects not yet paid would be short of what belongs to them; and because the law itself is impracticable and impossible of execution.

The order of the county judge and of the general term will be affirmed, because the provisions of the Acts of 1869 and 1871, relating to the sinking fund in question, are unconstitutional and void, depriving persons of property without due process of law.

Every taxpayer in Wayne County will, if the petitioner is right and the county judge wrong, be obliged to pay and contribute something toward the satisfaction and payment of the town bonds of Sodus.

No taxpayer outside of the Town of Sodus is benefited by either railroad in the Town of Sodus, for which the town is bonded: therefore the law, and this proceeding, that seeks to impose taxes upon taxpayers in Wayne County outside of the Town of Sodus, deprives persons of property without due process of law, violates both State and Federal Constitutions, and falls under the condemnation of our highest court, as expressed in the case of Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183.

It is not competent for the Legislature, by any law, to compel taxpayers outside of the Town of Sodus to pay any part of the bonded private indebtedness of that town.

Weismer v. Village of Douglas, 64 N.Y. 91.

Said sinking fund provisions violate section 8, article 7 of our State Constitution, in omitting to distinctly specify the sum appropriated for such fund.

These Sinking Fund Acts, so far as they affect taxes not imposed by law for a sinking fund purpose, violate section 20 of article 3 of the Constitution, which provides that "Every law which imposes, continues or revives a tax shall distinctly state the tax and the object to which it is to be applied; and it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix such tax or object."

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a special proceeding instituted by a taxpayer of the Town of Sodus, Wayne County, in this State, to compel the County Treasurer of that county to execute the provisions of section 4 of chapter 907 of the Laws of 1869, as amended by chapter 283 of the Laws of 1871. The material portions of that section are as follows:

"All taxes, except school and road taxes, collected for the next thirty years, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in any town, village or city, on the assessed valuation of any railroad in said town, village or city, for which said town, village or city has issued or shall issue bonds to aid in the construction of said railroad, shall be paid over to the treasurer of the county in which said town, city or village lies. It shall be the duty of said treasurer, with the money arising from taxes levied and collected as aforesaid, which has heretofore been or shall hereafter be paid to him (including the interest thereon) to purchase" bonds mentioned, to "be held by said county treasurer as a sinking fund, for the redemption and payment of the bonds issued or to be issued by said town, village or city to aid in the construction of said railroad or railroads. In case any county treasurer shall unreasonably refuse or neglect to comply with the provisions of this Act, any taxpayer in any town, village or city theretofore having issued bonds in aid of the construction of any railroad or railroads, is hereby authorized to apply to the county judge, on petition, for an order compelling said treasurer to execute the provisions of this Act. And it shall be the duty of said county judge, upon a proper case being made, to issue an order directing said county treasurer to execute the provisions of this Act."

Our main duty upon this appeal is to construe this section. It has several times been under consideration in the courts, and the views of judges in reference to it have not been in entire harmony.

All taxes except school and road taxes imposed upon the railroads mentioned are required to be paid over to the county treasurer; and this obviously means all the taxes of every description, including town, village, city, county and state taxes, except school and road taxes. The sums thus paid to the county treasurer are to constitute a sinking fund for the payment and redemption of the municipal bonds. There is nothing impracticable in the scheme of this section. It is easy for the officers imposing the taxes to ascertain their amount after deducting school and road taxes; and the amount to be paid to the county treasurer and held by him for a sinking fund can be specified in the warrant issued to the collector. People, Martin, v. Brown, 55 N. Y. 180.

But if not so specified, it must always be easy for the collector to make the proper deduction of school and road taxes and then, in obedience to the command of the statute, to pay the balance to the county treasurer. If the duty of making the separation of the school and road taxes from the other taxes has not been discharged before payment of the taxes to the county treasurer, it will rarely, if ever, be difficult for him to make such separation; and it will be his duty to make it and invest the proper amount as directed by the statute.

The authorities of towns, villages, cities and counties have no right to divert or appropriate these taxes for other purposes. Bridges v. Supervisors of Sullivan Co. 92 N. Y. 570. They never came into the hands of the county treasurer for any other purpose than that mentioned in the section, and they are devoted by law to the benefit of the municipality in which they are collected, and must be held and invested in the mode directed for its benefit. The taxes which are to be paid into and constitute the sinking fund need not be specially levied, but they are to be levied in the same way as other taxes, and all the taxes thus levied are to be devoted to the purposes mentioned. It is quite true that a deficiency may thus be caused in funds required for town, village, city, county and state purposes; but the local authorities must in some way make provision for such deficiency, and there is ample power in the statutes to do so.

The provisions of this section are applicable to any municipality which has bonds outstanding issued under any Act in aid of the construction of any railroad within its borders. The statute speaks of taxes upon the assessed valuation of any railroad for which the municipality has issued or shall issue bonds to aid in the construction of such road. And it authorizes any taxpayer in any town, village or city which has issued bonds in aid of the construction of any railroad or railroads to petition to the county judge for an order compelling the county treasurer to execute the provisions of the Act. It is not correct, therefore, to say that these provisions are to be executed only in the case of railroads constructed under the Act of 1869, and the amendments thereto. The provisions are broad, comprehensive and general, and were intended for the benefit of all municipalities bonded in aid of railroads constructed in or through them.

It makes no difference as to the duty of the County Treasurer that the taxes thus to constitute the sinking fund were not expressly collected or paid over to him for that purpose. The statute appropriates the taxes and makes it his duty to separate and set them apart for the sinking fund.

We do not perceive that these provisions of section 4 are in conflict with any constitutional provision. They do not impose a tax on property in other towns of the County of Wayne, as claimed by the respondent, for the benefit of the Town of Sodus. They simply deprive other portions of the county of the benefit to be derived from the taxation of the railroad property within the Town of Sodus. As to other portions of the county it is practically the same as if the railroad property was exempt from taxation. It would be perfectly competent for the Legislature to exempt all the railroads from taxation in the towns bonded to aid in their construction; and in making such exemption no constitutional provision would be violated. So, too, the Legislature could devote all the taxes imposed upon such railroads to town, village or city purposes; and this is what it has done. These provisions cannot even be charged with any great injustice. The railroad property thus to be taxed was in the main created by the municipalities bonded for their construction; and until they have either been reimbursed for their expenses which they have thus incurred, or have been able otherwise to pay their bonds, it is certainly not very unjust that they should have the benefit of the taxes imposed upon the property which they have thus created.

These provisions are not in conflict with section 8 of article 7 of the Constitution, which provides that "No moneys shall ever be paid out of the treasury of this State, or any of the funds under its management, except in pursuance of an appropriation by law; nor unless such payment be made within two years next after the passage of such appropriation Act; and every such law making a new appropriation, or continuing or reviving an appropriation, shall distinctly specify the sum appropriated, and the object to which it is to be applied; and it shall not be sufficient for such law to refer to any other law to fix such sum." This fund was not in the treasury of the State and never belonged to the State or to any fund under its management; hence, that section of the Constitution has no application to this case.

It is also clear that these provisions do not violate section 20 of article 3 of the Constitution, which provides that "Every law which imposes, continues or revives a tax, shall distinctly state the tax and the object to which it is to be applied; and it shall not be sufficient to refer to any other law to fix such tax or object." The law we are considering simply specifies what may be done with a tax which has been legally imposed. The constitutional provision referred to can have no application to such a case as this. Succession Tax Case, 6 Cent. Rep. 781, 104 N. Y. 306.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the provisions of section 4 are not in conflict with the Constitution, that their meaning is reasonably plain, and that it is practicable to execute them. It, therefore, only remains for us to inquire whether there is anything peculiar to this case which justifies the County Treasurer in his refusal to execute these provisions.

What we have already said is a sufficient answer to most of the other objections made. It appears quite clearly from the petition and answer and the evidence upon the hearing before the county judge that the taxes imposed upon these two roads for the year 1881, after making deductions for school and road taxes, were much more than $427.69. But the petition alleges that that was the sum over and above school and road taxes, which was paid to the County Treasurer as the railroad taxes of that year; and upon the hearing before the county judge the County Treasurer admitted that the amount of all taxes collected upon the assessed valuation of the railroads in the Town of Sodus for the year 1881, and paid to him, was the sum of $2,602.09, of which sum $427.69 was the portion of the railroad taxes other than school and road taxes. And it was that sum which the petitioner prayed that the County Treasurer be compelled to pay, invest or set apart as a sinking fund under the fourth section.

It is probably true, upon all the facts appearing in the case, that the County Treasurer ought to have set aside a larger sum in the execution of his duties under the Act. But it is no defense that the petitioner has not prayed for a sufficient amount, and that possibly the County Treasurer could be vexed with further proceedings requiring him to set aside a further amount. It is his duty to set aside and invest as a sinking fund all the taxes paid to him and appropriated by section 4 for that purpose. But if the county judge should make an order requiring him to set aside a less sum than he ought to, certainly he cannot complain of such an order. Upon a hearing of this case before the county judge, notwithstanding the prayer of the petition, the County Treasurer could be compelled to set aside for a sinking fund all the taxes which may appear to have been paid to him and were devoted by the statute to that purpose; and there is ample power conferred upon the county judge to ascertain the amount and make an order accordingly.

It is no answer for the Treasurer to say that if he should set aside these taxes for a sinking fund there would be a deficiency in other funds, and that he may not have money enough to pay the obligations of the county to the State and to the county officials and county creditors. He has no right to use the money produced by these taxes to discharge any of these obligations. The law has appropriated it for a specific purpose, and it is his duty to apply it to that purpose.

There are no subsequent statutes which in any way interfere with these provisions of section 4. The general laws of the State for the imposition and collection of taxes do not interfere, and were not intended to interfere with this section. These taxes were devoted to a special purpose by section 4, and all prior laws in conflict with that section, or requiring a different disposition of taxes thus collected, are so far modified or repealed; and our attention has been called to no subsequent statute which has any bearing whatever upon the questions here involved.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the orders of the General Term and of the county judge should be reversed, and the proceedings remitted to the county judge for a further hearing upon the petition, and that the appellant recover costs against the respondent in this court and in the Supreme Court.

All concur.

v.
COMMISSIONERS OF Department of Fire & Buildings of BROOKLYN.

The court of appeals has power to substitute the administratrix of a deceased relator, in a proceeding by certiorari to reviw the action of municipal authorities in removing the relator from office, where, in the relator's lifetime, the proceeding sought to be reiewed was affirmed and the writ of certiorari quashed at special term, with costs, and the order of special term was affirmed at general term, with costs, and the relator's estate is liable for such costs.

(Decided May 10, 1887.)

MOTION on behalf of the administratrix of deceased relator to be substituted in his place and stead as appellant from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of Special Term, affirming proceedings sought to be reviewed by certiorari and quashing the writ. Granted.

The facts in relation to the motion are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward F. O'Dwyer, for the motion.

Mr Almet F. Jenks, contra.

Per Curiam:

At the special term the proceedings of the Commissioners in removing the relator from his office were affirmed and the writ of certiorari was quashed, with $10 costs. At the general term the order of the special term was affirmed, w ith $10 costs and disbursements. By virtue of these two orders the relator became liable to pay upwards of $20. and payment of that sum can now be enforced against his estate.

If the decisions below were wrong, and the relator was improperly removed from office, and the orders below should be reversed, then upon their reversal the administratrix of the relator would be entitled to recover his salary during the time he was excluded from his office, or damages for such exclusion; hence, both on account of such costs and the salary, she is interested in the appeal pending in this court. Until the decisions below have been reversed, she cannot enforce payment of any salary, or resist the payment of the costs which have been adjudged against her husband. People, Hatzel, v. Hall, 80 N. Y. 117, 127; Nichols v. MacLean, 2 Cent. Rep. 500, 101 N. Y. 526.

In such a case we have no doubt of the power of the court to substitute the administratrix of the deceased relator. People, Keenholts, v. Robinson, 29 Barb. 77; Hastings v. McKinley, 8 How. Pr. 175.

The motion should be granted.

1. It is always competent to inquire what relations exist between a party and his witness, for the purpose of showing the motive and influence under which the evidence is given and the existence of any bias or prejudice on the part of the witness.
2. (Decided June 7, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Orange Circuit on a verdict for plaintiff for $3,000 damages in an action to recover for personal injuries. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, while riding in the streets of Middletown, on the evening of June 30, 1883, was suddenly thrown from the carriage and severely injured. The defendant's employees and servants had placed a heap of gravel and bricks in the street. It was dark and the street was very much shaded by trees. The horse was thrown down by contact with the obstruction; and the sudden stoppage of the wagon thereby threw the plaintiff out. One Dusenberry was the driver of the plaintiff's vehicle.

At the trial plaintiff was called as a witness, and testified to the circumstances of the accident, which were not denied by defendant. Said Dusenberry was also called by plaintiff as a witness, and also testified to the same effect.

On cross examination defendant's counsel asked him whether he was engaged to the plaintiff or not. This was objected to by plaintiff, and the objection was sustained and an exception noted.

As to plaintiff's injuries, one of her witnesses testified "That there seemed to have been an injury to the spine and an inflamed and shattered condition of the nervous system as a whole; that there was an uneasy, writhing, worm-like motion of muscular tissue;" and that in his opinion "The plaintiff was rather unlikely ever entirely to recover."

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff. On appeal to the general term and judgment thereon the same was affirmed and defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. Wm. F. O'Neil, for appellant.

Mr. Wm. Vanamee, for respondent.

Per Curiam:

The exception taken by the defendant's counsel to the ruling of the trial court excluding an answer to his question, on cross examination, to the plaintiff's witness as to whether he was engaged to the plaintiff or not, was undoubtedly well taken. It is always competent to inquire what relations exist between a party and his witness, for the purpose of showing the motive and influence under which the evidence is given and the existence of any bias or prejudice on the part of the witness. Such evidence, however, affects the credibility of the witness only; and if his evidence is wholly immaterial upon all the material issues of the case, an erroneous ruling upon such question furnished no valid reason for reversing the judgment.

That was the case here. No material question of fact was controverted on the trial, and the evidence of the witness could have been wholly stricken from the minutes without affecting the result in the least degree.

The defendant was not prejudiced by the ruling, and the judgment should, therefore, be affirmed.

All concur.

III. BY PARTNERSHIP.
BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See BANKRUPTCY; INSOLVENCY.

I. FORM; VALIDITY; CONSTRUCTION.

1. Under Act 1877, chap. 466, a general assignment for the benefit of creditors takes effect from the time of its acknowledgment and delivery, and not from the time of its record in the proper county.
Nicoll v. Spowers (N. Y.) 95

2. A general assignment by a person living in one county and having his place of business in another was acknowledged and delivered, and recorded only in the county in which assignor resided; subsequently a receiver was appointed in supplementary proceedings against the assignor, in the county wherein was his place of business, and thereafter the assignment was recorded in that county also; and not until after such recording was a copy of the order appointing the receiver filed in the county where the assignor resided. Held, that assignee's title related back to the delivery of the assignment, and gave the assignee priority over the receiver,—no rights of bona fide purchasers being affected. Id.

3. A general assignment for the benefit of creditors is not void because it confers power upon the assignee to compound, compromise, and release debts, nor because it confers power upon him to execute (in assignor's name, for such consideration in money or other thing, as he may deem sufficient) all such conveyances in writing and all such other instruments as, in his discretion, may from time to time be necessary to carry into effect the intent of the instrument.
Bagley v. Bowe (N. Y.) 253

4. Such latter power, construed with the whole context, does not confer authority to sell the assigned property on credit or to exchange it for other property. Id.

5. Although an assignment transferred all the property of the assignor, it may have been a fraudulent contrivance to embarrass or delay creditors; but this was a question for the jury. Id.

6. An authority to sell assigned property on "credit," or "for cash or upon credit," as in assignee's judgment may appear best, or to convert the property into "money or available means," renders the assignment void. Authorities cited. Id.

7. A trust creditor is not entitled to a preference over general creditors of the insolvent.
Cavin v. Gleason (N. Y.) 285

8. The equitable doctrine that, as between creditors, equality is equity, admits of no exception founded on the greater supposed sacredness of one debt, unless it appears there is some specific recognized equity which entitles claimant to preferential payment.

Cavin v. Gleason (N. Y.) 285

9. The court may order trust property to be restored to the trust. But to follow trust funds they must be identified. Id.

10. Where a trust fund was misappropriated by a trustee before his assignment as an insolvent debtor, it is not entitled to preference in payment from funds in assignee's hands. Id.

11. The burden is upon a judgment creditor to set aside an assignment made by his debtor for fraud.
Crook v. Rindskopf (N. Y.) 727

12. Doubtful and ambiguous phrases are to be construed so as to authorize a lawful disposition of the property only. Id.

13. Such construction should be given as is consistent with innocence. Authorities cited. Id. 731

14. Assignors are estopped from controverting the existence of the conditions which they have provided for. Authorities cited. Id. 729

II. ASSIGNEE.

15. It is not necessary, in order to enable the assignee to sue, that he should aver in his bill that he has given bond and filed an inventory as required by the Assignment Act.
Grant v. Crowell (N. J.) 122

16. The assignee may bring suit to recover property fraudulently conveyed by assignor, if such property is required to satisfy the debts of the creditors. Id.

17. The assignee cannot recover money lawfully paid by the assignor to the defendant, and which the latter lawfully received. Id.

18. If the creditors have an equity against the defendant, in respect to the matters set up in the bill, they are the proper ones to enforce it. Id.

III. BY PARTNERSHIP.

19. An insolvent partner may devote his individual property to firm debts.
Crook v. Rindskopf (N. Y.) 727

20. In an assignment by a firm of two persons, after the payment of the firm debts, the residue shall be divided into two funds for the payment of individual creditors. Id.

21. Upon satisfaction of firm debts it is the legal duty of the assignee to determine the interest of the individual partners in the surplus. Id.

22. Until creditors of the firm are aggrieved they have no cause of action. Id.

23. It may be shown in rebuttal of an inference of fraudulent intent, arising from provisions for individual debts, that there were in fact no such debts to be affected by such provisions. Authorities cited. Id. 729

ASSUMPSIT. See CORPORATIONS, 13.

1. Assumpsit lies, where the contract is not under seal, against an assessment life insurance corporation for assessments upon members of the corporation, due to a deceased member's widow.
Passenger Conductors L. Ins. Co. v. Birnbaum (Pa.) 635

2. In assumpsit on a book account, an affidavit of defense alleging that plaintiff had, by agreement under seal, accepted the promise of a third person in payment of the debt, must set forth the contract in full.
Lucas Coal Co. v. Hunt (Pa.) 147

3. The purchaser of iron ore, under a contract by which he retains part of the price and promises vendor to pay it to a third person, not a party to the contract, if such third person owned the land from which the ore was taken, but if not then to have nothing to pay, is not estopped from setting up his own title to the land as a defense to assumpsit by the third person for the sum so retained.
Grim v. Thomas Iron Co. (Pa.) 506

4. If one delivers money to another under promise of latter to deliver it to a third person, who has a beneficial interest therein, the latter may maintain an action therefor against promisor. Authorities cited. Id. 508

5. In assumpsit by an executor for purchase money of land conveyed by testator to his son, the question whether the son was to have the land partly as a gift is for the jury.
Horn v. Buck (Pa.) 509

BRIEFS AND NOTES.

If one person makes a promise for the benefit of a third, the latter may maintain an action upon it. (Pa.) 640

Assumpsit for purchase money due on parol contract for sale of real estate cannot be maintained. (Pa.) 153

I. WHAT SUBJECT TO.
II. NONRESIDENT OR ABSCONDING DEBTOR; FOREIGN.
III. VACATION; LIABILITY OF OFFICER.
BRIEFS AND NOTES.
See GARNISHMENT.

I. WHAT SUBJECT TO.

1. A fund held in trust under a will, and directed by a decree of the orphans' court "to be paid to defendant, to be applied to his personal support and maintenance, or in his discretion to the support and education of any children he may have, so as the same shall not be in any manner assignable or anticipated, nor liable to his debts or liabilities, or that the trustee may, if thought needful by him, apply the fund in like manner for the benefit of the said defendant and any of his children," is not attachable.
Prentice v. Pleasonton (Pa.) 484

2. Chattels in a mortgagor's possession may be attached for his debts.
Blauvelt v. Fechtman (N. J.) 107

3. Where by the mortgage, mortgagor is entitled to possession until default, the chattels do not, before default, belong to mortgagee, within "Act for Trial of Small Causes," § 60, Rev. 550. Id.

4. Pension money is subject to attachment in the hands of a depositary, under Act of June 16, 1836.
Rozelle v. Rhodes (Pa.) 656

5. Money due or about to become due is not attachable. Authorities cited. Id. 658

6. Commercial paper cannot be attached before it becomes due. Authorities cited.
Fitch v. Brower (N. J.) 372

7. A share of a judgment defendant as legatee in the estate of a decedent, in the hands of an executor, may be attached by service upon the garnishee of a writ of attachment issued on the judgment, in the manner provided for the service of a writ of summons in a personal action.
Purves v. Lex (Pa.) 891

II. NONRESIDENT OR ABSCONDING DEBTOR; FOREIGN.

8. In attachment against a nonresident or absconding debtor, compliance with the statute is essential.
Randle v. Mellen (Md.) 392

9. If the attachment be quashed, the whole proceeding, including the summons and short note, falls. Id.

10. When an attachment has been so quashed, the subsequent return of non est to an alias summons will be of no avail. Id.

11. When an attachment issued against an absconding debtor has been quashed, the creditor cannot obtain successive attachments upon two returns of non est to writs of summons issued in the same attachment proceeding. Id.

12. An affidavit of cause of action in foreign attachment, stating that a partnership had been formed between D and T, to manufacture a certain patented article; that D was to be a silent partner; that they granted the patent-right to the garnishee for a royalty, recited "to be paid to T;" but that the grant was in consideration that the royalties should be paid to D, and that T received them for their joint benefit,—Held, to be sufficient, in connection with the agreements of partnership and grant of the patent right.
Davis v. Tingley (Pa.) 889

13. One having possession of goods or effects may surrender them in obedience to a judgment in a foreign attachment, although he may happen to be in a foreign jurisdiction at the time the writ issued. Authorities cited.
Fitch v. Brower (N. J.) 372

14. A judgment in attachment against a nonresident, not personally served, is good as a personal judgment against him, where the record shows a general appearance by his attorneys; and such judgment is sufficient upon which to enter judgment against a garnishee.
Donoghue v. Hanley (Pa.) 604

III. VACATION; LIABILITY OF OFFICER.

15. Upon vacation, it is the sheriff's duty to deliver the property to defendant or the person entitled thereto.
Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 784

16. A bond of indemnity to the sheriff does not cover a detention after vacation of attachment. Id.

17. Where, upon vacation, the sheriff has refused on demand to deliver the property, and a recovery has been had against him, the sureties on the bond of indemnity are not liable to the sheriff on the amount of such recovery. Id.

18. Where the sole ground of recovery against such sheriff was the demand and refusal, he cannot allege, in an action on the indemnity bond, that he had a right to retain the property. Id.

19. Where the sheriff levied the execution against himself on the goods which he had attached and kept in his hands, and sold them on the execution, and turned over the money to the attorney for the plaintiff in the execution,—Held, the knowledge of such attorney as to where the money came from would be no ratification by the plaintiff in the execution of his prior illegal act in refusing to surrender the goods. Id.

20. An attempt to defend the sheriff is not a ratification by obligors in the indemnity bond of such act, when sued by the sheriff on their bond. Id.

1. Notice of an unrecorded deed to an attorney or agent is equivalent to notice to principal.
Dickerson v. Bowers (N. J.) 872

2. A general guardian may employ an attorney to obtain possession of the ward's lands, and make an agreement to pay such attorney a certain portion of the property recovered.
Re Hynes (N. Y.) 682

3. An agreement by a general guardian to pay an attorney, in consideration of his services in attempting to recover possession of the ward's lands, one third of the value of all property recovered held valid. Ruger, Ch. J., and Earl, J., dissent. Id.

4. Under said agreement, the attorney was entitled to his stipulated funds arising from the sale of lands of the deceased father of the infants in another State, for which notes were given. Id.

5. The fee of counsel employed by a third person to assist such attorney, in litigation to recover said real estate, should not be deducted from the amount to be paid to said attorney under said agreement. Id.

6. The compensation of an attorney is not, in the absence of an agreement, necessarily coextensive with the taxable costs for conducting a number of similar cases, involving only the most simple questions of fact; and the attorney is only entitled to what his services are reasonably worth.

1. It seems that a contract expressly "of renting only and not a sale, conditional or otherwise," by which a sewing machine "valued at $50" is "rented" for fourteen months for the sum of $10, and the further sum of $3 per month upon certain conditions, the machine to be delivered to lessor at the expiration of the time for which it is rented, with the "option" on lessee's part to "purchase" it within ten days thereafter for $1——, is a bailment.
Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Heil (Pa.) 179

2. A bailee for safe keeping must return the thing bailed to the bailor, or according to the bailor's directions. He cannot require proof that the bailor is also the owner.
McCafferty v. Brady (Pa.) 597

3. It is no defense to assumpsit by the bailor against the bailee to allege that the thing bailed belonged to a third person. Id.

4. The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to the obligation of a bailee of money to hold or invest, where there is no stipulation as to the length of time he should hold it, and there has been no demand.

McDonald v. Davis (N. Y.) 754

2. It is competent to interpose the discharge to any proceeding to enforce the judgment by asking for a perpetual stay upon the execution. Id.

3. An order in the bankruptcy court vacating the stay has no effect by way of limiting the subsequent discharge of defendant; and such discharge is a perfect defense in an action upon the judgment. Id.

Nash v. White's Bank of Buffalo (N. Y.) 690

2. By the system of exchanges among the banks of Rochester, defendant bank,— receiving a certified draft with notice that it represented an item merely in the exchange account between the certifying bank and plaintiff bank, and that it was certified for the purpose of being used in the settlement of that account at the close of the day, and with notice that the certifying bank was diverting it from the purpose for which it had been certified by plaintiff bank,—did not become a holder in good faith.

Flour City Nat. Bank v. Traders Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 757

3. In an action to make defendant bank responsible for the amount of a draft, on the ground that the teller of defendant had, on inquiry of him if the certification was good, answered in the affirmative,—Held, that the plaintiff had a right, under the circumstances offered to be proved, to go to the jury on the question whether such inquiry was understood by the parties as referring to the validity of the certification when exhibited to the teller, or only to the genuineness of the marks of certification; and also whether it was culpable negligence to answer the question without referring to the books.

4. An action by a stockholder of a bank against its directors, to call them to account as trustees, is triable by the court.
Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick (N. Y.) 711

5. An agreement by a savings bank to make deposits in an incorporated bank is permissible, where the deposit does not exceed the limit prescribed by Laws 1875, chap. 371, § 27; and an agreement by the bank of deposit to pay interest does not convert the deposit into an unauthorized loan.

BENEFIT SOCIETIES.

1. The by-laws of a beneficial corporation provided that $1,000 should, at the death of each member, be paid to the person designated by deceased; and if no designation made, then to his widow; if no widow survives, then to his child or children, etc. A member having a wife and children, borrowed $1,000 from his sister who was designated as beneficiary on the books of the lodge. She paid his dues until his death. Held, that she was entitled to recover the amount of his interest from the corporation.
Manealy v. Knights of Birmingham (Pa.) 633

2. Where an Act provides that in an action for the recovery of an assessment a certificate of a mutual insurance company shall be evidence to prove the claim to the assessment, unless the party sued will make a certain affidavit, if such party makes the affidavit, the company must prove its claim.
Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach (Pa.) 588

3. The amount of the assessment rests in the discretion of the board of directors. Id.

4. A reasonable amount may be included in the assessment for expenses and losses by reason of insolvent members. Id.

5. The directors have no right to make an assessment on another basis from that provided by the by-laws of the company. Id.

6. The burden of showing fraud of officers is on defendant. Id.

7. Assumpsit lies, where the contract is not under seal, against an assessment life insurance corporation for assessments on members, due to a deceased member's widow.

1. A note by a married woman to a firm of which her husband is a member is void at law.
Nat. Bank of Rahway v. Brewster (N. J.) 482

2. Where notes of a company have been unlawfully converted by its president, the company may recover possession of them from the holder by replevin, unless he is a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice.
Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Best (N. Y.) 63

3. In an action of replevin for notes not enforceable as the pecuniary obligations of a corporation, by reason of their defective execution, only nominal damages can be recovered for their detention. Id.

4. The burden of proving a purchase in good faith and for value devolved upon defendant, after it was established that the notes had surreptitiously been put in circulation. Id.

5. Where notes purporting to be those of a company were not properly executed because not signed by its president, and this defect was apparent upon the face of the paper, it deprived the notes of the character of commercial paper. Id.

6. The transferee of such notes, by paying value for them, is not a bona fide purchaser. Id.

7. One drawing the form of a promissory note, which is unsigned, and which falls into the hands of another, does not thereby authorize the holder to attach the maker's signature.
Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Best (N. Y.) 63

8. One buying commercial paper which remains in some essential particular incompleted and imperfect, is not a bona fide holder. Id.

9. Authority given by a resolution of a company to its treasurer to have its notes signed only authorizes him to have them signed by the officers who had theretofore been authorized to sign such instruments for the corporation. Id.

10. A negotiable instrument must be a complete and perfect instrument when it is issued, or there must be authority reposed in some one afterwards to supply anything needed to make it perfect. Authorities cited. Id.

11. Where an indorser of a note has transferred it, but is still liable thereon as indorser, and makes an agreement for a valuable consideration with a third person to pay the note, the transferee and holder of the note may maintain an action against such third person to enforce payment of the note.
Litchfield v. Flint (N. Y.) 41

12. The legal obligation of the promisee to the holder of the note creates a privity by substitution with the promisor. Id.

13. Where such note is subsequently retransferred to the indorser, the latter, having fulfilled such agreement on his part, may maintain an action thereon against such third person to enforce payment. Id.

14. The burden of proving the indorsement and delivery of a note by the maker, who is also the first indorser, to a second indorser, and its indorsement and delivery by the latter to indorsee is on the indorsee in an action by him against the maker.
Long Island Bank v. Boynton (N. Y.) 738

15. As a defense to a past due promissory note, signed by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff's testator; the defendant alleged that the note was given for the accommodation of the testator, evidence in support of such allegation that the date of the note was written with ink different from that used in the rest of the note, and that when the note was protested he had sent notice to the testator, complaining that the testator did not attend to his business, to which the testator replied that it was the defendant who did not attend to his business,—Held, properly submitted to the jury, and that a comment upon its inadequacy was not error.
Potteiger v. Potteiger (Pa.) 530

16. Where a maker of a note desires to pay it, but two persons claim to be entitled to such payment, he is entitled to a bill of interpleader.
Fitch v. Brower (N. J.) 371

17. Commercial paper cannot be attached before it becomes due. Authorities cited.

BODY-STEALING.

1. Penal Code, § 311, against body stealing, does not apply to exhumations by public authorities for ascertaining whether a crime had been committed.
People v. Fitzgerald (N. Y.) 227

2. Where the exhumation is made publicly, on open application to the officer of justice charged with the duty of inquiring into the cause of such death, the statute cannot be used to impose punishment upon the persons concerned in the exhumation, in case of irregular proceedings. Id.

3. Where the affidavits furnished by the defendant to the coroner made a strong case to lead the latter to believe that a murder had been committed, and that an examination of the body, which was within his jurisdiction, would disclose the fact, and defendant sought such examination and asked the coroner to make it, although her motive was some pecuniary advantage for herself by making defamatory charges, and she committed a wrong, it was not the crime of body-stealing. Id.

1. Laws 1869, chap. 909, § 4, amended by Laws 1871, chap. 283, providing for the appropriation of taxes to payment of municipal bonds in aid of railroads, applies to any municipality which has such bonds outstanding.
Clark v. Sheldon (N. Y.) 923

2. It makes no difference as to the duty of the county treasurer that the taxes were not expressly collected or paid over to him for said purpose. Id.

3. Section 4 is not in conflict with the Constitution. Id.

4. It is no defense to a proceeding by a taxpayer, to compel such application, that the petition does not put the amount of taxes claimed to be applicable to that purpose high enough; the county treasurer may be compelled to set aside for a sinking fund all the taxes which may appear to have been paid to him for that purpose. Id.

5. Nor is it an answer to such proceeding that if the county treasurer should do so, there would be a deficiency in other funds. Id.

6. An undertaking given on the removal of an action for claim and delivery from the District Court of New York City to the common pleas, not being made under any statutory authority, is void.
Mittnacht v. Kellermann (N. Y.) 714

7. Sureties are not estopped by any recital in the undertaking from availing themselves of the invalidity of the instrument, when sued thereon. Id.

CANALS.

1. Act of 1870, chap. 321, permitting claims for damages sustained from state canals, does not extend to damages from their navigation.
Rexford v. State (N. Y.) 762

2. Where the master of a canal boat, on the way to his boat, in climbing up a bridge by irons fixed therein, furnished by the State and serving as the rungs of a ladder, was injured through a loose stone falling from the wall,—Held, that the board of claims had jurisdiction of the claim for the damages. Id.

3. Until Laws 1870, chap. 321, canal appraisers had no jurisdiction over injuries from neglect, or which were temporary in their character.
Heacock v. State (N. Y.) 330

4. Where, in raising the banks of a state canal, the banks are built of loose earth, so that leakage occasioning injury results, this is, on its face, a negligent act. Id.

5. A coffer dam, built by the State for restraining waters of a river while enlarging a canal, a portion of which was permitted to remain in the shape of an island, after its purpose was accomplished, is a temporary obstruction merely, with which the Act of 1830 had nothing to do. Id.

6. The Act of 1870 does not confer new jurisdiction to hear claims for taking of land in fee, or for the appropriation of a continuous and permanent easement by the State.
Stewart v. State (N. Y.) 333

7. For a claim for a permanent easement taken by the State for the use of the canals, and corresponding damages, claimant has no remedy under Act of 1870. Such claim must be presented in one year. Id.

8. Under Acts February 25, 1826, and April 9, 1827, the board of canal commissioners had power to purchase lands through which the Pennsylvania Canal was intended to pass, without limitation either as to amount or quality.
Harris v. P. & N. Y. Canal & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 901

9. Land so purchased became ipso facto canal land, and appurtenant to the canal. Id.

10. Until Act of April 9, 1827, the board received authority to sell the remainder not occupied by the canal in their discretion.
Harris v. Pa. & N. Y. Canal & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 901

11. Land so purchased and not sold by the board, although only partially occupied by the canal, passed by a sale, under the Act of April 21, 1858. Id.

I. OF GOODS.

1. Where a party in control of goods contracts for their transportation, and is both consignor and consignee, it will be assumed he had sufficient title to maintain an action for damages for negligence in transportation.
Swift v. Pacific Mail Steamship Co. (N. Y.) 811

2. Evidence that certain seamen are interested in oil will not make them necessary parties, where parties, having control of the oil taken from whaling vessels, delivered it to carriers for transportation and thereafter sued the carriers for negligence in transportation. Id.

3. A carrier over a portion of a continuous line may contract to carry from beyond its own terminus to its terminus, as well as beyond its terminus. Id.

4. Connecting carriers are competent to make a joint contract for transportation and become jointly liable for loss or damage. Id.

5. An action against a common carrier for breach of contract, or of his duty to carry, must be brought in the name of the owner of the goods. Authorities cited. Id. 814

6. Where, by the terms of a contract, freight is not to be paid until after delivery of goods, the carrier cannot claim a lien. Authorities cited.
Wiles Laundry Co. v. Hahlo (N. Y.) 283

7. A carrier is estopped from denying the acts of its local freight agent, with power to issue bills of lading only upon actual receipt of property for transportation, in fraudulently issuing bills of lading whereby third persons suffer damages by advances thereon.
Bank of Batavia v. New York, L. E. & W. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 823

8. A special contract for transportation of goods can not be abrogated or altered by the subsequent signing and mailing of bills of lading by the carriers, which did not reach the consignor,—who was also the consignee—until after the loss occurred.

CHARTER-PARTY.

Defendants chartered a vessel, of which plaintiff was master and agent, for a voyage from New York to Cadiz and return; the charter-party provided that defendants should pay plaintiff a stipulated sum for the round trip, of which a certain amount was made payable at Cadiz, in gold coin, without credit, discount or commission. Plaintiff was instructed to consign himself to a certain firm in Cadiz, who "had full instructions to serve the master in any manner concerning his vessel." At Cadiz, plaintiff received from said consignees in cash a portion of the amount due him, and was informed by them that they had purchased a bill of exchange for the balance, and had remitted the same to plaintiff's principals; and plaintiff settled with the consignees in reliance upon such statements, and sailed from Cadiz. It appeared that said consignees had not purchased or remitted a bill as they had represented, but that they had drawn their own draft on defendants at New York, payable sixty days after sight, and had transmitted the same. Acceptance and payment of this draft were refused by defendants; and plaintiff brought this action for the balance of the charter money due at Cadiz, not paid there in cash. Held, that the facts connected with the draft did not constitute a payment of the defendants' debt, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover.

28. Zinc ore was to be delivered upon the cars at F., New Jersey, and was to be paid for at a price to be determined by the percentage of zinc oxide which it contained when delivered. The vendee was to make the necessary assay. The vendee transported the ore on open cars to B., Pennsylvania, a distance of sixty-two miles, and then endeavored to ascertain the amount of moisture which the ore contained. The results varied, from month to month, between 0.36 and 3.04 per cent. Held, that these results were not safe indications of the amount of moisture in the ore when delivered at F. Id. 481

29. Under a contract made in New York, February 2, 1881, for "prompt shipment by sail from Europe, for delivery at New York," dangers of the sea excepted, precedent to payment, rails were, on February 3, placed on board a ship at a river port in Germany, then closed by ice and not open for navigation until April 2 or 3, on which day the ship sailed for New York, and the rails were tendered to the buyer on June 14. Held, that the buyer was entitled to such timely delivery as would follow an effective shipment, and was not bound to receive the rails.
Tobias v. Lissberger (N. Y.) 723

30. The buyer was not estopped from refusing to accept the rails, by the fact that he had made no objection until the tender, June 14. Id.

III. RESCISSION.

31. Equity will not rescind an executed contract when the parties have a full and complete remedy at law.
Travis v. Lowry (Pa.) 553

32. In an action to recover back the price paid for certain shares of stock on the ground of misrepresentations, the question whether plaintiff rescinded by tendering back the stock without conditions is for the jury.
Bridge v. Penniman (N. Y.) 732

33. The referee having found as a fact that plaintiff did not make an unconditional tender, the judgment dismissing the complaint will be affirmed. Id.

IV. ACTIONS.

34. In an action by a stranger to a contract for work necessary for the completion of a building, claimed by plaintiff to have been done by direction of the architect and for the defendant's benefit, but which the defendant denied having authorized,—Held, the court of appeals was without jurisdiction to weigh the evidence, it being sufficient to make out plaintiff's case.

I. CREATION.

1. Act of April 9, 1886, Pub. Laws 776, directing that certain fines, etc., shall be paid to a committee to be appointed by the court of common pleas and subject to its control, for the establishment and maintenance of a law library, does not create a corporation.
Craig v. Lilly (Pa.) 659

2. A bequest to such a law library is void. Id.

II. MEMBERS AND STOCKHOLDERS; RIGHTS.

3. The action of a corporation, in expelling a member is conclusive until reversed by the common pleas.
McLafferty v. Sweeney (Pa.) 895

4. It is the duty of the expelled member to serve on the officers, before attempting again to participate in the proceedings of the corporation, a decree of the common pleas establishing his rights. Id.

5. If, without serving such a decree, he insists on participating in the proceedings, after he has been requested by vote to retire, he may be ejected by force, and cannot maintain against the members, who eject him without using more force than is necessary, an action of trespass on the case for conspiracy. Id.

6. It is immaterial that one of the officers of the corporation knows of the decree of the common pleas reinstating the member. Id.

7. In an action to compel a company to recognize plaintiff as a stockholder, an answer by a defendant, who is president of the company, that plaintiff agreed that his subscription should be for the use and benefit of said defendant, and that he would transfer the same to him, and that plaintiff was never the real owner of any shares, is responsive to the bill.
Rowley's Appeal (Pa.) 512

8. An affidavit by such defendant that the statements made in the charter of the company was true, annexed to such charter which contained plaintiff's name as a subscriber, and stated the number of shares subscribed for by him, is sufficient corroboration of plaintiff's testimony to overcome the answer. Id.

9. The charter itself, as against him who made oath that the statements therein are true, is written evidence of a high character to repel an allegation which is irreconcilable with those statements. Id.

III. STOCK; LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

10. A contract of subscription to a corporation of Virginia is governed by the laws of that State, and is to be performed there.
Glenn v. Clabaugh (Md.) 391

11. A discharge under the insolvent laws of Maryland is no defense to an action for an assessment on the stock of a corporation of Virginia. Id.

12. Where the unpaid subscriptions to the stock of an insolvent corporation are required to pay the creditors, an assessment is not prerequisite to an action by the assignee of the corporation against a stockholder; but it is otherwise where the whole amount is not required.
Citizens & M. Sav. Bank v. Gillespie (Pa.) 523

13. In assumpsit to recover the amount due by a subscriber it is error to permit the defendant to prove the financial responsibility of another stockholder without first proving the amount of the latter's subscription. Id.

14. A transferee of stock, who at the transfer signs the subscription book, assumes the liabilities of any original subscriber to the stock. Id.

15. Where an Act provides that in an action for the recovery of an assessment a certificate of a mutual insurance company shall be evidence to prove the claim to the assessment, unless the party sued will make a certain affidavit, if such party makes the affidavit, the company must prove its claim.
Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach (Pa.) 588

16. The directors have no right to make an assessment on another basis from that provided by the by-laws of the company. Id.

17. A reasonable amount may be included in the assessment for expenses and losses by reason of insolvent members. Id.

18. The amount of the assessment rests in the discretion of the board of directors.
Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach (Pa.) 588

19. The burden of showing fraud of officers is on defendant. Id.

IV. OFFICERS.

20. Authority given by a resolution of a company to its treasurer, to have its notes signed, only authorizes him to have them signed by the officers who had theretofore been authorized to sign such instruments for the corporation.
Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Best (N. Y.) 68

21. Where notes of a company have been unlawfully converted by its president, the company may recover possession of them from the holder by replevin, unless he is a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice. Id.

22. The burden of proving a purchase in good faith, and for value, devolved upon the defendant after it was established that the notes had surreptitiously been put in circulation. Id.

23. Where notes purporting to be those of a company were not properly executed because not signed by its president, and this defect was apparent upon the face of the paper, it deprived the notes of the character of commercial paper. Id.

24. The transferee of such notes, by paying value for them, is not a bona fide purchaser. Id.

25. In replevin for notes not enforceable as the pecuniary obligations of a corporation by reason of their defective execution, only nominal damages can be recovered for their detention. Id.

26. Declarations of the president of railroad authorized to bind the corporation by contracts in the ordinary business, recognizing the contract as subsisting, and as to what should be done in the matter, are admissible.
Baltimore, etc. R. R. Co. v. Brydon (Md.) 896

27. An action by a stockholder of a bank against its directors, to call them to account as trustees, is triable by the court.
Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick (N. Y.) 711

V. DISSOLUTION AND FORFEITURE.

28. In May, 1875, the attorney-general, in the name of the People, commenced an action in equity against the Erie Railway Co., for its dissolution as an insolvent corporation, and J. was appointed temporary receiver. In June, 1875, two mortgages upon the railway were foreclosed, and J. was appointed receiver of the mortgaged property. The Erie Co., at the commencement of these actions, owned bonds and stocks in other corporations; and the judgment in the foreclosure action recited that they were held by the receiver as part of the mortgaged property, and authorized the referee appointed to sell the mortgaged premises to sell them as a portion thereof, and they passed with the mortgaged premises under such sale to the New York, L. E. & W. R. R. Co., a corporation formed on reorganization of the Erie Co., —the order for such transfer providing that it was subject to all rights of the People, as the same might be ascertained in the People's action. A reference as to the property subject to said mortgage was had in the People's action, and judgment entered therein upon the referee's report to the effect that said stock and bonds were properly sold with mortgaged premises, and adjudging the Erie Co. to be dissolved. Thereafter this suit was commenced to subject said bonds and stocks to the payment of the unsecured obligations held against the Erie Co., on the ground that said bonds and stocks were not covered by said mortgage, and that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the same or of the rights of the unsecured creditors, they not having been made parties to said foreclosure suit nor to the People's action. Held, (a) the court could determine what property was actually indorsed within the mortgages foreclosed; (b) the unsecured creditors were not proper parties to the foreclosure action; (c) the pendency of the people's action did not prohibit foreclosure action; (d) the judgment in the foreclosure action was not, within 2 Rev. Stat. p. 462, § 71, void as against the receiver and creditors; (e) the rights which the statute secures to creditors in case of a statutory final receiver of an insolvent corporation are such only as pertain to the property which comes to the receiver to be administered by him and distributed to the creditors; (f) that there was nothing which required a receiver to consult the general creditors; (g) there is no provision of law requiring general corporation creditors to be made parties to the People's action; (h) the proceeding in equity under the Revised Statutes, p. 463, § 88, was unaffected by the Code of Procedure.
Herring v. New York, L. E. & W. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 308

29. The forfeiture to the county supervisors of the corporate rights of a company, organized under Act of 1875, for noncompletion within time fixed, is not worked by the default, without the intervention of the courts or action on the part of the State or of the county.
Kings Co. v. Elevated R. Co. (N. Y.) 232

VI. MANUFACTURING COMPANIES.

30. Under Act of 1881, § 3, it is not sufficient to exempt a corporation from taxation that it is a manufacturing corporation, but it must also carry on manufacturing within the State.
People v. Horn Silver Mining Co. (N. Y.) 220

31. Where the principal officers of the corporation have their offices in New York city, its directors' meetings being held and its dividends declared and paid there; and, as in this case, in addition thereto, a substantial part of the regular business of the corporation is continuously carried on there during the whole year, the corporation is brought within the Act of 1881, as "doing business within the State." Id.

82. By Laws 1885, chap. 501, the basis of computing a tax under Act of 1881, § 3, to be paid by a corporation, was fixed at the amount of capital stock employed within the State.
People v. Horn Silver Mining Co. (N. Y.) 220

83. In computing the taxes to be paid by a manufacturing company, its entire capital stock was properly taken as the basis of taxation. Id.

84. Where a judgment was entered for the tax before the passage of the Act of 1885, defendant can have no benefit from its provisions authorizing the comptroller to adjust all accounts against a corporation for all taxes and penalties under the Act of 1881. Id.

COSTS. See EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, VII.; JUDGMENT, 1.

1. Under Code, § 3246, in an action by an executor in his representative capacity, costs may be awarded against him as executor.
Syms v. New York (N. Y.) 225

2. A judgment for costs against an executor in his representative capacity should not contain a provision that execution issue for such costs. Id.

3. Where a plaintiff sues as an administrator, but might have sued in his own name, he is personally liable to pay costs.
Buckland v. Gallup (N. Y.) 703

4. Merely describing himself as administrator will not relieve him from costs. Id.

5. Where the auditor appointed to audit the account of a trustee refuses, for lack of vouchers, to allow certain credits claimed, finds numerous evidences of mismanagement through lack of business qualifications on the part of the trustee, but not through dishonesty, and accordingly reduces the trustee's commissions to the amount due upon the business properly done, some of the exceptions to the account being dismissed and some sustained,—it is not error to decree as to costs that they be divided between the estate and the accountant.
Kilgore's Appeal (Pa.) 201

6. It is not essential to the recovery of costs by plaintiff in an action against a municipal corporation for damages for injuries sustained through the negligence of its servants,—commenced before the Code of Civil Procedure went into effect, and therefore governed by Laws 1859, chap. 262,—that the claim should have been presented to the chief fiscal officer of the corporation before suit brought.

2. It makes no difference as to the duty of the county treasurer that the taxes were not expressly collected or paid over to him for said purpose. Id.

3. Section 4 is not in conflict with the Constitution. Id.

4. I. ACCOMPLICE.

1. The rule as to corroboration of an accomplice only requires a corroboration as to some material fact going to prove that the prisoner was connected with the crime. Code Crim. Proc. § 399.
People v. Ogle (N. Y.) 49
People v. Everhardt (N. Y.) 53

2. Whether the evidence is sufficient corroboration is for the jury. Id. 53

3. The law is complied with if there is some other evidence fairly tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime so that his conviction will not rest entirely upon the evidence of the accomplice. Id.

4. The court may refuse to charge the jury in relation to the acts necessary for the corroboration of an accomplice, "that they must be inconsistent with the innocence of the defendant, and exclude every hypothesis but that of guilt."
People v. Ogle (N. Y.) 49

5. One who had no knowledge that a crime was to be committed, and who neither aided nor abetted in its commission, is not an accomplice. Id.

II. INDICTMENT.

6. When defendant was described in the indictment by his known alias, it is not error for the clerk in administering the oath to the jurors challenged, and to the witnesses, to repeat such names, after defendant's true name is discovered.
People v. Everhardt (N. Y.) 53

7. It is not necessary to aver in the indictment against a defaulting tax collector, under Act 1872, chap. 329, that the money is still detained. The indictment is sufficient if it avers that defendant was collector of the state and county taxes for the county, and as such collected the taxes for the year.
State v. Nicholson (Md.) 415

8. Every indictment must bring defendant within all the descriptions mentioned in the body of the Act, except they are such as carry with them the bare denial of a matter, the affirmation whereof is a proper and natural plea for defendant. Authorities cited. Id. 416

9. The court will presume in favor of the pleader every proposition which by reasonable intendment is impliedly included in the pleading. Authorities cited. Id.

III. EVIDENCE; CHARGE OF COURT.

10. Where a magistrate tells a prisoner that it would be better for him to tell the truth and have no more trouble about it, the confession thus obtained is inadmissible in evidence, although he was told at the same time that the magistrate could make no promises.
Biscoe v. State (Md.) 416

11. Where the prisoner, before the confession is received, offers to prove that the magistrate held out inducements to him to confess, the court should permit him to do so. Id.

12. The preliminary question as to the admissibility of a confession should be decided by the court before it is permitted to go to the jury. Id.

13. It is never irrelevant to give in evidence any circumstance which tends to make the proposition at issue more or less probable.
Johnson v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 608

14. As a general rule it is improper upon the trial of a prisoner for one offense to prove that he has been guilty of another.
People v. O'Sullivan (N. Y.) 58

15. Yet upon the trial of a particular crime it is competent to prove that defendant had made the attempt at some prior time, not too distant, to commit the same offense. Id.

16. As a general rule, the evidence of a witness cannot be corroborated or confirmed by proof that he stated the same facts on some occasion when not under oath. Id.

17. On an indictment for stealing a bill, no obligatory proof of its contents may be given without notice to produce. Authorities cited.
De Baril v. Campoy y Pardo (Pa.) 644

18. Where the prisoner's doings are accounted for except during a few hours before and after the murder, it is not error to say to the jury: "He has not been able to tell us where he was that night; that is the unfortunate part of his case."
Johnson v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 608

19. A mere expression of opinion as to the prisoner's guilt, by the judge in his charge to the jury, is not, if warranted by the evidence, ground for reversal. Id.

IV. SENTENCE.

20. Under Act of 1861, the sentence by the justice has the full force and effect of a sentence by the court of quarter sessions.

Codding v. Bradford Co. (Pa.) 869

V. APPEAL OR ERROR.

21. Rule 28, requiring an appeal or writ of error to be taken without delay, makes no distinction between an appeal or writ of error taken by the State and one taken by the accused.
State v. Bowers (Md.) 406

22. What will amount to delay must be determined by the character of each case as it arises. A delay of twenty-one days in a simple case where the petition could easily be prepared in less than an hour, held, an infraction of the rule, and the appeal dismissed. Id.

23. Where a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment was given March 10, and a writ of error was applied for by the State on the 17th of April following, held, that a longer period intervened between the judgment and the application for the writ than is allowed by Rule 28.
State v. Long (Md.) 406

24. Where the term of the court at which defendant was convicted was adjourned without day, no judgment having been rendered, and defendant not having applied for or assented to any delay except to the Tuesday following the day on which the verdict was rendered, and at the next term of the same court, the same judge presiding, the defendant was sentenced, held, that defendant, not objecting to the delay, but moving for a new trial for errors committed on the trial, waived the delay, and was not prejudiced thereby.
People v. Everhardt (N. Y.) 53

25. A mistake of the clerk, in consequence of which the record does not show that the prisoner was present when the jury was sworn or the verdict was entered, may be corrected during the term at which the motion for a new trial is overruled.
Johnson v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 608

26. The right of the supreme court to review proceedings on an indictment for murder is limited to matters of record. Id.

VI. COSTS.

27. Under Act of March 31, 1860, and the Local Act of May 1, 1861, a county to which the latter Act applies is liable to a justice of the peace for all the costs, except those of prosecutor and defendant, of a criminal proceeding before him.
Codding v. Bradford Co. (Pa.) 869

28. A county is not liable for costs of criminal proceedings, unless made so by statute. Authorities cited. Id. 871

BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See BILLS AND NOTES, 3; LIBEL AND SLANDER, 3, 4; MASTER AND SERVANT; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, VI.; PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON; RAILROAD COMPANIES, 13; SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, 4–6; SEDUCTION; TRESPASS, 2, 5; TURNPIKE COMPANIES; WATERS AND WATERCOURSES; WAYS; WHARVES.

I. BREACH OF CONTRACT.

1. An action against a builder for the breach of a contract to erect a house within the stipulated time, is an action for unliquidated damages, in which the court cannot order a reference against objection.
Untermeyer v. Bernhauer (N. Y.) 709

2. If the counterclaim requires the examination of a long account, this will not make the action referable. Id.

3. Should the counterclaim ever require examination, a reference can be ordered as to it, after trial of the issues. Id.

4. A bill of particulars, specifying items of damage, does not constitute an account.
Untermeyer v. Bernhauer (N. Y.) 709

5. Where the former receiver of a railroad company made a contract that complainant should for a year keep the ash pit clean where the engines of the company emptied their ashes, and for his compensation should have the cinders and coal from such pit, held, that complainant is entitled to damages for breach of the contract by the receiver.
Kerr v. Little (N. J.) 125

6. In an action for damages for the breach of a contract to furnish cold storage for eggs, it is error to instruct the jury that by removing the eggs to the warehouse the owner impliedly warranted them to be sound.
Boswell v. Collins (Pa.) 487

7. The rule of damages, in an action for not accepting articles agreed to be delivered, is the profit which would have made.
Baltimore, etc. R. R. Co. v. Brydon (Md.) 396

II. INJURIES TO PROPERTY.

8. Where plaintiff's lands were used for a railroad track for some time, the proper measure of damages is the fair rental value of such lands, for the time they were so used, in absence of special damage.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Boyd (Md.) 435

9. Declarations made by counsel on a former occasion in the course of a trial, while urging the question of the damages before a jury of condemnation of the property in question, are not admissible to prove malice on the part of defendant in order to enhance the damages. Id.

10. For mere interference with prospect, it not being an incident of the estate, no remedy lies apart from contract.
Garrett v. Janes (Md.) 403

11. Act of May 24, 1878, providing for damages to property owners, occasioned by the change of grade of streets in boroughs, is not retroactive so as to give damages for injuries prior to the Constitution of 1874.
Folkenson v. Easton Borough (Pa.) 211

12. The measure of damages for change of grade of street is the difference in the market value of the property before the change, in the immediately adjoining property, and the market value after the change of grade in front of the property, with interest on the principal sum to date.
Freemansburg v. Rodgers (Pa.) 828

13. The right to damages for land taken for a street does not accrue until street is opened.
Easton Borough v. Rinek (Pa.) 192

14. In trespass for cutting standing timber, contrary to the Act of March 29, 1884, the court may double the single damages given by the jury.
Kulp v. Bird (Pa.) 576

15. The natural flow of water from a higher to a lower lot cannot, as a general rule, give a cause of action to one injured thereby.
Sowers v. Lowe (Pa.) 145

16. Plaintiff and defendant owned adjacent lots. Plaintiff's house was close to the line: defendant's thirty-two feet from it. The intervening space was sandy, and sloped from defendant's house to plaintiff's. Plaintiff's cellar was always dry until defendant changed the spouting which had formerly discharged into the street the water from his house, and turned the spouts upon the space between the houses. The water then percolated through the sand, and plaintiff's cellar became damp and the house was damaged. Held, plaintiff had no right of action against defendant for the damage thus caused. Id.

III. INJURIES TO PERSON.

17. In the absence of malice, compensation is the measure of damages in action of slander. If words were uttered with special malice, punitive damages may be awarded, and defendant's means may be taken into account.

I. VALIDITY; ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

1. Whenever there is a great weakness of mind in grantor, although not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration given is grossly inadequate, equity will set aside the conveyance. Authorities cited.
Travis' Appeal (Pa.) 556

2. Where one of the joint owners of land obtains the signature of the other owners to a deed thereof by fraud, and also by misrepresentations induced grantee to believe that he represented the other owners, the deed will be set aside.
Dunnington v. Hubbard (Md.) 887

3. A promise by one to his intended wife, that all he had or might have was to be hers, is not sufficient consideration for a deed to her fourteen years after marriage and after he had failed.
Neilson v. Williams (N. J.) 869

4. Equity will not aid an imperfect voluntary conveyance, even when by accident the deed was not delivered. Authorities cited.
Duraind v. Dych (Pa.) 900

5. An acknowledgment of a mortgage before a justice of the peace, who has qualified as clerk of the oyer and terminer and quarter sessions, is valid.
Adam v. Mengel (Pa.) 184

II. DELIVERY.

6. A delivery of a deed, not beneficial to the grantee of property heavily incumbered, cannot be inferred from the bare record of the deed.
Gifford v. Corrigan (N. Y.) 277

7. An instrument in the form of a deed to a trustee, signed and acknowledged, no consideration being paid, and retained by grantor until death, held, not valid.
Duraind v. Dych (Pa.) 898

8. A father executed a deed to his son but retained the deed in his possession until his death. The son had no knowledge of the deed, which had not been recorded, until it was found among his father's papers. Notwithstanding evidence that the father had said to a stranger that he had given the land to his son, that he would keep the title during his life, but that the son would get the land after his death, held, no title passed. Authorities cited. Id. 899

9. Where a deed is sealed and delivered, and there is nothing to qualify the delivery except the keeping of the deed in the hands of the executing party, and nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately, it is a valid deed. Authorities cited. Id.

10. Acts of grantor, such as recording, may give rise to the legal presumption of delivery. Authorities cited. Id. 900

III. RECORD: NOTICE.

11. A deed sent to clerk to be recorded, without payment of his fees, and which he "pigeon holed," is not "lodged" for record within Recording Act.
Dickerson v. Bowers (N. J.) 872

12. Notice of an unrecorded deed to an attorney or agent is equivalent to notice to principal. Id.

13. The enrollment of a deed is evidence of all circumstances necessary to give validity, but this evidence may be rebutted. Authorities cited.
Dunnington v. Hubbard (Md.) 888

IV. CONSTRUCTION.

14. A deed of land, with all rents, issues, and profits, and all grantor's estate, right and interest, to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, vests in the grantee the legal title and equitable estate, including ground rent and life estate.
Biddle v. Tomlinson (Pa.) 888

15. A deed stated that "This conveyance is upon the express condition that the company, their successors or assigns, shall at all times maintain an opening into the premises hereby conveyed, opposite to the hotel, adjacent to the premises hereby conveyed, for the convenient access of passengers," etc. Held, a covenant running with the land, providing for access or right of way, so as to continue or enhance the value of the hotel property, in favor of its owner or lessee.
Avery v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 795

16. Courts frequently construe that which is in form a condition, a breach of which forfeits the whole estate, into a covenant on which only the actual damage can be recovered. Authorities cited. Id. 799

17. The owner of two adjoining city lots, Nos. 141, and 143, conveyed lot No. 143 to defendant's grantor, by metes and bounds, as being twenty-two feet wide, "with the buildings and improvements thereon, together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereto belonging." The house on the lot conveyed extended beyond the line called for by the deed five feet, on lot No. 141, on the east, up to the west wall of a building thereon, used as the east wall of the house, the greater part of which was on the land conveyed, but was not used as a party wall. The original grantor, being still the owner of lot No. 141, brought ejectment for the said five feet of lot No. 141. Held, said deed conveyed only that part of the house which is on the land described therein, and that no easement exists for the extension of the house upon the land not conveyed.

Griffiths v. Morrison (N. Y.) 773

18. By the word "appurtenances," incorporeal easements or rights or privileges will alone pass, and of these only such as are necessary to the proper enjoyment of the estate granted. Authorities cited. Id. 775

19. The owner of a tract of land, on a plat of which a street was designated, but not then opened, conveyed a portion by deed bounding on west side of such street. Thereafter such street was closed by the public authorities with the acquiescence of the then holder of the abutting lot conveyed by said deed. Held, said deed did not convey fee in road bed of such street, and that grantor was entitled to recover possession of the road bed to the center.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Gould (Md.) 379

20. A deed in pursuance of an antenuptial contract, conveyed land from the husband to a third party for the use and purpose mentioned in the contract, by which the husband in effect agreed to vest in his wife a life estate in the south half of the land, in case she survived him, with the remainder in fee to his heirs, and in the same contingency to vest in her an estate in the other half during two minorities of his children, with remainder in fee to such children, etc. Held, such deed was a mere conveyance to the use of the beneficiaries named.
Helck v. Reinheimer (N. Y.) 743

21. Where the contract provided that if the wife died before the husband, without issue, the land was to be conveyed back to the husband, upon her death, the deed ceased to have any operation. Id.

V. DEFEASANCE.

22. A deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to be a security for money advanced.
Pearson v. Sharp (Pa.) 494

23. It does not follow from the possession of a power of sale by the grantee in such a deed that the power is to be exercised otherwise than by foreclosure. Id.

VI. WARRANTY.

24. Where grantee in a warranty deed assumes to pay certain mortgages as part of the purchase money, equity will compel him to discharge the obligation.

I. CONSTRUCTION; GENERAL RULES.

1. To a bill filed for the construction of a will, testator's heirs at law are necessary parties.
Lomerson v. Vroom (N. J.) 366

2. That testatrix's plan of division of her property fails to effectuate her purpose will not justify the court in disregarding the plain provisions of the will.
Terry v. Smith (N. J.) 127

3. Parol testimony is not admissible to show that testator had other property to which the will applied.
Baker's Appeal (Pa.) 158

4. Where there is no ambiguity in the terms of a will, a doubt suggested by extraneous circumstances cannot be permitted to affect its construction. Authorities cited. Id. 160

5. Intent of testator must be gathered from will itself; all mere technical rules must give way to such construction. Authorities cited.
Rhein's Appeal (Pa.) 491

6. Punctuation must give way whenever it interferes with the proper and reasonable construction of a will. Authorities cited. Id. 491

7. It is only where the first sentence is complete and the other imperfect, or vice versa, that the word "also" can ever have the meaning of the words "in like manner," given to it. Authorities cited. Id. 492

8. When one undertakes to make a will, it will be presumed that his purpose is to dispose of his entire estate.
Snyder v. Baker (D. C.) 847

II. DESCRIPTION OF GIFT AND BENEFICIARY; WHAT INTEREST PASSES.

9. A bequest to a law library to be established and maintained by fines, etc., to be paid to a committee appointed by the court, is a bequest to a mere inanimate thing, having no capacity to receive a gift and is void.
Craig v. Lilly (Pa.) 659

10. Even if the library were a charity, the gift would be defeated by the Act of April, 1855, because the will was made within thirty days of testator's death. Id.

11. The legal rights of the heirs or distributees to property of deceased persons cannot be defeated, except by valid devise of such property to other persons. Authorities cited.
Chamberlain v. Taylor (N. Y.) 291

12. The expression in a will, "the moneys arising from the sales of my real estate," held, to refer only to lands constituting the residue of testator's real estate.

Ballentine v. Wood (N. J.) 465

13. Held, that in a clause providing that after the death of all of testator's children (during whose lives the property was devised in trust) the residue of his real estate should "go and descend * * * to the respective right heirs of my said children in fee simple, to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants,"—the words "right heirs" meant "children," and that the gift in remainder and the life estate vested at the same moment. Id.

14. Held, also, that testator's grandchildren, alive at his death, took a vested title to the remainder at his death by independent gift, their estate being, however, subject to the liability to open and let in grandchildren born subsequently. Id.

15. The gift of the produce of a fund is a gift of the fund itself, unless there be words of qualification restraining the extent and duration of the interest therein.
Snyder v. Baker (D. C.) 847

16. A testator bequeathed separate legacies to each of his three daughters, with directions to the trustees to invest and apply the interest to their use, and in case of the marriage of any of them, to hold her share in trust for the maintenance of her and her husband, and the survivors of them, for life, then in trust for such issue as she might leave at the time of her death; failing such issue, in trust for the surviving daughters, and the issue of any deceased daughter. One of the daughters died unmarried. Held, she died possessed of an absolute estate in the legacy bequeathed by her father, and that her testamentary disposition of it was valid. Id.

17. A bequest of personalty without words of limitation passes an absolute estate, unless the contrary intention is plainly expressed or necessarily implied. Authorities cited. Id. 851

18. A bequest: "I give and bequeath to my wife all my finished cabinet ware, on hand at the time of my decease, all my certificates of loan, bonds, notes, and all other evidence of indebtedness to me that I have or may have at the time of my decease; and I also give and bequeath to my said wife all my household furniture, of which I may die possessed, for her own use for and during her natural life, and after her death the same to go to my son," etc., is an absolute gift of cabinet ware, notes, and other evidence of indebtedness to the wife.
Rhein's Appeal (Pa.) 490

19. A bequest to A, and if she should die unmarried or without children to B, is an absolute gift to A, defeasible by an executory gift over in the event of A dying at any time unmarried or without children. Authorities cited.
Re New York, L. & W. R. Co. (N. Y.) 262

20. Where a testator, having a power of appointment under his father's will, and having in his possession some property subject to the power, makes this will: "I leave and bequeath all my property (as stated in my father's will) to my wife," etc., nothing passes thereby except property to which the power applies.
Baker's Appeal (Pa.) 158

21. Testator devised lands in trust for the use of his daughter E. during her lifetime, and her daughter S. and to her heirs after her, and if S. die before maturity and without issue, then to the children of his son, with power in the executor to sell the property. Held, that S. having arrived at maturity, and having children, is entitled to the whole estate after E's death, and that E. and S. may elect to take the land; and if S. cannot elect by reason of being a married woman, equity can give the necessary aid to protect her interests.
Howell v. Tomkins (N. J.) 463

III. DURATION AND NATURE OF ESTATE; LIMITATIONS, REMAINDERS, ETC.

22. A court of equity called upon to settle the equitable rights of the parties, may charge remaindermen with moneys expended for the benefit of the estate.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 800

23. Municipal assessment for permanent improvements upon land are apportionable between the life tenant and the remainderman; ordinary taxes of government are properly chargeable to the life tenant alone. Authorities cited. Id. 804

24. A life tenant cannot charge a remainderman with the expense of permanent improvements put upon the property by him during the life tenancy. Authorities cited. Id.

25. Where there is a devise to one person in fee, and, in case of his death, to another, the contingency referred to is the death of the first named devisee during testator's lifetime; and if such devisee survives testator, he takes an absolute fee.
Re New York L. & W. R. Co. (N. Y.) 259

26. The same rule of construction is to be applied where the alternative devise is made to depend upon the death of the first named devisee "without issue," or "without children," etc. But the tendency is to lay hold of slight circumstances in the will to vary such construction and give effect to the language according to its natural import. Id.

27. When testatrix devised real estate to her daughter, without words of inheritance, and then directed that in case the daughter should die without issue, the estate (real and personal) should be possessed by the husband, sister and brothers of testatrix, the addition at the end of the clause, "the devise over to my husband, sister and brothers to depend upon the contingency of my daughter dying without issue," indicated an intention by the testatrix that in the event of her daughter's dying without issue, her husband, sister and brothers should enjoy the property, without reference to any other contingency. Id.

28. The daughter took, under her mother's will, a conditional fee, defeasible by her dying without leaving issue at her death; that her issue, should she leave any, would take by inheritance from her; but a conveyance by her in her lifetime would be effectual as against them, and that an indefeasible title in fee could be conveyed and the contingent expectant estate limited to the husband, sister and brothers of the testatrix, in the event of the daughter dying without issue, cut off by their joining with her in a conveyance.

Re New York L. & W. R. Co. (N. Y.) 259

29. Where the context is silent, the words referring to the death of a prior legatee, in connection with some collateral event, apply to the contingency happening as well after as before testator's death. Authorities cited. Id. 262

30. Where a will gave to testator's daughter $4,000 and one fourth of the residue absolutely, but the codicil thereto provided that executor should pay her the whole of the interest, and as much of the principal thereof as she might need from time to time, and whatever may remain at her death should go to her issue, and if she should have no issue then to testator's grandchildren living at her death, held, that the amount she was to receive depended on her necessities.
Reeves v. Beekman (N. J.) 458

31. The burden of proof is on such daughter's executor to show that the principal sums had been paid, according to her necessities; and in the absence of such proof, he must account for the principal. Id.

32. The absolute power of distribution of the entire fund in her hands as executrix did not give her the absolute title to it. Id.

33. If she was in need, she might have used such funds at her own peril, and the extent of her necessities could have been ascertained through a master. Id.

34. Where testator had held the principal moneys in hand for the purpose of investment and reinvestment, but mingled them with his own funds, it was not improper, in settling with the life tenant whose funds were so held, to charge the testator with interest upon interest, as he forebore investment and used the moneys for his own convenience. Earl, J., dissents.
Re Kernochan (N. Y.) 90

35. Where a will gives to testator's wife the use and income of all his estate during her life or until she marries again, with power to the executors to dispose of any of it and to change the investment, and upon his wife's death gives such use and income to his two sons, share and share alike, and upon the decease of his sons, to their heirs—should both have heirs—their father's portion only, and in case of one having no heirs then to the heirs of the other, share and share alike, and if both should have no heirs, then as the law directs—the suspension of absolute ownership will or may exceed a longer period than two lives in being at the death of the testator. Such limitation is too remote, and renders the disposition void.
Ward v. Ward (N. Y.) 67

36. A valid trust was created by the will, to continue during the life or widowhood of testator's wife, but on her death the residue then remaining of the estate should be divided according to the Statute of Distributions in cases of intestacy. Id.

IV. TRUSTS; CHARITIES.

37. In construing a will the same rules of construction to determine the quality of the estate bequeathed, whether for life or in fee, will be applied to trust estates as to those which are not.
Snyder v. Baker (D. C.) 347

38. Testator directed his residuary estate to be divided into two equal parts, one part to be paid to a religious corporation and the other to an educational corporation. All the rest of his real and personal estate not theretofore specifically devised he devised and bequeathed to his executors in trust for the payment of the bequests and legacies theretofore specified and ready to be paid; and for the execution of such trust empowered them to sell and convert his real and personal estate into cash. The executors conveyed certain real estate, and, the same being in the adverse possession of defendant, brought ejectment for their grantee. Held, (a) that no estate in land vested in the trustees; (b) that if the power to sell conferred by the will might be exercised as a power in trust, in that event the title would descend to the heirs at law, subject to the execution of the power; (c) that such devises are invalid to the extent of one half of the residuary estate, as conflicting with the statute forbidding bequests to religious corporations, etc., in excess of one half of testator's property; (d) that there was no equitable conversion of the realty so as to take it out of the statutory rules for the descent of real estate; (e) that there was nothing to prevent the regular descent of the land to the legal heirs of testator.
Chamberlain v. Taylor (N. Y.) 288

39. A will provided that the residue of the estate was "to be kept in reserve for further consideration in the way of charitable purposes in liberal way, not to any particular creed or sect a of religion." Held, that testator's intention was to give the residue to the executors in trust for such charitable purposes as they may think proper.
Claypool v. Norcross (N. J.) 917

40. Where a will gave to complainant and W., another daughter of testatrix, each the interest of one sixth of the entire estate for life, with remainder to complainant's daughter, and after giving certain legacies, gave the residue of the estate, real and personal, to the executor "in trust for the execution of my will," to pay debts, etc., and then to pay over to another daughter, S., the rents, issues, and profits of the balance of the residue, and at her death to hand over such balance to S's two daughters, held, that the shares of complainant and W. are not subject to the trust created for the residue.
Terry v. Smith (N. J.) 127

41. The words "for the execution of my will," employed to qualify the trust, are superfluous, and do not extend it over the shares of complainant and her sister W. Id.

42. The trust of the residue did not de- volve upon the administrator with the will annexed.

Terry v. Smith (N. J.) 127

43. If a good reason be shown for so doing, a mixed trust is partible in equity. Id.

44. Where the will created a trust and, no trustee having been appointed, the trust would devolve upon the executor—where he has renounced, the administrator having no authority to execute the trust—the court may appoint a trustee. Id.

45. If the real estate can be partitioned without prejudice to the interests of the owners, the share of the complainant may be set off and she may enjoy it as a tenant for life. Id.

46. By one clause of his will a father devised his residuary estate to his daughter, "to have and hold the same, unto her heirs and assigns forever," and in a following clause committed to her the guardianship of his grandchild, the child of a deceased daughter, with the words: "I enjoin upon her to make such provision for such grandchild out of my residuary estate now in her hands, in such manner, at such times and in such amounts as she may judge to be conducive to the welfare of such grandchild and her own sense of justice and Christian duty should dictate." Held, such provision is not ground for a complaint by the general guardian of the grandchild to have a trust declared in her favor.

Lawrence v. Cooke (N. Y.) 101

47. The provision was not intended to relieve the father of the grandchild from his legal obligation to support his own child, and it vested the absolute title to his residuary estate in his daughter. Id.

48. Under a provision in a will in these words: "It is my request that all persons herein named as executors will consent to act as such executors and trustees; and that each executor and trustee, other than my wife, do also receive and take the full rate and commissions provided by law for each executor, intending thus to provide suitable compensation for their services in addition to the duties herein devolved upon them," held, the intention of the testator was to exclude his wife from compensation.

V. POWER OF SALE; CONVERSION.

49. The law never considers a conversion of real and personal property to have taken place unless there has been a valid devise of the property in discussion in some form to the beneficiary, and the purposes of the will required it to be done.

VI. ACCUMULATIONS.

53. Under a will empowering the executors to "receive the rents, interest, and income," and to apply the net amounts thereof to the use of testator's widow during life, and after her death to divide the remaining estate among his heirs, a dividend declared upon railroad stock, assets of the estate, before testator's death, but payable after his death, belonged to the executors.

Re Kernochan (N. Y.) 90

54. Prior to testator's death the railroad company accumulated securities, and other assets, from earnings over and above expenses and dividends, and some two months after testator's death it had on hand $1,102,000, as a sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding obligations; and at that time an agreement was entered into between certain stockholders, among them the executors, and a canal association, for the sale of their stock to the canal association for $250 for each share, and providing that the canal association should have the sinking fund, but that the stockholders should be paid a ratable portion of this surplus, which amounted to $15.74 per share. Held, that the price paid for the shares, although increased by this prospective advantage, belonged altogether to the remaindermen and was properly carried to principal and not income. Id.

55. A dividend declared upon the stock by the company after testator's death, from accumulated net earnings of the company running back for a considerable period of time, went to the widow as income under the will. Andrews, J., dissents. Id.

56. A privilege to subscribe for, and take at par, one or more bonds or shares of stock for a certain number of shares of stock before held by the estate, if accepted, operated as a change in the manner of investment of so much of the estate; and the value belonged to the estate and not to the life tenant. Id.

57. Payments in respect of profits, accruing and properly defeasible as such, are income and belonged to the tenant for life, if the sum payable is ascertained and payable after testator's death. Id.

58. A gift of the profits and dividends of stock for life will not be held to carry dividends declared after the death of the beneficiary, although made from profits accruing during his lifetime. Authorities cited. Id. 95

60. Mortgages executed by a son to testator to secure money received and notes indorsed and paid by the testator for the accommodation of the son, are evidence of debt and not of advancement. Id.

VIII. PAYMENT OF DEBT.

61. A legacy will generally be presumed to be in satisfaction of a demand against the testator. The intention of the testator is to govern. A devise of land is not to be taken in satisfaction of a debt

Rusling v. Rusling's Exrs. (N. J.) 129

62. Where a husband in his will recognised a claim of his wife against him, for money loaned, it will be presumed to be still outstanding. Id.

63. When testator provides that his just debts shall be paid if any he has, and the legacy given is in excess of the amount of the debt and interest due his wife, and he directs that the bequests in favor of his wife shall be in lieu of dower or any other claim against his estate,—Held, that he thereby intended to discharge and satisfy his indebtedness to his wife. Id.

64. If a testator declares that all his debts and legacies shall be paid, it will overcome the presumption that he intended the legacy to be in satisfaction of a debt due from him. Authorities cited. Id. 131

65. The presumption is also overcome if the legacy be less than the debt, or if the debt be unliquidated, or the legacy be given to a third person. Id.

IX. PAYMENT; CHARGE ON LAND

66. The orphans' court has no jurisdiction to decree the payment of a legacy by a devisee, unless the legacy is charged upon land.
Schmehl v. Bickel (Pa.) 504

67. By a devise: "I order that my son my dwelling and piece of land containing about twenty-six acres more or less, as his own property, but (aber) my son shall keep my wife as long as she lives, or pay her annually $72, and my son must, after my wife's death, pay to my daughter $1,200, as follows" etc., the legacy to the daughter is not charged upon the land. Id.

68. By the words "subject to the payment of * * * $125 unto my widow during her life," following a devise of land, testator intended the land to be charged with the annual payment, of said sum during the life of the widow.

The heirs at law agreed that, so long as the widow should make no claim for dower, each heir should pay her annually a certain sum, etc., and that when the widow should claim dower the payments should cease; and provided that "Nothing herein contained and no receipt by her (the widow) of any of the above mentioned payments shall be any bar to her application for such dower; but such payments shall be claimed as a credit on the amount of dower which may be claimed." One of the heirs paid only a part of the amount stipulated, and in no year paid the full sum stipulated. After the widow's death her administrator brought suit for arrearages of dower against one who had purchased a portion of said real estate from said heir. Held:

(a) That the widow did not waive her right under the law by receipt of payments under said agreement.

(b) That contract repels inference that widow released whole or any part of the amount due her.

(c) That recovery herein was properly measured by one third the annual rents of land in suit.

(d) That the facts failed to establish an estoppel against the widow's right to assert her claim to dower in the land in suit.

(e) That said heir was incompetent to testify to matters which occurred between himself and the widow in her lifetime.

1. Ejectment is the proper remedy against one holding adversely. Authorities cited.
Wistar's Appeal (Pa.) 653

2. Ejectment cannot be maintained against defendants, not in possession of the premises nor claiming title to the possession.
Sisson v. Cummings (N. Y.) 806

3. Such defendants are entitled to a dismissal of the complaint. Id.

4. A general guardian can maintain ejectment to recover possession of his ward's lands. Authorities cited.
Re Hynes (N. Y.) 683

5. A vendor, upon vendee's request may bring ejectment, take confession of judgment to be released on payment of sum due by vendor at stipulated time, and upon vendee's failure to perform condition, issue execution and recover possession of the land. Authorities cited.
Miles v. Lewis (Pa.) 865

6. Plaintiff need not always show title out of the Commonwealth and then trace each successive transfer down to himself.
Jones v. Bland (Pa.) 859

7. Where both plaintiff and defendant claim under the same party, it is sufficient for plaintiff to prove in the first instance, if he claims by devise, the seisin of the devisor and the will. Id.

8. Seisin of a devisor may be proved, prima facie, by showing that he was in actual possession or in receipt of the rents as landlord at his death. Id.

9. In ejectment by an execution purchaser against the execution defendant, evidence of the judgment, process and sheriff's deed is conclusive, and make a prima facie case.
Birkbeck v. Kelly (Pa.) 890

10. It is competent in ejectment to prove declarations of both grantor and grantee, as tending to show an intent to defraud plaintiff, a creditor of grantor.
Cope v. Kidney (Pa.) 866

11. An objection to plaintiff's title in ejectment, not suggested at the trial, cannot be raised in the supreme court. Id.

12. In ejectment to recover possession of the underlying mineral ore, from the owner of the surface, the defendant claimed title to the ore under a release alleged to have been executed by a former owner of the mineral right to a former owner of the surface, nearly forty years before suit brought, and lost or destroyed. Held, that secondary evidence was properly rejected.
Phœnix Iron Co. v. Lewis (Pa.) 515

13. A, B, and C, by conveyance which excepted certain lots, became tenants in common of a tract of land which, for the purpose of clearing up the title, A by agreement with B and C, permitted to be sold for taxes, and bought in his own name for the benefit of all. Still later both this tract and the excepted lots were again sold for taxes, and were bought by D. The excepted lots were not redeemed, and D conveyed them to A; B and C thereon brought ejectment against A for an undivided two thirds of the lots. Held, that in the absence of fraud, they could not recover.
Brickell v. Earley (Pa.) 520

II. VERDICT; JUDGMENT.

14. In ejectment, held, that the question was merely one of lines, and that the justice of plaintiff's claim was plain from certain deeds, which need not have been submitted to the jury.
Kime v. Polen (Pa.) 568

15. In ejectment in the nature of an appeal from the board of property, under the Act of April 3, 1792, § 11, held, that there was an error in directing a general verdict for the plaintiffs, without a reservation of the defendants' ore rights, reserved in a deed.
Thompson v. Mattern (Pa.) 621

16. Such verdict may be amended so as to reserve such rights. Id.

17. The supreme court has the power to amend verdicts in ejectment, especially those of an equitable kind. Id.

18. A verdict was rendered for a sum of money. There was no claim for mesne profits. The court ordered judgment for the land, without prejudice to plaintiff's right to bring suit for mesne profits. Held, not error.
Cope v. Kidney (Pa.) 866

19. Judgment obtained on the ground of relationship of successful party to the person last seised is not a bar to a subsequent ejectment by the unsuccessful party, or conclusive evidence of the fact of relationship.
Gehr v. Miller (Pa.) 508

I. IN GENERAL; REMEDY AT LAW.

1. Where the remedy at law is adequate, no ground exists for the interposition of equity.
Oakville Co. v. Double-Pointed Tack Co. (N. Y.) 720

2. A suit in equity cannot be maintained by an executor to recover the value of trees cut from the realty belonging to the estate; the remedy is at law.
Lippincott v. Barton (N. J.) 920

3. Where a person in peaceable possession, under claim of lawful title, but really under a defective title, making in good faith permanent improvements, the true owner who seeks the aid of equity to establish his own title will be compelled to reimburse the occupant for his expenditure.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 800

II. FRAUD OR MISTAKE.

4. The jurisdiction of equity to rescind contracts for fraud or mistake is one of the best settled of its powers.
Diffendarfer v. Dicks (N. Y.) 741

5. In an action to reform a written contract for mistake, the plaintiff cannot insist that its true meaning is precisely what it would have been if the instrument were reformed as asked.
Oakville Co. v. Double-Pointed Tack Co. (N. Y.) 720

6. Equity will not rescind an executed contract when the parties have a full and complete remedy at law.
Travis' Appeal (Pa.) 553

7. Whenever there is a great weakness of mind in grantor, although not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration given is grossly inadequate, equity will set aside the conveyance. Authorities cited.
Travis' Appeal (Pa.) 556

8. Equity will not aid an imperfect voluntary conveyance, even when by accident the deed was not delivered. Authorities cited.
Duraind v. Dych (Pa.) 900

9. Where one of the joint owners of land obtains the signature of the other owners to a deed thereof by fraud, and also by misrepresentations induced grantee to believe that he represented the other owners, the deed will be set aside.
Dunnington v. Hubbard (Md.) 387

10. In a suit to recover the amount paid under execution upon a judgment alleged to have been erroneously included through mistake of fact alleged to have been known to defendant, held, the complaint failed to show cause of action.
Wood v. Amory (N. Y.) 760

III. ACCOUNT.

11. The court of chancery may compel an account of waste, done only as incidental to relief by injunction to stay the commission for further waste, and that only to prevent a multiplicity of suits.
Lippincott v. Barton (N. J.) 920

12. An action by a stockholder of a bank against its directors, to call them to account as trustees, is triable by the court.
Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick (N. Y.) 711

13. Where upon a bill for an account, the master recommends a decree for the plaintiff, and his report is confirmed by the court below, the fact that he disregarded considerable vague testimony, is not ground for reversing the decree at the instance of the defendant.
Perry's Appeal (Pa.) 164

14. A petition cannot be maintained, by one not entitled to come in as complainant, filed in a suit terminated fifteen years before, against one not a party to, and who has not been appointed trustee in, the suit, and who has no court funds in his hands, charging him to be a self constituted trustee of certain funds in his hands, to make him account for his misdoings in regard to such funds and to bring them into court for distribution, the suit having been instituted for an entirely different purpose.
Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

IV. PLEADING.

15. A bill asking relief against all the defendants as executors and relief against one of defendants as mortgagee of trust property with notice of the trust, is multifarious.
Cocks v. Varney (N. J.) 457

16. In an action to compel a company to recognize plaintiff as a stockholder, an answer by a defendant who is president of the company that plaintiff agreed that his subscription should be for the use and benefit of said defendant, and that he would transfer the same to him, and that plaintiff was never the real owner of any shares, is responsive to the bill.
Rowley's Appeal (Pa.) 512

17. An affidavit by such defendant that the statements made in the charter of the company was true, annexed to such charter which contained plaintiff's name as a subscriber, and stated the number of shares subscribed for by him, is sufficient corroboration of plaintiff's testimony to overcome the answer. Id.

18. When the hearing is on petition and answer, all statements in the answer must be regarded as true. Authorities cited.
McKaig v. James (Md.) 452

V. PRACTICE; MASTER; DECREE; APPEAL.

19. Where plaintiff brings an action for both legal and equitable relief, he submits to have the issue tried by the court. Authorities cited.

Cogswell v. New York, etc. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 330

20. If plaintiff can with certainty have his rights determined without trying and deciding a case as between codefendants, the court will not enter into such a case.
Gaither v. Clarke (Md.) 438

21. Unless the discretion of the common pleas in refusing to open a decree in equity has been abused, it will not be reviewed.
Acuff's Appeal (Pa.) 914

22. When the master's report follows the direction of the decree, an exception to it will be overruled.
United N. J. R. R. & Canal Co. v. Long Dock Co. (N. J.) 920

23. In a suit to quiet title, when an issue as to the title was framed and tried by a jury, the decree will be in accordance with the verdict.
Wilson v. Wilson (N. J.) 456

24. Under Act of April 1, 1874, an appeal in equity must be taken within two years.
Acuff's Appeal (Pa.) 914

VI. COSTS.

25. Courts of equity exercise discretionary power as to cost.
Owings v. Rhodes (Md.) 407

26. Where a bill is filed by an administrator for an account of decedent's interest in an estate, and for a discovery of personal property, held by defendant, and to restrain him from expending that property in improvements upon the joint real estate, and it appears that defendant had made several settlements and paid the balance found due from him thereon and offered to make a further settlement which was refused, and that complainant could have got all the information he desired as to the property by inquiring of defendant, who had not refused to give it, and that defendant did not contemplate any expenditures upon the joint real estate except those which he was constrained to make by the municipal authorities, held, that defendant should not be required to pay the costs of the suit.

ESTOPPEL. See JUDGMENT, III.

1. After a tax sale and comptroller's deed given therefor, the original owner executed to a third person a deed of the land, which was in reality a mortgage, and the grantee therein sued the holder of the comptroller's deed to remove the same as a cloud on title, which suit resulted in a judgment in favor of such holder, thereafter the plaintiff in that suit reconveyed the land to the original owner. Held, that the original owner was not estopped by said judgment in the suit brought by his mortgagee, from afterwards questioning the validity of the comptroller's deed, in an action against him by the holder of such deed.
Shattuck v. Bascom (N. Y.) 87

2. Sureties are not estopped by any recital in the undertaking from availing themselves of the invalidity of the instrument when sued thereon.
Mittnacht v. Kellermann (N. Y.) 714

3. Where plaintiff took a note and a mortgage as collateral security, with notice that the note was accomodation paper, the certificate of mortgagor that the note was subject to no defense constituted no estoppel against setting up the defense of usury to defeat the mortgage.
Lewis v. Barton (N. Y.) 781

4. Satisfaction of a municipal claim for water pipe operates as an estoppel on the municipality when a subsequent purchaser of the land applies for permit to introduce water from the pipe to the premises.
Philadelphia v. Matchett (Pa.) 907

5. The purchaser of iron ore, under a contract by which he retains part of the price and promises vendor to pay it to a third person, not a party to the contract, if such third person owned the land from which the ore was taken, but if not then to have nothing to pay, is not estopped from setting up his own title to the land as a defense to assumpsit by the third person for the sum so retained.
Grim v. Thomas Iron Co. (Pa.) 506

6. A carrier is estopped from denying the acts of its local freight agent, with power to issue bills of lading only upon actual receipt of property for transportation, in fraudulently issuing bills of lading whereby third persons suffer damages by advances thereon.
Bank of Batavia v. New York, L. E. & W. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 822

7. A principal is estopped from denying his agent's representation as against a third person, where he has clothed the agent with power to do an act upon the existence of some extrinsic fact. Authorities cited. Id.

8. An assent to a change of grade of street by plaintiff when he was not the owner of the property will not bind him after he becomes such owner.

I. BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The burden of proving mental unsoundness is upon alleging party.
Pennypacker v. Pennypacker (Pa.) 532

2. If general or habitual unsoundness of mind be shown previous to the will, the burden of proving a lucid interval of restoration to sanity, at the time, is in turn thrown upon those who allege it. Id.

3. The burden of proving usury is on alleging party.
Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

II. DOCUMENTARY.

4. A transcript of proceedings in a court of another State, duly authenticated, except that the seal of the court is not impressed on wax, is admissible.
Hunt v. Hunt (N. J.) 462

5. A copy of a judgment roll of a court of another State, is not inadmissible because the seal to the attestation clause is without wax.
Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Davis (N. Y.) 686

6. Objections that copy of a judgment roll of a district court of Utah was not properly exemplified, not considered in the court of appeals because not raised at the trial. Id.

7. The Act of Congress of 1790, as to authentication of court records for evidence in any other State, does not exclude any other evidence.
Otto v. Trump (Pa.) 629

8. In an action upon a policy, for the value of goods burned, where plaintiff's books and most of his papers were destroyed by the same fire, an inventory by the seller of the goods, assisted by the plaintiff ten months before the fire, on the purchase of the goods by plaintiff, showing the prices, is admissible upon the value of the goods burned.
Ellsworth v. Ætna Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 244

9. The footings of another inventory, made by plaintiff a few days before the fire, of the stock of goods then on hand, are also admissible. Id.

10. A contract signed by competent parties is admissible in evidence, notwithstanding it is also signed by incompetent parties.
Kulp v. Bird (Pa.) 576

III. SECONDARY; LOST PAPERS.

11. Where the production of a paper cannot be compelled, secondary evidence may be given.
Otto v. Trump (Pa.) 629

12. Parol evidence is not admissible to prove the claim in a suit in a court of record of another State. Id.

13. An assignment of a judgment of another State may be proved by an examined copy sworn to by a competent witness. Id.

14. Secondary evidence is admissible to establish the execution of a paper where the subscribing witness is out of the jurisdiction of the court,—as, if he were dead. Authorities cited. Id. 631

15. Original entries of tradesmen may be given in evidence, when the clerk making them is out of the State, on proof of his handwriting. His absence out of the State has the same effect as his death. Authorities cited. Id.

16. Where proof is by a copy, an examined copy duly made and sworn to by a competent witness is always admissible. Authorities cited. Id.

17. Without proof of the notice to produce the original of a writing in possession of the opposite party given to him or his attorney, secondary evidence cannot be given.
De Baril v. Campoy y Pardo (Pa.) 642

18. That the opposite party is in a foreign country does not affect the application of the rule. Id.

19. The fact of agency cannot be proved by parol while the written evidence of it exists. Authorities cited. Id. 643

20. Where a power of attorney has been destroyed by fire, the person to whom the power was given may prove its contents. Authorities cited. Id.

21. A deposition going to prove the contents of a paper was rejected, because it was not shown that the paper was unobtainable. Authorities cited. Id. 644

22. A paper deposited in a court of equity by a party who has leave to withdraw it is sufficiently under his control to let in secondary evidence of its contents, after notice to produce it; but it is otherwise if the document is held by a stakeholder. Authorities cited. Id. 643

23. Proof that a paper is out of the State will not alone be sufficient foundation for secondary evidence. Authorities cited. Id. 644

24. In ejectment to recover possession of the underlying mineral ore, from the owner of the surface, the defendant claimed title to the ore under a release alleged to have been executed by a former owner of the mineral right to a former owner of the surface, nearly forty years before suit brought, and lost or destroyed. Held, that secondary evidence was properly rejected.
Phœnix Iron Co. v. Lewis (Pa.) 515

25. Where an action is upon a note under seal, and, after the introduction of evidence tending to prove its execution and loss, a paper alleged by the plaintiff to be a copy of it is, without exception, admitted in evidence as proof, not of its execution, but simply of its contents, an exception to binding instructions to the jury to find for defendant does not raise the question whether the court should have admitted the paper as a copy of a note the execution of which had been sufficiently proved to entitle it to go to the jury.

Cover v. Mishler (Pa.) 203

IV. Parol.

26. Parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or alter a written contract. Authorities cited.

Centenary M. E. Church v. Clime (Pa.) 889

28. When the record does not show the precise ground upon which the case was decided, parol evidence may be given.

Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 734

29. A resulting trust in lands may be proved by parol.

Jackson's Appeal (Pa.) 850

30. Parol evidence is admissible to ascertain the meaning of a written contract, where the matter is not mentioned therein.

Centenary M. E. Church v. Clime (Pa.) 886

31. In an action by a stone mason for erecting a building according to contract which does not specify the kind of stone to be used, the kind intended may be shown by parol evidence, and also that defendant furnished a harder kind. Id.

32. The circumstances attending the making of a written instrument may be proved by parol. Id.

33. In an action on a written contract relating to advertising charts, parol evidence is admissible to show material of which chart was to be made. Authorities cited. Id. 889

34. A deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to be a security for money advanced.

Pearson v. Sharp (Pa.) 494

V. Declarations; Res Gestæ.

35. Letters from the lender's agent to borrower's agent, found among the papers of the latter after his decease, their envelopes showing the dates of their passage through the post-office, in connection with letter press copies in the letter book of the writer, are admissible as part of the res gestæ.

Gaither v. Clarke (Md.) 438

36. In an action for personal injuries, evidence of a simple declaration of plaintiff after the injury, that he was suffering pain, is hearsay and not admissible.

Roche v. Brooklyn City etc. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 702

37. The declarations and acts of a man cannot be given in evidence to prove that he is the agent of another. Authorities cited.

De Baril v. Campoy y Pardo (Pa.) 643

38. It is competent in ejectment to prove declarations of both grantor and grantee as tending to show an intent to defraud plaintiff, a creditor of grantor.

Cope v. Kidney (Pa.) 866

39. Declarations of the president of a railroad, authorized to bind the corporation by contracts in the ordinary business, recognizing the contract as subsisting, and as to what should be done in the matter, are admissible.

Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Brydon (Md.) 396

40. Claims against a decedent's estate may be proved by oral evidence of declarations or admissions.

McCann's Appeal (Pa.) 847

VI. Dying Declarations.

41. The court may receive, in the presence of the jury, preliminary proof of the expectation of death, before deciding to admit dying declarations.

People v. Smith (N. Y.) 215

42. Where the trial court heard the whole statement of the dying declarations upon the preliminary issue and permitted a cross examination on the subject, and then decided upon their admissibility, and directed a portion of them to be read to the jury as evidence, and ordered the remainder to be struck out, and instructed the jury to disregard it, held, that that was not first admitting erroneous proof to go to the jury and then striking it out, and that no error was committed. Andrews and Peckham, JJ., dissent. Id.

43. The inquiry will remain in each case, under its own peculiar circumstances, how far the preliminary examination should extend in order to ascertain the mental condition and belief of the deceased, before admitting his dying declarations. Id.

VII. Confessions.

44. Where a magistrate tells a prisoner that it would be better for him to tell the truth and have no more trouble about it, the confession thus obtained is inadmissible in evidence, although he was told at the same time that the magistrate could make no promises.

Biscoe v. State (Md.) 416

45. Where the prisoner, before the confession is received, offers to prove that the magistrate held out inducements to him to confess, the court should permit him to do so. Id.

46. The preliminary question as to the admissibility of a confession should be decided by the court before it is permitted to go to the jury. Id.

VIII. Experts; Opinions.

47. Whether a deckload on a canal boat was properly covered so as to protect it from rain, is not a subject for expert testimony; it is a question for the jury.

Schwinger v. Raymond (N. Y.) 747

48. On appeal to the common pleas from a report of viewers assessing damages for a change of grade of street, the opinion of the viewers that the change was a damage, after having testified to an acquaintance with the value of such property and that they had viewed the premises, is admissible.
Freemansburg v. Rodgers (Pa.) 828

49. A question calling for an inference or opinion of a witness upon undisclosed facts should be excluded.
Pollock v. Morris (N. Y.) 752

IX. COMPETENCY, ETC.; EVIDENCE IN OTHER SUITS.

50. Proceedings in partition are relevant to show that defendant accepted a deed for the land named in such proceedings.
Hunt v. Hunt (N. J.) 462

51. Declarations made by counsel on a former occasion in the course of a trial, while urging the question of damages before a jury of condemnation of the property in question, are not admissible to prove malice on the part of defendant in order to enhance the damages.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Boyd (Md.) 435

52. Depositing a letter in the postoffice is prima facie evidence of its receipt.
Folsom v. Cook (Pa.) 585

53. Evidence that a letter was so sent, demanding payment of rent, is competent to rebut the allegation that no demand had been made. Id.

54. Evidence that others had fallen on the sidewalk, at the same place where plaintiff was injured, is admissible.
Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs (N. Y.) 44

55. A party cannot testify as to the motives or intent of another party.
Mfrs. & Traders Bank v. Koch (N. Y.) 672

56. Where the assumptions contained in a hypothetical question are not proved, the question is inadmissible.
Reber v. Herring (Pa.) 841

57. Where an offer of evidence as a whole includes irrelevant evidence, it is proper to refuse the whole offer.

SEE INSURANCE, 8; WILL, 1.

I. WHO ENTITLED TO ADMINISTER.

1. Upon the debtor's death a chattel mortgagee has no right to undertake to administer any part of the debtor's personal estate for the satisfaction of his own debt.
Heft's Appeal (Pa.) 592

2. Where the mortgagee in good faith ntervenes, and in administration of the estate sells the pledge and settles an account of the proceeds, he is entitled to commissions. Id.

II. ADMINISTRATOR D. B. N.

3. Where there is alleged to be a claim due the estate which the executor has not collected, the proper remedy is to have an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed appointed, who can proceed to collect the claim.
Re Estate of Soutter (N. Y.) 818

4. An administrator de bonis non appointed after the death of the executrix is bound by her contracts.
Buckland v. Gallup (N. Y.) 703

5. Where the executrix sold the testator's property and put a portion of the proceeds into the hands of an agent, the administrator de bonis non, appointed after her death, may sue in his own name. Id.

III. IN GENERAL; THE ESTATE.

6. When the duties imposed upon the executors are active, they will be deemed trustees for the performance thereof, to the same extent as though declared to be so by the most explicit language.
Ward v. Ward (N. Y.) 67

7. The orphans' court has power to determine the fairness of inventories; one method is by filing exceptions to it.
Pickel v. Alpaugh (N. J.) 471

8. Prior to testator's death the railroad company accumulated securities and other assets, from earnings over and above expenses and dividends, and some two months after testator's death it had on hand $1,102,000 as a sinking fund for the redemption of outstanding obligations; and at that time an arrangement was entered into between certain stockholders, among them the executors and a canal association, for the sale of their stock to the canal association for $250 for each share, and providing that the canal association should have the sinking fund, but that the stockholders should be paid a ratable portion of this surplus, which amounted to $15.74 per share. Held, that the price paid for the shares, although increased by this prospective advantage, belonged altogether to the remaindermen, and was properly carried to the principal and not income.
Re Kernochan (N. Y.) 90

9. Under a will empowering the executors to "receive the rents, interest and income," and to apply the net amounts thereof to the use of testator's widow during life, and after her death to divide the remaining estate among his heirs, a dividend declared upon railroad stock, assets of the estate, before testator's death, but payable after his death, belonged to the executors. Id.

10. A privilege to subscribe for, and take at par, one or more bonds or shares of stocks for a certain number of shares of stock before held by the estate, if accepted, operated as a change in the manner of investment of so much of the estate; and the value belonged to the estate and not to the life tenant. Id.

11. A court of equity, called upon to settle the equitable rights of the parties, may charge remaindermen with moneys expended for the benefit of the estate.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 800

IV. SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

12. If the estate is sufficient to pay decedent's debts the creditors cannot ask that a receiver be appointed to apply the rents and profits of the real estate to their payment.

McKaig v. James (Md.) 452

13. A general devise of lands in trust to executors, to sell and convey them, vests no title in the trustees. Authorities cited.
Chamberlain v. Taylor (N. Y.) 290

14. An equitable conversion of real estate does not authorize its sale for convenience of one executor without the co-operation of his coexecutor. Authorities cited. Id. 292

15. The power of the orphans' court to set aside a sale of real estate, made in pursuance of its own order, rests within the sound discretion of the court, and will not be reviewed unless the record shows palpable and gross abuse.
Frey's Appeal (Pa.) 154

16. Where a deed from executors apparently conferred the legal title under the power of sale contained in the will, the purchaser is under no responsibility for any misapplication by the executors.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 800

V. ACCOUNTING; COMMISSIONS.

17. Where testator was domiciled in New York and his will was proved there, and it does not appear that it was ever proved in New Jersey, the executors can not be required to come to an account in the latter State.
Cocks v. Varney (N. J.) 457

18. Where it was agreed that defendant should manage an estate in his hands for the interest of those concerned, and should not charge for his services, should make annual settlements and should pay no interest for balances in his hands, and a settlement was made on that basis, and defendant tendered a further settlement, held, that he should pay no interest up to the time of the settlement nor since, as he was always ready to pay the money to the complainant.
Barclay v. Cooper (N. J.) 132

19. Land bought in under foreclosure proceedings by the defendant in trust for himself and the others interested in joint mortgages which were foreclosed before the death of complainant's intestate, and which purchases were necessary to protect the interest of the holders of those mortgages and which land remains unsold, is to be regarded as real estate in the accounting of defendant with complainant of the personal estate of his intestate, who was interested in the mortgages. Id.

20. Land conveyed to defendant after the death of complainant's intestate, in satisfaction of a mortgage thereon given to defendant and complainant's intestate and others, in order to save the expense of foreclosure proceedings, which conveyance was taken by defendant in trust for those interested in the mortgage, must be regarded as personal property; and complainant is entitled to an account in respect thereto, and defendant to an allowance of taxes paid by him thereon. Id.

21. After a decree judicially settling the accounts of an executor a further accounting should not be ordered unless there are other matters not embraced in his former account for which he is responsible.
Re Estate of Soutter (N. Y.) 818

22. Where a trust is devolved upon executors by will, an error in the executors' account may be corrected by the orphans' court in their subsequent accounts as trustees.
Griggs v. Shaw (N. J.) 472

23. The functions of an administrator end after his final accounting and the payment of the balance in his hands to the persons entitled thereto.
Rogers v. Traphagen (N. J.) 476

24. In the absence of bad faith on the part of an administrator making payment, he should be allowed the benefit of disbursements which would clearly have been sanctioned by a court of equity had the administrator occupied the position of guardian. Id.

25. Personalty which a testator gave his wife absolutely was during her life treated as given for life only, and was retained by his executor, in good faith, who had rendered valuable services to the estate. Held, that he was entitled to commissions and a counsel fee.
Miller v. Rhein (Pa.) 493

26. Where executors' commissions were too large, in a not final account, it is competent for the court, without notice, and ex proprio motu, to take such error in the allowance of commissions into account when fixing the commissions in a subsequent account.
Griggs v. Shaw (N. J.) 472

27. Under a provision in a will in these words: "It is my request that all persons herein named as executors will consent to act as such executors and trustees; and that each executor and trustee, other than my wife, do also receive and take the full rate and commissions provided by law for each executor, intending thus to provide suitable compensation for their services in addition to the duties herein devolved upon them." the intention of the testator was to exclude his wife from compensation.
Re Kernochan (N. Y.) 90

VI. CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATE; PAYMENT; LIEN.

28. An executor paying out of his own money preferred debts of testator is entitled to be reimbursed out of funds of estate in the hands of a subsequent administrator appointed on his removal, in preference to an unpreferred claim against the executor, the estate being insolvent.
Chamberlin v. McDowell (N. J.) 472

29. A creditor of a decedent brought suit in equity for amount due him without having filed his claim with executors or established it at law, they having recognized the claim by payment thereon, held, a preliminary injunction issued to restrain collection of alleged fraudulent claim from property of deceased, will not be dissolved on motion before final hearing.

Emson v. Ivins (N. J.) 373

30. In an action by a residuary legatee to set aside an assignment of a claim due estate the plaintiff is entitled to prove the inadequacy of the consideration therefor.
Diffendarfer v. Dicks (N. Y.) 741

31. Where the administrator sold a claim due the estate of more than $5,000 for $273, in an action to set aside the sale for fraud, the fullest inquiry as to the facts should be permitted. Id.

32. Evidence as to what the books of the debtor and creditor show is admissible. Id.

33. The filing of a bill not verified by oath, against an executrix, for a discovery of trust funds and to follow them into certain land, is not a presentation of the claim for such funds in the form contemplated by the statute.
Robins v. Arnold (N. J.) 121

34. A creditor whose claim was not duly presented cannot receive a dividend thereon with the other creditors complying with the order of the orphans' court. Id.

35. Claims against a decedent's estate may be proved by oral evidence of declarations or admissions.
McCann's Appeal (Pa.) 847

36. Nothing less than clear and undoubted evidence should extend the lien of debts against the real estate of a decedent.
Welsh's Appeal (Pa.) 498

37. Conversations between an administrator d. b. n. and the widow and heirs, held, too indefinite to amount to a waiver of the limitation of the Act of February 24, 1834. Id.

38. The presentation by a creditor of his claim before an auditor making distribution under a previous sale, and the receipt of a dividend, do not continue the lien. Authorities cited. Id. 499

39. If five years expire between the time when a sale is ordered by the orphans' court and the day of sale, the lien of an estate creditor is gone as against the heirs. Authorities cited. Id.

40. Creditors of a decedent do not become the owners of the personal estate of their debtor so as to prevent the plea of the Statute of Limitations as against their debt. Authorities cited.
Heft's Appeal (Pa.) 598

41. Unless the mortgage lien is complete at debtor's death, priority cannot be claimed over other judgment creditors. Authorities cited. Id.

42. In an action against executors to recover for goods, etc., furnished to their testator, held, that a too general instruction that plaintiff was entitled to recover if the jury should find the account to be established, and admitted by the testator within three years before suit brought, was cured by a subsequent instruction that plaintiff could not recover unless the jury should also find that such admission applied to the account in suit.
Shipley v. Shilling (Md.) 418

VII. ACTIONS; COSTS.

43. A suit in equity cannot be maintained by an executor to recover the value of trees cut from the realty belonging to the estate; the remedy is at law.
Lippincott v. Barton (N. J.) 920

44. A bill asking relief against all defendants as executors, and relief against one of defendants as mortgagee of trust property with notice of the trust, is multifarious.
Cocks v. Varney (N. J.) 457

45. If an injury to the property of a decedent, or its conversion, happens after his death, the executor or administrator may sue in his own name.
Buckland v. Gallup (N. Y.) 703

46. Only such causes of action accruing during decedent's lifetime need be prosecuted by his executors or administrators in their representative capacity. Id.

47. Where the complaint by one as executor shows a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff in his individual character, descriptive words therein, such as "executor," etc., may be rejected, leaving the action to stand as one in the individual capacity of the plaintiff.
Litchfield v. Flint (N. Y.) 41

48. The court of appeals may substitute an administratrix in certiorari to review the action of municipal authorities in removing the relator from office, where, in the relator's lifetime, the proceeding was affirmed and certiorari quashed at special term, with costs, and the order of special term was affirmed at general term, with costs, and the relator's estate is liable for such costs.
People v. Brooklyn (N. Y.) 927

49. Under Code, § 3246, in an action by an executor, in his representative capacity, costs may be awarded against him as executor.
Syms v. New York (N. Y.) 225

50. A judgment for costs against an executor in his representative capacity, should not contain a provision that execution issue for such costs. Id.

51. Where a plaintiff sues as an administrator, but might have sued in his own name, he is personally liable to pay costs.
Buckland v. Gallup (N. Y.) 703

52. Merely describing himself as administrator will not relieve him from costs. Id.

53. Where a bill is filed by an administrator for an account of decedent's interest in an estate, and for a discovery of personal property, held by defendant, and to restrain him from expending that property in improvements upon the joint real estate, and it appears that defendant had made several settlements and paid the balance found due from him thereon and offered to make a further settlement which was refused, and that complainant could have got all the information he desired as to the property by inquiring of defendant, who had not refused to give it, and that defendant did not contemplate any expenditures upon the joint real estate, except those which he was constrained to make by the municipal authorities, held, that defendant should not be required to pay the costs of the suit.

Barclay v. Cooper (N. J.) 132

54. In assumpsit by an executor for purchase money of land conveyed by testator to his son, the question whether the son was to have the land partly as a gift is for the jury.
Horn v. Buck (Pa.) 509

VIII. BONDS.

55. To maintain an action on an administration bond it is not necessary to push the administrator to insolvency.
Kauffman v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 539

56. A judgment at law or a decree of the orphans' court ascertaining the amount of the personal responsibility of the administrator to the particular creditor suing is a sufficient prerequisite to maintain an action on his bond. Id.

57. Notice by a surety in an administration bond before adjudication to creditors of the estate, that the administratrix is wasting the estate and that all claims against the estate must be pushed at once or he will not be responsible for losses, is ineffectual to relieve him from liability to such creditors. Id.

58. An administration bond is not within the provisions of the Act of May 14, 1874. Id.

FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

I. FRAUD; IN GENERAL; UNDUE INFLUENCE.
II. FRAUD UPON CREDITORS.

BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See CHARTER-PARTY; EQUITY, II.; JUDGMENT, 15, 16; LANDLORD AND TENANT, 11.

I. FRAUD; IN GENERAL; UNDUE INFLUENCE.

1. An unconditional assignment and transfer by delivery, of all her estate, by an aged person of weak mind, to those who live with her, reserving only the interest on a few small sums of money and taking no voucher for such reservation, is void in law, unless shown to be free from undue influence.
Morton's Admr. v. Morton (N. J.) 134

2. When, at the time of an assignment of all of her real estate by an aged person of weak mind the persons to whom it was made held a power of attorney from her, enabling them to take charge of her affairs, and had obtained from her absolute possession of all her estate, they were trustees for her; and the law will hold them to the strictest account for the property, and the assignment will be held void. Id.

3. A conveyance of a farm worth $2,200, by a man seventy-seven years old, and weak in body and mind, to his son-in-law, in consideration of a promise, afterward fulfilled, on the part of the latter to take care of the grantor as long as he lived and to bury him, will not, in the absence of positive proof of fraud or duress, upon grantor's death within a year after conveyance, be set aside at the instance of his heirs.
Travis v. Lowry (Pa.) 553

4. Whenever there is a great weakness of mind in grantor, although not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration given is grossly inadequate, equity will set aside the conveyance. Authorities cited. Id. 556

5. In a suit to set aside an assignment to defendant of a bond and mortgage, made by complainant when he was weak in body and mind, in consideration of an agreement by defendant to maintain him and provide a home for him during his life, which agreement defendant refused to perform—held, the assignment was fraudulently obtained, and that the same be set aside, and that complainant credit defendant for board, etc., furnished.
White v. Borden (N. J.) 124

6. The failure to inform of the existence of a fact is not a fraud, unless there was some legal duty to make the disclosure.
Wood v. Amory (N. Y.) 760

7. No trust to disclose such fact can be supposed in the case of adverse parties to a contested lawsuit, as to facts connected with the amount of the judgment. Id.

8. Where one of the joint owners of land obtains the signature of the other owners to a deed thereof by fraud, and also by misrepresentations induced grantee to believe that he represented the other owners, the deed will be set aside.

Dunnington v. Hubbard (Md.) 887

9. In an action to recover back the price paid for certain shares of stock on the ground of misrepresentations, the question whether plaintiff rescinded by tendering back the stock without conditions is for the jury.
Bridge v. Penniman (N. Y.) 732

10. The referee having found as a fact that plaintiff did not make an unconditional tender, the judgment dismissing the complaint will be affirmed. Id.

11. Where the administrator sold a claim due the estate of more than $5,000 for $273, in an action to set aside the sale for fraud, the fullest inquiry as to the facts should be permitted.
Diffendarfer v. Dicks (N. Y.) 741

12. In an action by a residuary legatee to set aside an assignment of a claim due the estate, the plaintiff is entitled to prove the inadequacy of the consideration therefor. Id.

13. Evidence as to what the books of the debtor and creditor show is admissible. Id.

14. A question of motive or intent is always one of fact for the jury.
Baltimore etc. R. R. Co. v. Brydon (Md.) 396

II. FRAUD UPON CREDITORS.

15. A voluntary conveyance to a child by a father who is indebted at the time is not ipso facto fraudulent and void.
Close v. Benjamin (Pa.) 541

16. If the grantor had other property at the time, or was otherwise of sufficient ability to pay all his debts, it is for the jury to say whether there was any design to defraud creditors; and if there was not, the conveyance is valid. Id.

17. A sale, by partners to a copartner, of partnership property, conceived in fraud, and carried through by fraudulent representation on vendee's part will, at the suit of a firm creditor, be declared void; and where the property sold has been converted into money, the proceeds must be accounted for.
Hagerman v. Farr (N. J.) 116

18. It is fraud upon firm creditors for a partner to take firm property and apply it upon his individual debts, or for the firm to take firm property and apply it upon the debts of any member.
Saunders v. Reilly (N. Y.) 62

19. Evidence that an amicable ejectment between vendor and vendee was for the purpose of hindering a judgment creditor of vendee from reaching the property, and that the payments of rent by vendee were to apply on the purchase money, should have been submitted to the jury; and if such intent was found to exist, the transaction would be void.
Miles v. Lewis (Pa.) 862

20. Vendee's testimony as to such intent was competent. Id.

21. Judgment creditors cannot complain that plaintiff in an amicable action and confession of judgment in ejectment allowed the time given for payment of the money to expire before filing the confession of judgment in the court. Authorities cited. Id. 865

22. A party cannot testify as to the motives or intent of another party.
Mfrs. & Traders Bank v. Koch (N. Y.) 672

23. Plaintiff has the right to give in evidence all the facts regarding his alleged purchase, to show that it was bona fide and for full value, notwithstanding that question had once been determined in a prior suit to which the plaintiff was not a party.
Snyder v. Berger (Pa.) 595

24. It is competent, in ejectment, to prove declarations of both grantor and grantee as tending to show an intent to defraud plaintiff, a creditor of grantor.
Cope v. Kidney (Pa.) 866

25. The burden is upon a judgment creditor to set aside an assignment made by his debtor for fraud.
Crook v. Rindskopf (N. Y.) 727

26. Although an assignment transferred all the property of the assignor, it may have been a fraudulent contrivance to embarrass or delay creditors, but this was a question for the jury.
Bagley v. Bowe (N. Y.) 253

27. Whether a sale was fraudulent as to a creditor of the seller was a question for the jury on the facts.
Snyder v. Berger (Pa.) 595

28. To authorize the judge to take from the jury the question of fraudulent intent arising upon the extrinsic facts and direct a verdict, the evidence must be undisputed.
Bagley v. Bowe (N. Y.) 253

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

1. To take a parol sale of land out of the statute, the purchaser must take possession under the sale.
Birkbeck v. Kelly (Pa.) 890

2. Possession by the purchaser at time of sale defeats his title. Id.

3. Where the consideration for sale of land is the conveyance of other lands by vendee to a third person, and the latter deed is duly executed and delivered, the promise of the third person to the vendor, to pay him a certain sum as the consideration for the conveyance of the latter land, is not within the Statute of Frauds, and need not be in writing.

2. Donatio mortis causa defined. Id. 165

3. Proof that land conveyed to a married woman was bought with her husband's money raises a presumption of a gift to her.
Jones v. Bland (Pa.) 859

4. In assumpsit by an executor for purchase money of land conveyed by testator to his son, the question whether the son was to have the land partly as a gift is for the jury.
Horn v. Buck (Pa.) 509

5. A sick husband agreed with his wife to divide the household goods and separate. He went to his father's house, and the father took away the son's part of the furniture. A few days afterward the son died. The wife, as his administratrix, brought trover against the father for the furniture. The defense was that the son had given the furniture to his father in consideration of the latter's promise to pay the funeral expenses, and that the promise had been fulfilled. Held, the question whether the furniture had been so given was for the jury.
Flanigan v. Flanigan (Pa.) 483

6. In a feigned issue to try the ownership of a promissory note of a third person, claimed to have been delivered by a decedent as a gift to the holder, the question of undue influence is for the jury to determine.

GUARANTY.

1. A national bank executed a bond to secure deposits by the obligee, a savings bank. Certain individuals indorsed on the bond: "In consideration of the making of the deposits mentioned in the foregoing agreement, we each and severally guaranty the performance of the foregoing contract by the" national bank; a similar bond between the same banks, in force for some time, was surrendered on the execution of the new bond; after the giving of the new bond the national bank failed, having funds of the savings bank on deposit, the date of the last deposit being prior to the execution of the new bond. Held: (a) The new bond was intended as a substitute for the old one. (b) That the surrender of the old bond was a good consideration for the new bond and also for the guaranty, and that it was immaterial whether the guarantors knew or did not know that the surrender of the old bond was in the contemplation of the parties when they became guarantors.
Erie Co. Sav. Bank v. Coit (N. Y.) 39

2. Where a contract of guaranty is entered into concurrently with the principal obligation, a consideration which supports the principal contract supports the subsidiary one also; and the consideration may be shown by parol. Authorities cited. Id. 41

3. In an action on a joint and several guaranty it is no defense to show that there are other persons liable for the whole or a portion of the same debt claimed of the defendants, or that such persons are not made parties to the action.
People v. Lee (N. Y.) 35

4. Guaranties are to be interpreted and enforced according to the meaning and intent, and in the manner designed by the parties at their execution, giving due effect to every part of the same. Authorities cited. Id. 38

5. Where an indorser of a note transferred it, but is still liable thereon as indorser, and makes an agreement for valuable consideration with a third person to pay the note, the transferee and holder of the note may maintain an action against such third person to enforce payment of the note.

Litchfield v. Flint (N. Y.) 41

6. The legal obligation of the promisee to the holder of the note creates a privity by substitution with the promisor. Id.

7. Where such note is subsequently retransferred to the indorser, the latter, having fulfilled such agreement on his part, may maintain an action against such third person to enforce payment. Id.

GUARDIAN AND WARD. See INFANTS; PARENT AND CHILD.

1. The appointment of a guardian over a child whose legal domicil is in another State, who has a guardian appointed under the laws of that State, does not deprive the court of the power in its discretion to decree the custody of the child to a foreign guardian. Authorities cited.
People v. Allen (N. Y.) 81

2. Where the maternal grandmother of a minor under fourteen years old petitions for a guardian of the estate to which the petitioner alleges the minor is entitled, and the minor's father answers denying the same, the proper practice is to take testimony to determine the truth of the respective allegations; but a decree appointing a fit person guardian on petition and answer will not be reversed.
Seff's Appeal (Pa.) 894

3. A decree appointing a guardian may be amended by limiting the guardianship to the estate, although the father of the minor has meanwhile filed an appeal from the decree. Id.

4. A general guardian may employ an attorney to obtain possession of the ward's lands, and make an agreement to pay such attorney a certain portion of the property recovered.
Re Hynes (N. Y.) 682

5. An agreement by a general guardian to pay an attorney, in consideration of his services in attempting to recover possession of the ward's lands, one third of the value of all property recovered, is valid. Ruger, Ch. J., and Earl, J., dissent. Id.

6. Under said agreement, the attorney was entitled to his stipulated share in funds arising from the sale of lands of the deceased father of the infants in another State, for which notes were given. Id.

7. The fee of counsel employed by a third person to assist such attorney in litigation to recover said real estate should not be deducted from the amount to be paid to said attorney under said agreement. Id.

8. A general guardian has a right to the possession of his ward's land and to the receipt of rents and profits thereof, and can maintain ejectment to recover possession of such land. Authorities cited. Id. 683

9. A grandfather, the guardian of an infant grandchild who lives in his family from childhood to death and is unable to work, is entitled to compensation out of the estate for support.
Wildoner's Appeal (Pa.) 911

10. Under Act of 1868, chap. 278, it is irregular for a guardian to file a bill in his own name as guardian for the sale of his ward's real estate; such irregularity does not deprive the court of jurisdiction when the infant is a party defendant, and answers by guardian appointed by the court.
Newbold v. Schlens (Md.) 449

11. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the proper parties, its decree is binding upon all the parties interested, notwithstanding such irregularity. Id.

12. On appeal from an order overruling exceptions to the sale, taken by the purchaser, it is immaterial whether there is evidence in the case upon which the court below could have reasonably concluded that it would be to the advantage of all parties concerned that the property should be sold. Id.

13. Even if the decree could be reversed, a purchaser in good faith under it, while it was subsisting and binding the parties thereto, will not be affected by such reversal. Id.

14. A surety of a guardian paying a judgment in the orphans' court against his principal may file a bill to compel his cosurety to pay one half thereof, without first obtaining a judgment at law against him.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Relator and defendant were married in Illinois where they resided and had children; relator obtained in that State, a final decree dissolving the marriage and awarding her the custody of the children. Thereafter she sued out habeas corpus in New York, where defendant had taken the children, to obtain the custody of them. The court below awarded the custody of the children to her. Held, that defendant's appeal should be dismissed, as the court below exercised its discretion upon the facts and did not give the Illinois decree the force of an estoppel.

HOMICIDE.

1. Where the identity of the prisoner and the person who committed the crime is in question, no matter how slight may be the inference of identity to be drawn from any single fact, it is admissible as a fragment of the material from which the induction is to be made.
Johnson v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 608

2. Where it is in evidence that the man who committed the crime wore a certain coat, evidence is admissible to prove that such a coat was given to the prisoner before the crime, and was afterwards found in a house which he robbed, taking instead a coat belonging to the owner of the house. Id.

3. Where the prisoner is told by the district attorney to repeat sentences, and he does so without objection, the purpose being to afford a witness then on the stand an opportunity of seeing the prisoner and hearing the sound of his voice so as to testify more intelligently whether he was the man who used the words at the time of the murder, this court has no power to review the action of the court below. Id.

4. Where the prisoner's doings are accounted for except during a few hours before and after the murder, it is not error to say to the jury: "He has not been able to tell us where he was that night; that is the unfortunate part of his case." Id.

5. On a trial for murder, the action of the officers in seeking for the prisoner after the crime was committed is admissible to show the flight of the prisoner.
People v. Ogle (N. Y.) 49

6. The district attorney, upon the cross examination of the prisoner, may ask him if he had been arrested for shooting a man, where his counsel had already proved the same fact by another witness. Id.

7. It is competent to show that the prisoner had made previous threats or attempted to kill his victim. Authorities cited.
People v. O'Sullivan (N. Y.) 57

8. The court may receive, in the presence of the jury, preliminary proof of the expectation of death, before deciding to admit the dying declarations.
People v. Smith (N. Y.) 215

9. The inquiry will remain in each case, under its own peculiar circumstances, how far the preliminary examination should extend in order to ascertain the mental condition and belief of the deceased, before admitting his dying declarations. Id.

10. Where the trial court heard the whole statement of the dying declarations upon the preliminary issue, and permitted a cross examination on the subject, and then decided upon their admissibility and directed a portion of them to be read to the jury as evidence, and ordered the remainder to be struck out and instructed the jury to disregard it, held, that that was not first admitting erroneous proof to go to the jury and then striking it out, and that no error was committed. Andrews and Peckham, JJ., dissent. Id.

11. Dying declarations relating to transactions prior to homicide and not part of the res gestæ, are not admissible. Authorities cited. Dis. Op. Id. 220

12. A mere expression of opinion as to the prisoner's guilt, by the judge in his charge to the jury, is not, if warranted by the evidence, ground for reversal.
Johnson v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 608

13. The right of the supreme court to review proceedings on error is limited to matters of record. Id.

14. The exercise of that discretion by the trial court, in acquiring the needed information, is reviewable by the general term, but not by this court, unless such discretion was abused.

I. MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS; ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS.

1. In the absence of proof of fraud or concealment a widow cannot avoid an antenuptial settlement.
Smith's Appeal (Pa.) 141

2. A subsequent increase in the value of the husband's property does not affect the validity of a settlement. Id.

3. It is not essential that the settlement should be recorded and delivered to the trustee named therein. Id.

4. A widower, fifty-two years of age, with six children, and worth about $75,000, married a woman forty-three years old, who had no property. In an antenuptial settlement, she released, in consideration of real estate producing $1,200 a year, all her interest in his estate. The deed of settlement remained in the husband's possession and was never recorded. He died worth about $400,000. In addition to the real estate settled he bequeathed to her the interest of $15,000 for life; the residue of his estate he gave to his children. Held, the settlement was valid and binding upon the wife. Id.

5. A presumption of fraud or concealment does not arise under circumstances in which the disproportion of the wife's provision to the husband's means might well have been intended by the parties. Id.

6. A deed in pursuance of an antenuptial contract conveyed land from the husband to a third party for the use and purpose mentioned in the contract, by which the husband in effect agreed to vest in his wife a life estate in the south half of the land, in case she survived him, with the remainder in fee to his heirs, and in the same contingency to vest in her an estate in the other half during two minorities of his children, with remainder in fee to such children, etc. Held, such deed was a mere conveyance to the use of the beneficiaries named.
Helck v. Reinheimer (N. Y.) 743

7. A promise by one to his intended wife; that all he had or might have was to be hers, is not sufficient consideration for a deed to her fourteen years after marriage and after he had failed.
Neilson v. Williams (N. J.) 869

II. HUSBAND.

8. A husband undertaking to be bound for the commissions of a broker for effecting the sale of real estate of his wife is personally bound, whether he disclosed his agency for his wife or not.
Jarvis v Schaefer (N. Y.) 675

9. When the trustee is the husband of the cestui que trust, nothing short of clear and satisfactory proof will establish that the obligation of the former to the latter has been discharged or forgiven.
Rusling v. Rusling's Exrs. (N. J.) 129

10. The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to such trusts. Id.

III. WIFE; CONTRACTS; SEPARATE ESTATE; TORTS.

11. A married woman cannot contract in the District of Columbia as a sole trader.
Hitchcock v. Richold (D. C.) 352

12. A married woman living with her husband carried on business on her own account and with her separate estate. For the purpose of keeping up her stock she bought a quantity of goods of plaintiff, giving her promissory note in payment. Held, plaintiff could not recover, this not being a contract having relation to the defendant's separate estate within the Married Woman's Act. MacArthur, J., dissents. Id.

13. Where a wife claiming in sheriff's interpleader relies for her title on desertion by her husband, and her subsequent acquisition of the property under the Act of May 4, 1855, the question of desertion is for the jury.
Bernhart v. Mitchell (Pa.) 562

14. Property acquired in carrying on a business by a married woman, whose husband neglects or refuses to provide for her, is, under the Act of 1855, not liable to execution for her husband's debts. Id.

15. In an action to obtain possession of land bought at an execution sale, where the wife of the execution debtor claimed the property as her separate estate, which claim was alleged by the plaintiff to be fraudulent, held, that evidence by defendants, the execution debtor and his wife, to show that before the plaintiff had become a creditor, the debtor had assigned the property to his wife, should have been admitted,—it appearing that the property had been acquired with the wife's money.
Heath v. Slocum (Pa.) 643

16. If the husband had possession of the wife's money and used it in the purchase of the property, it would support the wife's title.
Heath v. Slocum (Pa.) 648

17. Where a woman paid her money for land and accepted a conveyance thereof to herself and another, as her husband, in the belief that she was the legal wife of such other, and that in case she should survive him the property should be wholly hers, and she learns after his death that when he married her he had a wife living, she can maintain a suit against the latter and her children to obtain a decree assuring the complainant the title to the whole of the property.
Gebel v. Weiss (N. J.) 126

18. In such case she is competent to prove that her money was used in the purchase and improvement of the property. Id.

19. The deed itself is evidence of an agreement that she should be sole owner of the property in case she should survive him, and such agreement may be effectuated in equity. Id.

20. A note by a married woman to a firm of which her husband is a member is void at law.
Nat. Bank of Rahway v. Brewster (N. J.) 482

21. Where the wife loaned money to her husband's firm upon their promissory note, in order to recover the money after his default, she must have recourse to equity. Authorities cited. Id. 482

22. A wife has no estate in the lands of her husband during his life which she may convey to another.
Witthaus v. Schack (N. Y.) 257

23. The property of the wife of a partner cannot be charged with moneys drawn by the husband from the firm's funds with knowledge of the other partner, and used in improving her property.
Sharp v. Hibbins (N. J.) 919

24. A married woman residing with her husband does not thereby render herself liable for rent.
Sanford v. Pollock (N. Y.) 821

25. The husband's statement of a right to sign for his wife is no evidence of his authority to bind her. Id.

26. That the wife subsequently resided on the premises is no evidence of her husband's authority to hire as her agent. Id.

27. Where the record of a former judgment shows that the justice had jurisdiction, the liability of one of defendants, a married woman, cannot be retried on a scire facias.
Weber v. Detwiller (Pa.) 833

28. For a tort committed by a married woman, the husband and wife are jointly liable.
Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Heil (Pa.) 179

29. When a tort is committed by the wife she is personally liable, unless her husband is both present and directs the doing of it at the time; his presence furnishes evidence and raises presumption of direction, but is not conclusive. Authorities cited. Id. 182

IV. DEALINGS AND TRANSACTIONS BY AND BETWEEN.

30. A mortgage executed by a married woman, her husband not joining therein, held, on the facts, without vitality, being without consideration, and executed only to protect the property from a dissipated husband.
Heller v. Groves (N. J.) 139

31. The grantee in a deed from husband and wife, of the husband's land, derives title through the husband wholly; and the widow of such grantor, bringing suit to annul the deed so far as it affects her dower right, is, under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 829, incompetent to testify to communications between herself and her deceased husband, in reference to such deed.
Witthaus v. Schack (N. Y.) 257

32. The joinder of a married woman with her husband in a deed or mortgage of his land inures simply as a release to the grantee of her future contingent right of dower in the premises. Authorities cited. Id. 259

33. The object of uniting the wife with the husband in conveyance of his land to a third person is to extinguish her inchoate right of dower. Authorities cited. Id.

34. Proof that land conveyed to a married woman was bought with her husband's money raises a presumption of a gift to her.
Jones v. Bland (Pa.) 859

35. Possession of a wife's chattels by her husband, held, not to amount to a transfer of the title from her to him.
Perry's Appeal (Pa.) 164

36. An offer seeking to introduce the opinion of a third person to whom the debtor had transferred the land, and who in turn transferred to the wife, as to the purpose of the transfers was properly refused.
Heath v. Slocum (Pa.) 648

37. The original deed to the husband and the assignment were admissible in evidence. Id.

38. Where the contract provided that if the wife died before the husband, without issue, the land was to be conveyed back to the husband, upon her death the deed ceased to have any operation.
Helck v. Reinheimer (N. Y.) 743

V. SEPARATION.

39. A husband agreed with his wife to divide the household goods and separate. He went to his father's house and the father took away the son's part of the furniture. A few days afterward the son died. The wife as his administratrix brought trover against the father for the furniture. The defense was that the son had given the furniture to his father in consideration of the latter's promise to pay the funeral expenses, and that the promise had been fulfilled. Held, the question whether the furniture had been so given was for the jury.
Flanigan v. Flanigan (Pa.) 483

VI. DIVORCE.

40. A wife who, after obtaining in the quarter sessions an order against her husband for support on the ground of his desertion, persistently refuses, for the period of two years, his request to leave her parents' house and live with him, is guilty of desertion; and the husband is entitled to a divorce.
Bauder's Appeal (Pa.) 199

41. The record of the proceeding in the court of quarter sessions is not a bar to the divorce. Id.

42. Adultery must ordinarily be established by circumstantial evidence.
Pfisterer v. Pfisterer (Md.) 414

43. Every such case must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances. Id.

44. On the facts in the case, held, that defendant was guilty of adultery as charged in the petition.
Reading v. Reading (N. J.) 120

45. The law will not charge a husband with condonation because he takes time to consider whether the allegations against his wife are likely to be sustained. Id.

46. Where complainant is entitled to a decree on the ground of adultery, the court cannot grant the divorce on the ground of cruelty and desertion set up in defendant's answer.
Osborne v. Osborne (N. J.) 123

47. Relator and defendant were married in Illinois where they resided and had children; relator obtained in that State a final decree dissolving marriage and awarding her the custody of the children. Thereafter she sued out habeas corpus in New York, where defendant had taken the children, to obtain the custody of them. The court below awarded the custody of the children to her. Held, that defendant's appeal should be dismissed as the court below exercised its discretion upon the facts and did not give the Illinois decree the force of an estoppel.
People v. Allen (N. Y.) 78

48. A decree of a tribunal as to the custody of the children is never final. Authorities cited. Id. 81

INSURANCE.

I. FIRE.
II. LIFE.
BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See BENEFIT SOCIETIES.

I. FIRE.

1. Where the company's agent allows an insurance broker to take the insurance and pay therefor when it suits his convenience, a notice of cancellation under a proviso in the policy reserving to the company the right to return the unexpired premium prorata at any time, with effect of cancelling policy, is effectual without returning part of the premium, where the premium had not in fact been paid to the company.

Stone v. Franklin Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 749

2. An insurance broker, held, so far the agent of the assured that notice to him of the cancellation of the policy was notice to the assured. Id.

3. In an action upon policy for the value of goods burned, where plaintiff's books and most of his papers were destroyed by the same fire, an inventory by the seller of the goods, assisted by the plaintiff, ten months before the fire, on the purchase of the goods by plaintiff, showing the prices, is admissible upon the value of the goods burned.
Ellsworth v. Ætna Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 244

4. The footings of another inventory made by plaintiff a few days before the fire, of the stock of goods then on hand, are also admissible. Id.

II. LIFE.

5. An insurable interest in the life of another arises from the relation of the party taking the insurance to the insured, so that from the relation thus established there may be some expectation of benefit or advantage in the continuance of the assured life.
Keystone Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Norris (Pa.) 204

6. A policy issued by a prearranged plan to one who assigns it to a third person having no insurable interest in the insured, the latter paying all the premiums, is void, notwithstanding the one to whom the policy was issued had such an interest. Id.

7. The sum insured by a policy of insurance on the life of a debtor must not be disproportionate to the interest the holder of the policy has in the life insured.
Grant v. Kline (Pa.) 626

8. A creditor for $802 took out a policy for $3,000 on the life of his debtor who was sixty-five years old. He had insured the debtor's life twice before and had paid the premiums, but abandoned the policies on account of the insolvency of the companies. He paid premiums on the last policy to the amount of $293. The insured died within a year. Held, there was no disproportion of which the debtor's administrators could take advantage. Id.

9. In construing a contract between an insurance company and a policy holder, the construction not involving a forfeiture is preferred by the court.
Holly v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 263

10. This rule is applicable only where the words used in a policy leave the meaning in doubt. Id.

11. Where, after the premium was due, the company, at the request of the policy holder, postponed its payment, upon the giving by the latter, of his note for the same, containing the condition that if he failed to pay the note at maturity he should thereby immediately forfeit all claims to further insurance, and the company gave its receipt with similar condition, held, that by failing to pay such note when due the forfeiture attached. Id.

12. Although a policy contained a promise by the company that upon its surrender within thirty days after the unpaid premium should be due the company could in exchange issue a paid up policy for the amount of premium received upon it, and although the policy holder offered to pay the note twelve days after it became due, he could not compel the company to give a paid up policy for the amount of premiums paid by him previous to the time when the one fell due for which he gave the note. Id.

13. Punctuality in the payment of premiums is the very essence of the contract; and when payment is not made at the time, the company has the right to forfeit if such was the contract. Authorities cited. Id. 265

14. An action instituted in a court having no jurisdiction of the defendant will not suspend the running of a condition of limitation in a policy of insurance.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

1. Under Act of March 31, 1860, and the Local Act of May 1, 1861, a county to which the latter Act applies is liable to a justice of the peace for all the costs, except those of prosecutor and defendant of a criminal proceeding before him.

Codding v. Bradford Co. (Pa.) 869

2. Under Act of 1861, the sentence by the justice has the full effect and force of a sentence by the court of quarter sessions. Id.

3. A statute giving power to a magistrate to examine such witnesses as should be produced before him authorizes him to use subpœnas to such witnesses and to compel their attendance by the usual process of the court.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. See HUSBAND AND WIFE, 24–26; LICENSE, 2, 3; USE AND OCCUPATION.

1. A demise of coal under the surface of a specified piece of land is a sale of the coal.
Fairchild v. Fairchild (Pa.) 878

2. A lease of coal lands, in which lessee agrees, in case the quantity mined falls short of a certain minimum quantity in any year to pay the same rent as if he had mined such quantity, provided that if he in any year mined more than such quantity, such excess, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be set off against the deficiency of any other year, permits mining in excess of that quantity in any year, and an application of that excess to the rent otherwise unearned but still due in subsequent years when there happens to be a deficiency in production. Ruger, Ch. J., and Rapallo, J., dissent.
McIntyre v. McIntyre Coal Co. (N. Y.) 335

3. The deficiency need not have occurred before the excess is produced; the lessee may apply the excess upon the deficiency of any other years. Id.

4. A covenant to work the mine continuously can not be inferred from an agreement to carry on the mining operations in a safe, skillful, and workmanlike manner, the lease providing a penalty for omitting to do so. Id.

5. A lease, "from the first day of December, 1878, at the rent of $600 per annum, payable monthly when due," with a provision that if the lessee shall continue on the premises "after the termination of the contract, then this contract is to continue in full force for another year, and so on from year to year until legal notice shall be given for a removal," followed by a clause that if the lessee shall continue on the premises "after the termination of the above contract, then he shall have the privilege of staying another five years, at the above fixed rent per annum,"—is a lease for one year with the option of continuing from year to year for five more years.
Jones v. Kroll (Pa.) 877

6. A lease for no determinate length of time but by which an annual rent is reserved, payable in any aliquot proportions, is a lease for a year. Authorities cited. Id. 879

7. A demise for monthly or weekly rent affords a presumption of a monthly or weekly tenancy. Authorities cited. Id.

8. A lease by the City of New York in 1810, demising lands for thirty years, containing an agreement that the city, at the expiration of the term, would demise the premises to lessee, his assigns, etc., for twenty-one years thereafter, with a like covenant for future renewals, should not be so construed as to create a perpetuity.
Syms v. New York (N. Y.) 225

9. Its language is satisfied by holding that it gave the lessee the right to two renewals. Id.

10. A practical construction given to such lease by both parties, is entitled to great weight in ascertaining its meaning and effect. Id.

11. Where there is no proof of any mistake or fraud in the execution of leases, there is no basis for their reformation. Id.

12. Where the lessee of a quarry assigns the lease, with the provision that if assignee makes no profits and believes the quarry is not a profitable one to work he may abandon it, the assignee's right to terminate the contract depends upon the fact that he makes no profits and has such belief.
Krum v. Mersher (Pa.) 880

13. If, after a fair trial, he has made no profits, he may terminate the contract, Id.

14. In an action by lessee for so surrendering the lease, testimony that the quarry might have been worked profitably, is irrelevant. Id.

15. Evidence that a letter, demanding payment of rent, was deposited in the postoffice, is competent to rebut the allegation that no demand had been made. Authorities cited.
Folsom v. Cook (Pa.) 588

16. A lessee has an interest in the land, and is entitled to notice of partition proceedings, and will not be prejudiced by a partition to which he is not a party. Authorities cited.
Wistar's Appeal (Pa.) 654

17. On a bill by a lessee for an injunction to restrain the grantees of his landlord from trespassing on lots which he claims he rented, but for which the alleged trespasser has a conveyance in fee, it being plain that the complainant had only a license to pass over such lot, held, that the order to show cause should be discharged with costs.

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

1. Words spoken of a lawyer, in reference to what he has done in his profession, that he is a "blackmailer," are actionable per se.
Healy v. Dettra (Pa.) 168

2. H. refused in the presence of several witnesses to shake hands with D., saying: "I don't shake hands with blackmailers; a certain person told me he had to pay you hush money in the prosecution against me." P. threatened to sue H.; whereupon H. replied: "The sooner the better; I will show you that you are a blackmailer, and that you have blackmailed me." Held, that, in an action for slander, upon proof of these facts, D. was entitled to recover against H., without proof of special damage. Id.

3. In the absence of malice, compensation is the measure of damages. Id.

4. If the words were uttered with special malice, punitive damages may be awarded; and defendant's means might be taken into account. Id.

5. An action for slander for calling an attorney a blackmailer is not a case where a large number of the inhabitants of the county are interested adversely to the defendant so as to make it obligatory on the court to grant a change of venue, under the Act of 1875. Id.

2. The licensee may lease the house. Id.

3. A licensee can maintain an action for use and occupation against the owner of the land to recover compensation for possession by the owner. Id.

4. The Act of August 23, 1871, § 21, of the District of Columbia, imposing a license tax upon commercial agents, whose business it is, as agents for nonresident manufacturers, to offer merchandise for sale, is unconstitutional as a restriction upon interstate commerce.

LIEN. See EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, VI.; JUDGMENT, IV.; MORTGAGE.

1. Prior to Laws 1878, chap. 315, there was no law by which any lien could attach upon public buildings or upon the moneys due from a city to the contractor who did any work thereon.
Bell v. New York (N. Y.) 266

2. The object of that Act is to give security to those who furnished supplies or did work for the contractor on public works in cities. Id.

3. Individuals who furnish materials to such contractor are entitled to the lien, provided in Act of 1878, on moneys in the city treasury due or to grow due under the contract. Id.

4. A contract between a person and the trustees of public schools in a ward of the City of New York, to do the mason work on a school building on a lot belonging to the city, is one within the Act of 1878.

Bell v. New York (N. Y.) 266

5. Filing the notice of the lien with the clerk of the board of education, and with the city comptroller, was a fulfillment of Act of 1878, § 2. Id.

6. Where property is delivered, under an agreement which permits a lien for the work, for the purpose of having work done thereon, which adds to its value, it makes no difference that the deliveries take place at different times, provided they are all made under a single contract. The lien attaches to all the property; and if part of it is voluntarily returned without payment for the work, the only consequence is that the workman has abandoned a part of his security for the total amount due him, and retained his lien therefor only upon the property which remains in his possession.
Wiles Laundry Co. v. Hahlo (N. Y.) 280

7. Where a particular future time of payment for the work is fixed, which may be subsequent to the time when the owner is entitled to a return of the article upon which the work is done, the workman can have no lien. Id.

8. Where the parties contract for a particular time or mode of payment, the workman has no right to set up a right of possession inconsistent with the terms of his contract; and in such a case there is no lien. Id.

9. Logs were delivered to defendant's sawmill on different days upon agreement that he would saw into boards all the logs delivered. He sawed part of them and delivered boards without being paid for sawing. Held, he had a lien upon the logs undelivered, for the sawing of the others, provided all the logs were delivered to him under a single contract. Authorities cited. Id. 282

10. Under Act of June 16, 1836, a mechanics' lien may be filed for articles consisting of heating, laundry, and cooking apparatus furnished in the construction of a hotel.
Dimmick v. The E. H. Cook Co. (Pa.) 191

11. If the record in proceedings to designate a curtilage subject to a mechanics' lien, under Act of June 16, 1836, contains no irregularity, the decree will be affirmed on certiorari.
Menner v. Nichols (Pa.) 581

12. In such proceedings the court has power to set aside the report of the commissioners and appoint others. Id.

13. Notice of the appointment of commissioners must be given, but not of time of view. Id.

14. The extent of the curtilage necessary for the use of the building rests in the discretion of the commissioners and the court below. Id.

15. One agreeing to take pay for erecting buildings, by taking one of them, may sell it before erection.
McPherson v. Walton (N. J.) 374

16. Where the owner accepted an order from contractor in favor of material men, they are entitled to payment out of the first money due contractor. Id.

17. In a notice by a material man, the amount demanded must be the amount due. Id.

18. Where material man extended time of payment of claim by accepting notes his claim will be rejected. Id.

See EXECUTORS, VI.; INSURANCE, 14; LACHES.

I. IN GENERAL; ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Statute of Limitations, affecting existing rights and remedies, shall allow a reasonable time after they take effect for the commencement of suits on such cause of action.
Hunt v. State (N. J.) 114

2. Possession of land for any length of time, without taking possession of the mineral by mining it, cannot constitute an adverse possession against the owner of the mineral right.
Phœnix Iron Co. v. Lewis (Pa.) 515

II. EXCEPTIONS.

3. The Statute of Limitations is no bar to an action to establish a resulting trust, where the cestui que trust continues in possession.
Jackson's Appeal (Pa.) 850

4. The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to the obligation of a bailee of money to hold or invest where there is no stipulation as to the length of time he should hold it, and there has been no demand.
Rusling v. Rusling's Exrs. (N. J.) 129

5. Creditors of a decedent do not become the owners of the personal estate of their debtor so as to prevent the plea of the Statute of Limitations as against their debt. Authorities cited.
Heft's Appeal (Pa.) 593

III. ACKNOWLEDGMENT; PROMISE.

6. The efficacy of a payment, to avert the Statute of Limitations as a bar, resides in the voluntary act of the debtor.
Blair v. Lynch (N. Y.) 668

7. A payment obtained through proceedings supplementary to execution will not revive the promise of third person to pay the debt. Id.

8. If the debtor alleges that there was a different account or demand from that claimed by plaintiff, to which the acknowledgment relied on to take the case out of the statute referred, the onus of proving that fact rests upon him.
Shipley v. Shilling (Md.) 418

9. In an action against executors to recover for goods, etc., furnished to their testator, held, that a too general instruction that plaintiff was entitled to recover if the jury should find the account to be established, and admitted by the testator within three years before suit brought, was cured by a subsequent instruction that plaintiff could not recover unless the jury should also find that such admission applied to the account in suit. Id.

10. It is for the jury to determine whether a general, indefinite acknowledgment of indebtedness applies to the demand sued on. Id.

11. Whether a payment by such promisor of one half of the debt, in consideration of the transfer to him of one half of such debt, was accepted as a payment upon the original promise was a question for the jury.
Blair v. Lynch (N. Y.) 668

12. A clear and unequivocal acknowledgment of a debt is sufficient to take a case out of the statute.
Yost v. Grim (Pa.) 836

13. Such acknowledgment being proved, a promise will be implied without its having been actually made. Id.

14. Evidence that the specific statement of the account was exhibited to the debtor and the items pointed out to him, and that he made a payment, and no objection, justifies the finding of the jury that he admitted the bill to be right and acknowledged his liability therefor. Id.

MANDAMUS.

1. Where an Act of Congress imposes upon a Federal officer a ministerial duty, upon the performance of which depend individual rights, it is no sufficient answer to mandamus proceeding to set up a contrary direction by the President.
United States v. Bayard (D. C.) 341

2. When money is in the custody of the department of State to which the petitioner has a clear legal right, and by an Act of Congress the Secretary is directed to pay it over to him, mandamus will lie to compel its payment. Id.

3. The distribution of money due claimants under joint Mexican and American commission is, by Act of June 18, 1878, a purely ministerial duty by the secretary of state enforceable by mandamus. Id.

4. The return must deny with certainty the material averments of the petition; otherwise, they will be taken as true. Id.

5. No mandamus can be issued against a public officer unless relator shows a clear legal right to the relief claimed. Authorities cited.
United States v. Bayard (D. C.) 343

6. Mandamus lies to compel a comptroller to hear an application by the purchaser at a state tax sale to cancel the sale and refund the purchaser money on the ground of illegality of tax.
People v. Chapin (N. Y.) 253

MASTER AND SERVANT.

I. MINOR SERVANTS; ASSUMPTION OF RISK.
II. FELLOW SERVANTS.
BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See SEDUCTION.

I. MINOR SERVANTS; ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

1. If a person is so young that even after full instructions he does not appreciate the danger arising from a want of care, the employer keeps him at such work at his risk.
Hickey v. Taaffe (N. Y.) 72

2. If an employee of immature years (here a female of fourteen years) has had no instructions as to the danger of a machine at which she is set at work, and never worked at any machinery before, and is injured by such machine within a short time of her employment, because of her unfamiliarity with, and lack of appreciation of, the dangers attendant upon the working of the machine, the employer will be liable. Ruger, Ch. J., and Danforth, J., dissent. Id.

3. But where such employee has acquired knowledge of the dangers of the machine at which she was set at work, the fact that she was a minor does not alter the general rule of law upon the subject of employees taking upon themselves the risks which are patent and incident to the employment. Id.

4. Where the injury to the employee occurred from an accident which no human being would have thought of as possible to occur, resulting from an apparently safe act, the employer is not liable. Id.

5. The master is not obliged to furnish the best possible appliances, but only those which are reasonably safe and suitable. Authorities cited. Id. 74

6. Merely going through the form of giving instructions, by the employer, is not sufficient. Authorities cited. Id. 75

7. A servant takes upon himself the risks which are patent and incident to the employment. Authorities cited. Id.

8. A servant by continuing in his employment with knowledge of the risk from the location of a trap door, and its negligent use by employees in a lower floor, assumes the hazard of the situation; and the master is not liable where such servant falls through such door, the same being opened by employees of lower floor, contrary to the instructions of the foreman.
Anthony v. Leeret (N. Y.) 698

II. FELLOW SERVANTS.

9. An employee engaged in the construction of a building was injured while being lowered by an engine from the top of a wall to an upper story. He sued his employer for damages, alleging that the engine was run at that time by a new and incompetent engineer, with defendant's knowledge and without notice to or knowledge of plaintiff, and that the injury resulted from such engineer's negligence. Held, on the evidence, plaintiff was properly nonsuited.
Barton v. Jones (Pa.) 871

10. A mining boss, under Act of April 28, 1877, is a fellow servant with the miners; and his employers are not liable to miners injured from an explosion of fire damp caused by his negligence.
Redstone Coke Co. v. Roby (Pa.) 151

11. The master is responsible for the negligent act of one servant causing injury to a coservant where such servant was, by the appointment of the master, charged with the performance of duties which the master was bound to perform for the protection of his servants.
Loughlin v. State (N. Y.) 70

12. If the coservant was simply performing the work of a servant in his character as a servant or employee merely, the master is not liable. Id.

13. For an injury sustained by claimant from the negligence of the captain of the state boat who, at the time, was engaged with several employees, including claimant, in digging clay from a bank and loading it on to the boat, which negligence consisted in setting the claimant to work under the bank after the captain had loosened the overhanging earth so that it fell upon and injured the plaintiff, the State is not liable. Id.

14. The captain of the boat, although he had power to direct those under him, was nevertheless a coservant, within the rule. Id.

15. Where the injury is one for which the master, if an individual, would not be liable, it is not one for which the State is liable under Laws 1870, chap. 321. Id.

MINES AND MINING.

1. Possession of land for any length of time, without taking possession of the mineral by mining it, cannot constitute an adverse possession against the owner of the mineral right.
Phœnix Iron Co. v. Lewis (Pa.) 515

2. In ejectment to recover possession of the underlying mineral ore, from the owner of the surface, the defendant claimed title to the ore under a release alleged to have been executed by a former owner of the mineral right to a former owner of the surface nearly forty years before suit brought, and lost or destroyed. Held, that secondary evidence was properly rejected. Id.

3. A demise of coal under the surface of a specified piece of land is a sale of the coal.
Fairchild v. Fairchild (Pa.) 873

4. A lease of coal lands, in which lessee agrees in case the quantity mined falls short of a certain minimum quantity in any year to pay the same rent as if he had mined such quantity, provided that if he in any year mined more than such quantity, such excess, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be set off against the deficiency of any other year, permits mining in excess of that quantity, and an application of that excess to the rent otherwise unearned but still due in subsequent years when there happens to be a deficiency in production. Ruger, Ch. J., and Rapallo, J., dissent.
McIntyre v. McIntyre Coal Co. (N. Y.) 335

5. The deficiency need not have occurred before the excess is produced; the lessee may apply the excess upon the deficiency of any other years. Id.

6. A covenant to work the mine continuously can not be inferred from an agreement to carry on the mining operations in a safe, skillful, and workmanlike manner, the lease providing a penalty for omitting to do so. Id.

7. In ejectment in the nature of an appeal from the board of property, under the Act of April 8, 1792, § 11, held, that there was an error in directing a general verdict for the plaintiffs, without a reservation of the defendants' ore rights, reserved in a deed.
Thompson v. Mattern (Pa.) 621

8. Such verdict may be amended so as to reserve such rights. Id.

9. Where appellant had sought to show unfitness of appellee's coal for the use contemplated by the contract, by showing that it contained red or rusty coal, it was competent for the appellee to show that the rust did not affect its steam generating power, and that the appellant, in its subsequent purchase of coal for its engines, did not reject coal similarly affected.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Brydon (Md.) 396

10. A mining boss, under the Act of April 28, 1877, is a fellow servant with the miners; and his employers are not liable to miners injured from an explosion of fire damp caused by his negligence.
Redstone Coke Co. v. Roby (Pa.) 151

See CORPORATIONS, 28.

I. DEED ABSOLUTE.

1. A deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to be a security for money advanced.
Pearson v. Sharp (Pa.) 494

2. It does not follow from the possession of a power of sale by the grantee in such a deed that the power is to be exercised otherwise than by foreclosure. Id.

3. A deed and lease, held, to be security for a loan, at usurious interest; and only the amount found due at legal interest, deducting payments, allowed priority over plaintiff's mortgage.
Gaither v. Clarke (Md.) 438

II. VALIDITY; USURY; AFTER ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

4. A mortgage executed by a married woman, her husband not joining therein, held, on the facts, without vitality, being without consideration, and executed only to protect the property from a dissipated husband.
Heller v. Groves (N. J.) 139

5. An acknowledgment of a mortgage before a justice of the peace who has qualified as clerk of the oyer and terminer and quarter sessions is valid.
Adam v. Mengel (Pa.) 184

6. The acceptance of the money secured by the mortgage would estop the mortgagor from denying the validity of the acknowledgment. Id.

7. Where plaintiff took a note and a mortgage as collateral security, with notice that the note was accomodation paper, the certificate of mortgagor that the note was subject to no defense constituted no estoppel against setting up the defense of usury to defeat the mortgage.
Lewis v. Barton (N. Y.) 781

8. One paying off liens upon another's realty and receiving a mortgage void for usury, is not entitled to subrogation.
Perkins v. Hall (N. Y.) 751

9. A mortgage upon after acquired property attaches to such property, subject to existing equitable liens thereon, although it is prior to them in point of time.
United N. J. R. R. & C. Co. v. Long Dock Co. (N. J.) 920

10. Where a mortgage is given by a part owner during proceedings in partition to which he is a party, and at the sale in such proceedings the land is purchased by and conveyed to trustees for the beneficial owners of the property, held, that the legal title of the mortgagor was extinguished and the mortgage attached, but in equity only, to the equitable interest of the mortgagor in the property, and that when on the division thereof, such part owner obtained title to the part allotted to him, such mortgage cannot be maintained beyond the extent of the mortgagor's interest in the property, and that a lien for purchase money of such part owing by him was paramount to the mortgage. Id.

III. PARTIES; ASSUMPTION; REDEMPTION.

11. Unless the mortgage lien is complete at debtor's death, priority cannot be claimed over other judgment creditors. Authorities cited.
Heft's Appeal (Pa.) 593

12. Where grantee in a warranty deed assumes to pay certain mortgages as part of the purchase money, equity will compel him to discharge the obligation.
Cubberly v. Yager (N. J.) 365

13. Before entry or foreclosure, the equity of redemption may be sold on execution against mortgagor but not afterwards.
Mallalieu v. Wickham (N. J.) 367

14. A mortgagor cannot maintain a bill to interplead against one who claims, as agent of the owner of the mortgage under a power of attorney, to be entitled to the money due thereon, and a daughter of such owner who forbids the mortgagor to pay the money to such agent on the ground of the mental incapacity of the owner when she executed the power of attorney, without joining such owner as a party to the bill.
Blake v. Garwood (N. J.) 365

15. The agency was revoked when such owner became incapacitated, to all who had notice of the fact, and therefore such alleged agent has no claim to the money, and there is no foundation for the bill to interplead. Id.

IV. FORECLOSURE.

16. If defendants in a foreclosure suit claim by paramount rights, and allege that they are therefore improper parties, it is proper to dismiss the complaint, with costs as to them.

Helck v. Reinheimer (N. Y.) 743

17. But if defendants set up such rights and demand that the premises be freed from the mortgage and obtain judgment thereon, it is too late for the plaintiff, on appeal, to take the ground that the complaint should have been dismissed as to them. Id.

18. Where, in a foreclosure proceeding, it becomes necessary, the court may determine effect of a deed and lease which stand ahead of plaintiff's mortgage; and that question may be determined as between the codefendants.

Gaither v. Clarke (Md.) 433

19. It is not necessary in such case that plaintiff should have offered to redeem; a willingness stated in the bill, to allow all that is actually and fairly due, is all that is required. Id.

20. Letters from the lender's agent to borrower's agent, found among the papers of the latter after his decease, their envelopes showing the dates of their passage through the postoffice, in connection with letter press copies in the letter book of the writer are admissible as part of the res gestæ. Id.

21. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, held, the alleged defenses of an agreement to extend time of payment of mortgage, and an agreement to assign the same, are not maintained.

Eastwood v. Worrall (N. J.) 363

22. A mortgagee who has assigned the bond and mortgage before any payment of interest is due cannot, in a foreclosure suit, for default in payment of interest, put in the defense that before the assignment the interest was settled with him but not indorsed, as against the purchaser without knowledge thereof.

Newton Twp. Build. & Loan. Asso. v. Boyer (N. J.) 368

23. A subsequent purchaser of the premises who purchased subject to the bond and mortgage, who has paid nothing on his purchase nor assumed payment of the bond, and who does not allege that he supposed the interest was paid, can not, in such suit, claim any benefit from the alleged previous payment of interest. Id.

24. The burden of proof is on mortgagee to establish the priority of allowances which he claims, for taxes, etc., paid by him on a foreclosure sale.

Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

25. The filing of a bill to foreclose in a court of chancery, claiming decree for deficiency, is not a presentation of the claim for the deficiency within the meaning of the statute. Authorities cited.

Robins v. Arnold (N. J.) 122

26. A judgment creditor of a mortgagor, made a defendant in the foreclosure suit, may compel the mortgagee, who took possession before such defendant obtained his judgment, to account for the rents and profits.

Mallalieu v. Wickham (N. J.) 367

27. Where complainant and defendant in a foreclosure proceeding both derived title to mortgaged premises from same source, but defendant also had title from another source, complainant is not entitled to a writ of assistance against such latter title.

Chadwick v. Island Beach Co. (N. J.) 116

28. When a person refusing to deliver possession of mortgaged premises was a party defendant in foreclosure proceedings, equity will put the foreclosure purchaser in possession by writ of assistance. Id.

V. CHATTEL.

29. Possession by mortgagee of personal property is essential to the validity of his lien.

Heft's Appeal (Pa.) 592

30. The death of the debtor gives general creditors the right to deny the validity of such a mortgage when possession has not been taken in the debtor's lifetime. Id.

31. Upon the debtor's death a chattel mortgagee has no right to undertake to administer any part of the debtor's personal estate for the satisfaction of his own debt. Id.

32. But where the mortgagee in good faith intervenes, and in administration of the estate sells the pledge and settles an account of the proceeds, he is entitled to commissions. Id.

33. Chattels in a mortgagor's possession may be attached for his debts.

Blauvelt v. Fechtman (N. J.) 107

34. Where by the mortgage, mortgagor is entitled to possession until default, the chattels do not, before default, belong to mortgagee, within section 60 of Act for Trial of Small Causes, Rev. 550. Id.

35. In replevin for chattels claimed under a mortgage which had not been accompanied with an immediate change of possession, it is incumbent on plaintiff to show that the mortgage was made in good faith and without any intent to defraud.

Mfrs. & Traders' Bank v. Koch (N. Y.) 672

36. Where notice to the mortgagee of sales of the mortgaged chattels by the mortgagor and of the appropriation of the proceeds by the mortgagor on his own account is only evidence from which a previous agreement to permit such sales and appropriation may be inferred, it is not ground for an absolute direction to the jury to find for the defendant in such case. Id.

I. DIVISION.

1. Under Constitution, art. 8, § 2, the division of townships, wards of cities, and boroughs, into election districts is entirely within the discretion of the court of quarter sessions.
Re Bern Township (Pa.) 182

2. The Act of May 18, 1876, in so far as it prescribes the procedure by which the division shall be made, is unconstitutional. Id.

II. POWERS; REGULATIONS; ORDINANCES.

3. If a grant is made to a municipal corporation, charged with a trust in favor of an individual, private corporation or charity, the interest which the cestui que trust or beneficiary has under the grant may sustain it against legislative revocation.
Stockton v. City of Newark (N. J.) 458

4. The power to regulate porches, etc., in Mount Vernon Place, given to the City of Baltimore by the Act of 1833, chap. 180, is not taken away by the Act of 1854, chap. 9, nor by Ordinance No. 36 of 1874. Bryan, J., dissents.
Garrett v. Janes (Md.) 403

5. An ordinance of Baltimore allowing steps, etc., to extend nine feet into Mount Vernon Place is a valid exercise of the power derived from the Act of 1854. Id.

6. A municipal Legislature may, by a single ordinance, declare any compilation of ordinances to be in force, unless prohibited by statute. Id.

III. OFFICERS.

7. Under Laws 1871, chap. 323, the comptroller of the City of New York in the creation and issuing of "consolidated stock of the County of New York," was impliedly authorized to contract for assistance in negotiating the loan, and to pay for such services a reasonable commission out of the premium realized on the bonds. Andrews and Finch, JJ., dissent.
Mayor of New York v. Sands (N. Y.) 268

8. It was competent for a city officer to render services to the county and receive compensation therefor. Id.

9. Defendant having received, by indorsement from the comptroller, a check in payment of services is not liable to the county for the amount thereof. Id.

10. The board of supervisors fixed the salaries of the district attorney, his chief clerk and other subordinates, at certain sums, but thereafter, by resolution, included in the budget a sum less than the aggregate of amounts fixed by the first resolution. Held, that a chief clerk appointed under such arrangement and who accepted payment at such reduced rate had, after the termination of his employment, no claim for the larger salary fixed by the first resolution.
People v. Supers. of Kings Co. (N. Y.) 273

11. Under Brooklyn Charter Act, § 14, a member of the fire department cannot be arbitrarily dismissed without a charge, hearing, or trial.
People v. Comrs. of Brooklyn (N. Y.) 770

IV. PUBLIC PROPERTY; WORKS; CONTRACTS.

12. The City of Newark has no title to the land known as "the old burying ground," except such as it may have under the Act of 1804 and its charter; if the Indian title is valid, the city has no title under it.
Stockton v. Newark (N. J.) 458

13. If title to land was held by the township under Act of 1804, in trust for burial ground, the city holds it upon the same trust. Id.

14. The Act of 1886 is not an exercise of the police power of the Legislature. Id.

15. If the Act of 1886 gives the city the power to destroy the trust, such Act is unconstitutional. Id.

16. The fact that the place in question has become a nuisance from the neglect by the city to take proper care of it is no reason why the city should be permitted to go still further and destroy the use altogether.

Stockton v. Newark (N. J.) 458

17. In an action by a town to recover port duties it is not necessary to show that it did actually keep the port in repair. Authorities cited.
Stults v. East Brunswick etc. Turnpike. Co. (N. J.) 109

18. Prior to Laws 1878, chap. 315, there was no law by which any lien could attach upon public buildings or upon the moneys due from a city to the contractor who did any work thereon.
Bell v. New York (N. Y.) 266

19. The object of that Act is to give security to those who furnished supplies or did work for the contractor on public works in cities. Id.

20. A contract between a person and the trustees of public schools in a ward of the City of New York, to do the mason work on a school building on a lot belonging to the city, is one within the Act of 1878. Id.

21. Such school trustees act as the agents of the city, legally appointed. Id.

22. Individuals who furnished materials to such contractor are entitled to the lien provided in Act of 1878, on moneys in the city treasury due or to grow due under the contract. Id.

23. Filing the notice of the lien with the clerk of the board of education and with the city comptroller was a fulfillment of the Act of 1878, § 2. Id.

V. EMINENT DOMAIN; LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS.

a. Streets; Opening; Dedication.

24. In a proceeding to open a street in the City of New York where no owner is named in the commissioner's report, the city may, in an action in the superior court to recover the award, bring the money into that court for the true owner, by depositing it with the chamberlain to the credit of such action.
Pollock v. Morris (N. Y.) 753

25. In an action to recover damages by the owner of land against a municipality, for the taking of land for a street, a reference to the street as a boundary in deed to private parties, held, not to operate as a dedication, so as to prevent the recovery of damages.
Easton Borough v. Rinek (Pa.) 192

26. The right to damages did not accrue until the street was opened. Id.

27. The acceptance by the City of Cumberland of its amended Charter of 1848 did not operate as an acceptance of streets previously laid out within the city limits and dedicated to the public by the owners.
Kennedy v. Cumberland (Md.) 409

28. Where a principal street of a village and its sidewalk had been used for about forty years, and the village had made improvements upon it, the jury are authorized to find that the street and sidewalk were dedicated to public use.
Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs (N. Y.) 44

b. Assessments.

29. Rural or suburban land in front of which water pipes are laid cannot be assessed according to the "foot front rule."
Allentown v. Adams (Pa.) 195

30. In scire facias upon a municipal lien, filed against such land according to the "foot front rule," testimony that the land is enhanced in value by the pipes is inadmissible. Id.

31. It is for the jury to determine whether the land is urban, suburban, or rural. Id.

32. Municipal assessments for permanent improvements upon land are apportionable between the life tenant and the remainderman; ordinary taxes of government are properly chargeable to the life tenant alone. Authorities cited.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 304

33. Assessments for water rates, against vacant lots in Brooklyn, under Laws 1859, chap. 396, § 24, held illegal and void, the statute failing to provide for notice to the lot owners or opportunity to be heard. Finch and Andrews, JJ., dissent.
Remsen v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 691

34. Where vacant lots, belonging to minors, had been sold to enforce such illegal assessments, and a proceeding was had to enable the owners to sell a part of the land to pay off the incumbrances, and the purchaser paid to the city the amount of the outstanding illegal tax sale certificates on account of the purchase money, held, that while the money remained in possession of the city an action was maintainable by the lot owners to compel the delivery thereof to them. Id.

35. Satisfaction of a municipal claim for water pipe operates as an estoppel on the municipality, when a subsequent purchaser of the land applies for permit to introduce water from the pipe to the premises.
Philadelphia v. Matchett (Pa.) 907

c. Change of Grade of Street.

36. Act of May 24, 1878, providing for damages to property owners, occasioned by the change of grade of streets in boroughs, is not retroactive so as to give damages for injuries prior to the Constitution of 1874.
Folkenson v. Easton Borough (Pa.) 211

37. The measure of damages is the difference in the market value of the property before the change in the immediately adjoining property and the market value after the change of grade in front of the property, with interest on the principal sum to date.
Freemansburg v. Rodgers (Pa.) 828

38. On appeal to the common pleas from a report of viewers assessing damages for a change of grade in a street, the opinion of the viewers that the change was a damage, after having testified to an acquaintance with the value of such property and that they had viewed the premises, is admissible. Id.

39. The cause of action for damages

accrues at time of physical change of grade of street.
Freemansburg v. Rodgers (Pa.) 828

40. An assent to a change of grade of street by plaintiff when he was not the owner of the property will not bind him after he becomes such owner. Id.

41. Where excavations made in the street and adjacent lots by the State changed the direction of the drainage, if a village by turnpiking the street and improving the highway did not increase the flow of surface water on the plaintiff's lot beyond what it was prior to the excavations, it committed no wrong to plaintiff.
Rutherford v. Holley (N. Y.) 677

42. It would be unreasonable to hold that every change in the natural surface of land, made in the improvement of a highway, which to any extent increases the flow of surface water on adjacent premises, constitutes an actionable injury. Id.

VI. DEFECTIVE WAYS.

a. In General; Repairs; Barriers, etc.

43. Towns were not under any legal liability to respond in damages to persons injured by defects in the highways until Laws 1881, chap. 700.
Monk v. New Utrecht (N. Y.) 240

44. Under the method in force for laying out and building public roads in the County of Kings, the officers of the town are not chargeable for a defect in the road or omission to provide safeguards, which arises from an error in its plan. Id.

45. A village which is constituted a separate road district, and the trustees of which are commissioners of highways, is bound to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe and proper condition.
Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs (N. Y.) 44

46. There must be an acceptance of a dedication of a street before the duty of the county or municipality in improving or keeping it in repair can arise. Authorities cited.
Kennedy v. Cumberland (Md.) 412

47. By the Laws of 1881, towns are not liable unless they possess, or have power to obtain, means to make necessary repairs.
Monk v. New Utrecht (N. Y.) 240

48. It is in the discretion of the commissioners to apply the funds in their hands in making such repairs as in their judgment are most needed; and they are not responsible for an error of judgment in doing so where they have not the funds to repair all the defective places. Id.

49. Where, by the village charter, the walks are placed under the care of the trustees and the superintendent is bound to repair them, held, that money raised for the repair of the streets is applicable also to the repair of the sidewalks.
Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs (N. Y.) 44

50. It is not sufficient to exonerate the village that the superintendent had no money in his hands to repair walks, where he had authority to call upon the trustees for the same. Id.

51. A town is not obliged to remove irregularities outside of the road, nor to erect barriers to prevent travelers from wandering into the adjoining fields.
Monk v. New Utrecht (N. Y.) 240

52. Where a public road ends in a steep declivity on another road, long discontinued, without any barrier at the top of the slope, and a horse, driven along the former one, runs away, through no fault of the township, plunges down the declivity and is killed, the jury may determine whether there was any duty imposed upon the township to erect such a barrier.
Bishop v. Schuylkill (Pa.) 160

53. A township is not chargeable with damages resulting from extraordinary accidents which may happen on its public roads, and which reasonable skill and care would not be required to guard against. Id.

54. The running away of a horse is not a contingency against which the township is bound to provide. Id.

55. When two causes combine to produce an injury to a traveler upon a highway, both of which are in their nature proximate, the one being a culpable defect in the highway and the other some occurrence for which neither party is responsible, the municipality is liable, provided the injury would not have been sustained but for such defect. Authorities cited.
Taylor v. Yonkers (N. Y.) 231

56. Where the plaintiff was much intoxicated and no reasonable excuse seemed to exist for his walking off this road, there was a lack of proof that he was free from contributory negligence.
Monk v. New Utrecht (N. Y.) 240

b. Ice and Snow.

57. A municipal corporation may require each of its citizens to clean the snow from the walks adjacent to his own premises, and when this is not done within a reasonable time the corporation may compel them to act or do the work itself; and if it suffers the obstruction to remain thereafter with notice of its existence, it may become liable for injuries resulting.
Taylor v. Yonkers (N. Y.) 230

58. It should require householders to sprinkle ashes or sand, or the like, upon the surface, but it is not responsible for their omission. Id.

59. When for two years the action of rain and frost had thrown upon the sidewalk sand, gravel and stones from an adjoining bank, until the flagging was entirely covered by it, and a new and sloping grade substituted for the one adopted, which when winter came was covered with snow which was never removed but had been trampled down by travel, and by freezing and thawing converted into ice, held, that these facts established negligence on the part of the city. Id.

60. Where there were no facts beyond the existence of the slope that permitted the inference that the slope of the walk was a concurrent cause without which the accident would not have happened, and the conclusion of the jury was mere guess and speculation, held, the motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

Taylor v. Yonkers (N. Y.) 230

61. When the plaintiff stepped on such new ice surface, if such slope was one concurring cause of the fall, without which the accident to plaintiff would not have happened, the city is liable. Id.

62. When the fall of rain or the melting of adjoining snow is suddenly followed by severe cold which covers the walks with a layer of ice, and makes them slippery and dangerous, and which it is practically impossible to remove until a thaw comes, the municipality is not negligent for awaiting a change of temperature which will remedy the evil. Id.

63. It is not negligence in law to attempt to cross a bank of snow and ice on a sidewalk, although such obstruction is visible.
Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs (N. Y.) 44

c. Notice; Practice; Evidence, etc.

64. When a street or sidewalk has been out of repair for considerable time, so that by reasonable diligence the municipal authorities could have had notice of the defect, such notice may be imputed to them. Authorities cited. Id. 47

65. A claim for damages for injuries from a defective sidewalk need not be presented to the officers of defendant for audit. Id.

66. In an action for damages, an ordinance imposing a penalty on lot owners for neglect to keep sidewalks in repair is admissible for plaintiff. Id.

67. Evidence that others had fallen on the sidewalk, at the same place where plaintiff was injured, is admissible. Id.

68. That about a month after the accident the city council appropriated money to repair a street is not sufficient to make the city liable for such injury.
Kennedy v. Cumberland (Md.) 409

69. It is not essential to the recovery of costs by plaintiff in an action against a municipal corporation for damages for injuries sustained through the negligence of its servants, commenced before the Code of Civil Procedure went into effect, and therefore governed by Laws 1859, chap. 262, that the claim should have been presented to the chief fiscal officer of the corporation before suit brought.
Taylor v. Cohoes (N. Y.) 76

VII. ACTIONS.

70. Where the City of Rochester caused a nuisance within the Town of Brighton, by the discharge of sewage, after it was collected in the sewers, into open drains constructed by the city across lands in the town, and continued this discharge after it was prohibited by an order of the board of health of the town, and continued also to use the ditches it had constructed in the town, held, that the order of the board of health of the town could be properly served on the city; and that the board could maintain an action against the city, to enforce its regulation and to restrain a continuance of the nuisance.

1. When a structure has uniformly proved safe, its use may be continued without the imputation of carelessness.
Laffin v. Buffalo & S. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 793

2. Where the evidence showed that when deceased approached a railroad track he stopped, looked and listened, and the contention was whether the place where he stopped was a suitable one to see and hear, and whether due effort was made to ascertain if a train was approaching, held, it was not error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury that plaintiff could not recover.
Penn. & N. Y. Canal & R. R. Co. v. Heuff (Pa.) 640

3. One attempting to cross a railroad track in plain sight of a near approaching engine is guilty of contributory negligence.
Kelley v. Penn. R. R. Co. (Pa.) 868

4. Where plaintiff in an action against a town for injury received from an alleged defect in a highway, was much intoxicated, and no reasonable excuse appeared for his walking off the road, there was a lack of proof that he was free from contributory negligence.
Monk v. New Utrecht (N. Y.) 240

5. The presence of an infant, seventeen months old, unattended, upon a railroad track is, unexplained, proof of carelessness on parent's part. Danforth and Andrews, JJ., dissent.
Chrystal v. Troy & B. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 245

6. After discovering the peril of a child, all that an engineer is bound to do is to use reasonable diligence and care to avert it. Id.

7. An engineer has the right, in broad daylight when his train is visible and its approach can be heard, to assume that a seventeen months' old child will leave the track in time to escape injury. Id.

8. A railroad company is not responsible for any error in judgment on the part of an engineer as to the speed of his train, the distance, age, and peril of the child, and his ability to stop the train in time to protect him. Id.

9. Evidence that deceased, a short time before his death, said that he was tired of life and did not care to live, and evidence tended to show he was a habitual drunkard, is admissible, and may be considered by the jury on the question of damages.
Disbrow v. Ulster (Pa.) 827

10. Evidence of a simple declaration of plaintiff after the injury that he was then suffering pain, is hearsay, and not admissible.
Roche v. Brooklyn, etc. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 702

11. Evidence of exclamations indicative of pain made by party injured is admissible. Authorities cited.

1. On a motion for a compulsory nonsuit, it is the duty of the court to deduce from plaintiff's evidence every reasonable inference of fact in his favor.
Jones v. Bland (Pa.) 859

2. In an action by a sheriff on the bond of a deputy, to recover damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of a false return alleged to have been made by the deputy, the answer of one of the defendants put the making of the return in issue; but the answers of the other defendants admitted the making of the return by the deputy, but alleged facts in justification thereof. The plaintiff failed to show that the return was made by the deputy. Held, that a nonsuit was proper as to the defendant who had raised an issue as to the making of the return, but was erroneous as to the others.

8. Fees and salaries, as long as they maintain a distinctive character, are not attachable. Authorities cited.
Rozelle v. Rhodes (Pa.) 658

9. An action to prevent the treasurer of Queens County from collecting from trust funds in his custody the fees allowed upon tax sales to the several towns in the county, without the audit of the town board, is maintainable by a taxpayer, under Laws 1881, chap. 531.
Warrin v. Baldwin (N. Y.) 768

10. The board of supervisors fixed the salaries of the district attorney, his chief clerk and other subordinates, at certain sums, but thereafter, by resolution, included in the budget a sum less than the aggregate of amounts fixed by the first resolution. Held, that a chief clerk appointed under such arrangement, and who accepted payment at such reduced rate had, after the termination of his employment, no claim for the larger salary fixed by the first resolution.
People v. Supers. of Kings Co. (N. Y.) 273

11. An indictment against a defaulting tax collector need not aver that the money is still detained; and it is sufficient if it avers that defendant was collector of the state and county taxes for the county, and as such collected the taxes for the year.

PARTITION.

1. Where a mortgage is given by a part owner during proceedings in partition to which he is a party, and at the sale in such proceedings the land is purchased by and conveyed to trustees for the beneficial owners of the property, held, that the legal title of the mortgagor was extinguished and the mortgage attached, but in equity only, to the equitable interest of the mortgagor in the property, and that when, on the division thereof, such part owner obtained title to the part allotted to him, such mortgage cannot be maintained beyond the extent of the mortgagor's interest in the property, and that a lien for purchase money of such part owing by him was paramount to the mortgage.
United N. J. R. R. & C. Co. v. Long Dock Co. (N. J.) 920

2. A voluntary partition of land between the owners thereof is not binding upon the holders of the existing liens upon the property, unless they consent thereto. Authorities cited. Id. 921

3. Where the title of all parties is set forth in the petition, and it appears that the dispute respecting it has been adjudicated, and in consequence the tenants in common are in joint possession, the mere denial of the tenancy and right of partition is not enough to require the court to suspend proceedings until another trial of the right of some of the parties.

Hunt v. Hunt (N. J.) 462

10. Where a purchaser of real property at a judicial sale, which did not bar the title of some of joint owners, has sold portions of the land to purchasers who have improved them, joint owners may have partition.
Gittings v. Worthington (Md.) 442

11. If the shares of such joint owners not barred by the previous judicial sale, claimed in such partition proceedings, are assigned out of the improved portions of the property, an inquiry should be instituted to ascertain the amount to be allowed for such improvements. Id.

12. The more eligible mode of making the division is to take the part claimed by such joint owners from the unimproved portion of the tract, if practicable. Id.

13. When such joint owners prosecute as the holders of a common interest, their portion may be allotted collectively; and they can then obtain a redivision among themselves. Id.

14. Where conveyances of portions of such land given by the purchaser contained only special warranties which were distinct covenants that he was not to be answerable for any losses which might occur from assertion of a title superior to his own, and a permanent title is subsequently satisfied entirely out of portion of property which remained in his hands, held, that he must be indemnified so that the entire tract may be assessed ratably to make up the value of the portion allotted to the claimants by such superior title; the basis of estimation being the value of the ground considered irrespectively of the improvements. Bryan, J., dissenting. Id.

PARTNERSHIP.

1. A sale by partners to a copartner, of partnership property, conceived in fraud, and carried through by fraudulent representation on vendee's part, will, at the suit of a firm creditor, be declared void; and where the property sold has been converted into money, the proceeds must be accounted for.
Hagerman v. Farr (N. J.) 116

2. A partner who, after the dissolution, has disposed of the partnership property, collected debts due the firm, and paid debts due from it, cannot be excused from accounting on the ground that he has paid out more for the firm in paying its debts than he has received from the assets.
Sharp v. Hibbins (N. J.) 919

3. The property of the wife of a partner can not be charged with moneys drawn by the husband from the firm's funds with knowledge of the other partner, and used in improving her property. Id.

4. Firm property will pass under a sale upon a joint execution against all the partners, issued upon a judgment recovered for any joint debt whatever.
Saunders v. Reilly (N. Y.) 59

5. A sheriff may execute a writ of execution issued against several partners jointly, either on their joint property or on the separate property of one or more of them; and so long as there is within his bailiwick any property of the partners, a return of nulla bona is improper. Authorities cited.

Saunders v. Reilly (N. Y.) 68

6. After the sale of firm property upon a joint judgment against both members of a firm, no equity is left in either member to have the property thereafter applied in discharge of the firm debts. Id. 59

7. It is fraud upon firm creditors for a member of the firm to take firm property and apply it upon his individual debts, or for the firm to take firm property and apply it upon the debts of any member. Id. 62

8. One of two partners may transfer all his interest in the partnership property to his copartner. Authorities cited. Id.

Hyatt v. Dale Tile Mfg. Co. (N. Y.) 790

2. Where, at defendant's request, plaintiff withdrew her notice of forfeiture of the license and reinstated defendant in its possession, upon its special promise to pay the royalties then due, this was sufficient consideration for defendant's promise. Id.

3. So long as defendant continues to manufacture under its license, it prevents plaintiff from treating defendant in any other light than that of licensee. Id.

4. An affidavit of cause of action in foreign attachment, stating that a partnership had been formed between D. and T. to manufacture a certain patented article; that D. was to be a silent partner; that they granted the patent right to the garnishee for a royalty, recited "to be paid to T.;" but that the grant was in consideration that the royalties should be paid to D. and T., and that T. received them for their joint benefit, held, to be sufficient, in connection with the agreements of partnership and grant of the patent right.

I. IN GENERAL; COMPLAINT; ANSWER.

1. Pleadings are to be liberally construed.
Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 734

2. The first count of a complaint to enjoin the maintenance of a fence, alleged that plaintiff was in possession of hotel premises and that the fence built by defendant railroad company, was an obstruction to a public street adjacent to the hotel, and a nuisance; the second count alleged that defendant had failed to maintain an opening through the fence, as it was bound to do, etc. Held, an amendment of the complaint, so as to set up a lease to plaintiff, was properly allowed.
Avery v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 795

3. The lessee could not raise the question of the validity of deeds executed by his lessor. Id.

4. When the hearing is on petition and answer, all statements in the answer must be regarded as true. Authorities cited.

5. The usual rule for the construction of pleadings applies to an answer of usury.
Lewis v. Barton (N. Y.) 781

6. Where the case turns wholly upon the defense of usury, it is unimportant that there is no sufficient denial in the answer of the averments in the complaint. Id.

7. New matter set up in the answer, not constituting a counterclaim, does not call for a reply.
Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 734

II. BILL OF PARTICULARS.

8. Plaintiff sued for board furnished to defendant, and defendant denied and set up a counterclaim for board furnished to plaintiff, to which the latter replied with a denial; and plaintiff furnished a bill of particulars containing a charge against defendant for board and a credit allowed him for similar service of a less amount. Held, the credit is not conclusive evidence of legal liability to that amount.

I. IN GENERAL; RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES.

1. The declarations and acts of a man cannot be given in evidence to prove that he is the agent of another. Authorities cited.
De Baril v. Campoy y Pardo (Pa.) 643

2. A diamond dealer entrusted, by the owner, with diamonds under a receipt stating that they were received on approval to show to his customers, and that they were to be returned to the owner on demand, had authority to sell them; and a purchaser in good faith has a right to retain them as against the one who entrusted them to such dealer.
Smith v. Clews (N. Y.) 680

3. Either the agent or principal may sue upon a contract not under seal with an agent for an undisclosed principal.
Ludwing v. Gillespie (N. Y.) 740

4. A judgment for the agent on such contract bars the undisclosed principal. Id.

5. Where goods are bought of one as a principal, the right to a set-off against such seller is lost if the real principal is disclosed before goods delivered or payment made.
McLachlin v. Brett (N. Y.) 696

6. A principal is estopped from denying his agent's representation as against a third person, where he has clothed the agent with power to do an act upon the existence of some extrinsic fact. Authorities cited.
Bank of Batavia v. New York, L. E. & W. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 825

7. Notice of an unrecorded deed to an attorney or agent is equivalent to notice to principal.
Dickerson v. Bowers (N. J.) 372

8. An insurance broker was held so far the agent of the assured that notice to him of the cancellation of the policy was notice to the assured.
Stone v. Franklin Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 749

9. To make a ratification of an agent's unauthorized act effectual, previous knowledge by the principal of all the material facts must be shown.
Merrick Thread Co. v. Phila. Shoe Mfg. Co. (Pa.) 574

10. In the absence of such evidence, it is error to submit the question to the jury. Id.

11. A mortgager cannot maintain a bill to interplead against one who claims, as agent of the owner of the mortgage under a power of attorney, to be entitled to the money due thereon, and against a daughter of such owner who forbids the mortgagor to pay the money to such agent on the ground of the mental incapacity of the owner when she executed the power of attorney, without joining such owner as a party to the bill.
Blake v. Garwood (N. J.) 365

12. The agency was revoked when such owner became incapacitated, to all who had notice of the fact; and therefore such alleged agent has no claim to the money, and there is no foundation for the bill to interplead. Id.

13. An agent is responsible for the acts of his subagent. Authorities cited.
De Baril v. Campoy y Pardo (Pa.) 644

II. FACTORS AND BROKERS.

14. If a warehouseman to whom grain was delivered by a commission merchant as security for advances knew that the commission merchant was using property consigned to him for sale, he can not hold the grain as against the true owner.
Dorrance v. Dean (N. Y.) 695

15. The Factors' Act, Laws 1830, chap. 179, has no application to a case where protection would secure to a wrong doer the fruits of fraud. Id.

16. A husband undertaking to be bound for the commissions of a broker for effecting the sale of real estate of his wife is personally bound, whether he discloses his agency for his wife or not.

Jarvis v. Schaefer (N. Y.) 675

17. If compensation was promised to a broker by one of the parties, when fully informed that the broker held the same relation to the adverse dealer, the broker is entitled thereto. Id.

18. That defendant paid commissions to another broker does not impair plaintiff's right to compensation. Id.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY. See BONDS.

1. Sureties are not estopped by any recital in the undertaking from availing themselves of the invalidity of the instrument when sued thereon.
Mittnacht v. Kellermann (N. Y.) 714

2. Sureties in a bond for a bank, a depositary of the State for canal tolls, are not released from liability thereon by another bond, subsequently executed and delivered, but not accepted by the State.
People v. Lee (N. Y.) 35

3. When the language of the contract was that the bank should account for and pay over all moneys deposited with it and all moneys now on deposit in said bank or for which it shall in any way become liable, held, that the sureties thereon intended to be bound for the continuing security of the existing deposit. Id.

4. It is not competent for parties to such an undertaking to allege that they were ignorant of the existence of a debt expressly provided for, or that they have been misled by the omission of the principals to notify them of its existence. Id.

5. The sureties on a bond of indemnity to a sheriff in attachment are not liable to the sheriff for the amount recovered against him for detention of property after attachment vacated.
Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 734

6. An attempt to defend the sheriff is not a ratification by obligors in the indemnity bond of such act, when sued by the sheriff on their bond. Id.

7. A surety of a guardian paying a judgment in the orphans' court, against his principal, may file a bill to compel his co-surety to pay one half thereof without first obtaining a judgment at law against him.
Neilson v. Williams (N. J.) 369

8. Notice by a surety in an administration bond, before adjudication to creditors of the estate, that the administratrix is wasting the estate and that all claims against the estate must be pushed at once or he will not be responsible for losses, is ineffectual to relieve him from liability to such creditors.

RAILROAD COMPANIES. See CARRIERS; CORPORATIONS. 28; NEGLIGENCE; STREET RAILWAYS; TAXES, 8.

1. Laws 1869, chap. 909, § 4, amended by Laws 1871, chap. 283, providing for the appropriation of taxes to payment of municipal bonds in aid of railroads applies to any municipality which has such bonds outstanding.
Clark v. Sheldon (N. Y.) 923

2. It makes no difference as to the duty of the county treasurer that the taxes were not expressly collected or paid over to him for said purpose. Id.

3. Section 4 is not in conflict with the Constitution. Id.

4. It is no defense to a proceeding by a taxpayer to compel such application that the petition does not put the amount of taxes claimed to be applicable to that purpose high enough; the county treasurer may be compelled to set aside for a sinking fund all the taxes which may appear to have been paid to him for that purpose. Id.

5. Nor is it an answer to such proceeding that if the county treasurer should do so, there would be a deficiency in other funds. Id.

6. If the application for the appointment of commissioners to determine the routes of a contemplated railway, under the Rapid Transit Act (Laws 1875, chap. 606), is proved by a single witness upon oath to have been signed by the persons whose names are thereto appended, the statute is satisfied.
Re Kings Co. Elevated R. Co. (N. Y.) 282

7. Upon filing the certificate and articles of association required by Act of 1875, on January 6, 1879, the Kings County Elevated Railway Company then became and now is a corporation. Id.

8. A condition affixed by the Common Council of Brooklyn to its consent, to the construction of proposed railroads, that the company should enter into a bond to pay into the city treasury, semi-annually, for the benefit of the city, 2 per cent of its gross receipts, did not prevent the consent of the common council being effective to give the company power to appropriate land for such construction. Id.

9. Other conditions, that the city assessors should arbitrate all damages caused to property owners, and that portions of the road should be completed at certain dates specified, being different from the dates fixed by the commissioners, held, to be in conflict with the statute. Id

10. The articles of association prepared by the commissioners provided that the time unavoidably consumed by legal proceedings, etc., "or otherwise," should not be deemed a part of the period limited for the completion of the road. Held, that the time between resolution of commissioners limiting time for completion and incorporation of company should not be counted against the company. Id.

11. The forfeiture to the county supervisor of the corporate rights of a company organized under Act of 1875, for noncompletion within time fixed, is not worked by the mere default, without the intervention of the courts or action on the part of the State or of the county. Id.

12. The commissioners, having located fifteen different routes, fixed the time within which five routes should be completed, and omitted the remaining. Held, that this omission was not fatal to the whole scheme. Id.

13. Where plaintiff's lands were used for a railroad track for some time, the proper measure of damages is the fair rental value of such lands for the time they were so used, in absence of special damage.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Boyd (Md.) 435

14. Declarations made by counsel on a former occasion in the course of a trial, while urging the question of the damages before a jury of condemnation of the property in question, are not admissible to prove malice on the part of defendant, in order to enhance the damages. Id.

15. Where the former receiver of a railroad company made a contract that complainant should for a year keep the ash pit clean where the engines of the company emptied their ashes, and for his compensation should have the cinders and coal from such pit, held, that complainant is entitled to damages for breach of the contract by the present receiver.

People v. O'Sullivan (N.Y.) 56

2. A disclosure by prosecutrix nearly eleven months after the alleged rape, where there was nothing to justify the delay, held, too remote to be received in evidence. Id.

3. The want of an early disclosure may be explained by facts showing that it was impracticable, or that it was prevented by circumstances consistent with the natural impulse to complain. Id.

4. Upon a trial for rape, an attempt to commit the same offense by defendant at some prior time, not too distant, may be proved. Id.

5. Such evidence is not incompetent because it comes from complainant herself. Id.

2. Sureties are not estopped by any recital in the undertaking from availing themselves of the invalidity of the instrument when sued thereon. Id.

3. Where notes of a company have been unlawfully converted by its president, the company may recover possession of them from the holder, by replevin, unless he is a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice.
Davis Sewing Mach. Co. v. Best (N. Y.) 63

4. In replevin for notes not enforceable as the pecuniary obligations of a corporation by reason of their defective execution, only nominal damages can be recovered for their detention. Id.

5. In replevin for chattels claimed under a mortgage which had not been accompanied with an immediate change of possession, it is incumbent on plaintiff to show that the mortgage was made in good faith and without any attempt to defraud.
Mfrs. & Traders Bank v. Koch (N. Y.) 672

6. Where notice to the mortgagee of sales of the mortgaged chattels by the mortgagor, and of the appropriation of the proceeds by the mortgagor on his own account, is only evidence from which a previous agreement to permit such sales and appropriation may be inferred, it is not ground for an absolute direction to the jury to find for the defendant in such case.

Woodruff v. Havemeyer (N. Y.) 776

5. Under a contract made in New York, February 2, 1881, for "prompt shipment by sail from Europe, and for delivery at New York," dangers of the sea excepted, precedent to payment, rails were, on February 3, placed on board a ship at a river port in Germany then closed by ice and not open until April 2 or 3, on which latter day the ship sailed for New York, and the rails were tendered to the buyer on June 14, held, that the buyer was entitled to such timely delivery as would follow an effective shipment, and was not bound to receive the rails.
Tobias v. Lissberger (N. Y.) 723

6. The buyer was not estopped from refusing to accept the rails by the fact that he had made no objection until the tender on June 14. Id.

7. Plaintiffs gave defendant a written agreement, reciting that they agreed to sell and had sold defendant and agreed to deliver on board of cars at siding all lumber thereinafter mentioned, when defendant should so direct. The lumber was described as being in piles, of a certain number of feet, of which the price per foot and the aggregate sum were given "more or less" or "whatever it may be," to be paid for as specified; the receipt of hand money was acknowledged as part payment on above, balance, "whatever it may be, to be settled likewise as soon as the correct amount can be arrived at." The piles were marked as defendant's. Held, delivery was complete and the title passed when the piles were estimated and marked to defendant. Mercur, Ch. J., dissents, on ground that something remained to be done according to the terms of the contract.
Gonser v. Smith (Pa.) 187

8. Although a vendor's right to rescind a sale, because of vendee's failure or refusal to pay, continues so long as any weighing, measuring, or other thing remains to be done on his part, yet this test does not apply to the question of the vesting of the title in a case where the vendor has no cause of rescission. Id.

9. Where the lawful form of contracting is pursued, the vesting of the title always depends on the intention of the parties, to be derived from the contract and its circumstances. Id.

10. Actual delivery, weighing, and setting aside are only circumstances from which the intention may be inferred. Id.

11. If any part of the price is paid by way of earnest, the property of the goods is absolutely bound by it. Authorities cited.
Id. 189

12. The acceptance by a vendee of articles manufactured under an executory contract, after an opportunity to examine them, precludes him from questioning defects, unless there is a warranty of their quality intended to survive acceptance.
Norton v. Dreyfuss (N. Y.) 785

13. When there is such a warranty, the vendee may retain the goods, and recoup damages; or he can return the goods and plead rescission of the contract. Id.

14. But these defenses cannot both be sustained in the same action. Election between them where it is uncertain on the pleadings is a question for the jury. Id.

15. Whether a demand and refusal was the equivalent of an acceptance was a question for the jury. Id.

16. In a contract an elevator was "warranted satisfactory in every respect." A bona fide objection by contracting party to its working is a defense to an action for price. Authorities cited.

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

1. Where one board of school directors, duly elected and qualified, is acting as such and performing the duties of the office, another de facto board cannot exist.
White v. School Dist. (Pa.) 155

2. Contracts with a pretended de facto board do not bind the district. Id.

3. Prior to Laws 1878, chap. 315, there was no law by which any lien could attach upon public buildings, or upon the moneys due from a city to the contractor who did any work thereon.
Bell v. New York (N. Y.) 266

4. A contract between a person and the trustees of public schools in a ward of the City of New York, to do the mason work on a school building on a lot belonging to the city, is one within the Act of 1878. Id.

5. Such school trustees act as the agents of the city, legally appointed. Id.

6. Individuals who furnish materials to such contractor are entitled to the lien provided in Act of 1878 on moneys in the city treasury, due or to grow due under the contract. Id.

7. Filing the notice of the lien with the clerk of the board of education and with the city comptroller was a fulfillment of Act 1878, § 2. Id.

SEDUCTION.

1. In an action by a father for loss of services of daughter, caused by seduction, slight evidence is sufficient to establish the relation of master and servant.
Lamb v. Taylor (Md.) 377

2. If the daughter is living with her father, rendering services, that she is over twenty-one years of age is immaterial. Id.

3. It is immaterial whether the services were paid for or not. Id.

4. That the daughter was employed out of her father's house during the day, and paid board at her father's, is immaterial. Id.

SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM. See DEVISE AND LEGACY, 45.

1. An executory contract for sale of goods creates no debt against which there can be a set-off.
McLachlin v. Brett (N. Y.) 696

2. Where goods are bought of one as a principal, the right to a set-off against such seller is lost if the real principal is disclosed before goods delivered or payment made. Id.

3. Plaintiff sued for board furnished to defendant, and defendant denied and set up a counterclaim for board furnished to plaintiff, to which the latter replied with a denial, and plaintiff furnished a bill of particulars containing a charge against defendant for board and a credit allowed him for similar service of a less amount, held, the credit is not a conclusive evidence of legal liability to that amount.
Case v. Pharis (N. Y.) 779

4. The admission does not waive the right of contesting a resultant liability. Id.

5. New matter set up in the answer, not constituting a counterclaim, does not call for a reply.
Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 784

6. If an action is nonreferable, a counterclaim set up in the answer cannot make it so. Authorities cited.
Untermeyer v. Bernhauser (N. Y.) 711

SETTLEMENT.

Where an alleged settlement of accounts is attacked, it is admissible to prove the items.
Mead v. White (Pa.) 846

SHERIFF.

1. Upon vacation of attachment it is the sheriff's duty to deliver the property to defendant or the person entitled thereto.
Bowe v. Wilkins (N. Y.) 734

2. A bond of indemnity to the sheriff does not cover a detention after vacation of attachment. Id.

3. Where the sheriff levied the execution against himself on the goods which he had attached and kept in his hands, and sold them on the execution and turned over the money to the attorney for the plaintiff in the execution, held, the knowledge of such attorney as to where the money came from would be no ratification by the plaintiff in the execution of his prior illegal act in refusing to surrender the goods. Id.

4. An attempt to defend the sheriff is not a ratification by obligors in the indemnity bond of such act, when sued by the sheriff on their bond. Id.

5. When the sole ground of recovery against such sheriff was the demand and refusal, he cannot allege in an action on the indemnity bond that he had a right to retain the property. Id.

6. In an action by a sheriff on the bond of a deputy, to recover damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of a false return alleged to have been made by the deputy, the answer of one of the defendants put the making of the return in issue, but the answers of the other defendants admitted the making of the return by the deputy, but alleged facts in justification thereof. The plaintiff failed to show that the return was made by the deputy. Held, that a nonsuit was proper as to the defendant who had raised an issue as to the making of the return, but was erroneous as to the others.

SHIPS AND SHIPPING. See CHARTER-PARTY.

1. Where parties make a special agreement as to the mode of delivery of a shipment of sugar, and of the amount which the owner or consignee should pay for wharfinger's charges, the agreement is valid and binding on such owner and consignee.
Woodruff v. Havemeyer (N. Y.) 776

2. The wharf owners are entitled to enforce the contract and recover wharfingers' charges. Id.

3. Tobias v. Lissberger (N. Y.) 723

4. The buyer was not estopped from refusing to accept the rails by the fact that he had made no objection until the tender on June 14. Id.

5. When goods are sold and are to be delivered on board of vessels, putting on board is a good shipment whether the vessel is in condition or is expected to sail or not. Authorities cited. Id. 727

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Specific execution will not be decreed, of an unperfected agreement, in favor of one not party to it, in the face of the denial of its existence by one of the alleged contracting parties.
Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

2. To claim the benefit of a mutual agreement from the opposite party, a party must show that his part of the agreement has been performed. Id.

3. The court will place the parties in the same situation they would have been in if the contract had been performed.
Bostwick v. Beach (N. Y.) 667

4. The vendee, having obtained a decree for specific performance, may be allowed the damages sustained during the pendency of the suit, by deterioration from waste committed by defendant. Id.

5. Where a decree is sought to be opened to let in defendant to claim interest on the purchase money, plaintiff should be let in to prove damages for deterioration. Id.

6. The modified decree should provide for interest and damages. Id.

STATE AND STATE OFFICER. See DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA; PRINCIPAL AND SURETY, 2-4; WHARVES.

1. Such certificates of indebtedness, creating a conditional obligation on the part of the State to pay the same only when it should have received the money from the United States, are not bills of credit, the issuance of which by the States is prohibited by the Federal Constitution.
People v. Brie (N. Y.) 85

2. A certificate of indebtedness for war claims of the militia, countersigned by the acting paymaster under an Act of Missouri, is capable of being the subject of forgery.

People v. Brie (N. Y.) 85

3. The State can only be sued with its own consent and for liabilities which it chooses to assume.
Rexford v. State (N. Y.) 762

4. Until Laws of 1870, chap. 321, canal appraisers had no jurisdiction over injuries from neglect, or which were temporary in their character.
Heacock v. State (N. Y.) 330

5. Where, in raising the banks of a state canal, the banks are built of loose earth, so that leakage occasioning injury results, this is on its face a negligent act. Id.

6. A coffer dam, built by the State for restraining waters of a river while enlarging a canal, a portion of which was permitted to remain in the shape of an island, after its purpose was accomplished, is a temporary obstruction merely, with which the Act of 1830 has nothing to do. Id.

7. The Act of 1870 does not confer new jurisdiction to hear claims for taking of land in fee, or for the appropriation of a continuous and permanent easement by the State.
Stewart v. State (N. Y.) 333

8. For a claim for a permanent easement taken by the State for the use of the canals, and corresponding damages, claimant has no remedy under Act of 1870. Such claim must be presented in one year. Id.

9. For an injury sustained by claimant from the negligence of the captain of the state boat, who, at the time, was engaged with several employees, including claimant, in digging clay from a bank and loading it on to the boat, which negligence consisted in setting the claimant to work under the bank after the captain had loosened the overhanging earth so that it fell upon and injured the plaintiff, the State is not liable.
Loughlin v. State (N. Y.) 70

10. The captain of the boat, although he had power to direct those under him, was nevertheless a coservant, within the rule. Id.

11. Where the injury is one for which the master, if an individual, would not be liable, it is not one for which the State is liable under Laws 1870, chap. 321. Id.

12. Act of 1870, chap. 321, permitting claims for damages sustained from state canals, does not extend to damages from their navigation.
Rexford v. State (N. Y.) 762

13. Where the master of a canal boat, on the way to his boat, in climbing up a bridge by irons fixed therein, furnished by the State and serving as rungs of a ladder, was injured through a loose stone falling from the wall, held, the board of claims had jurisdiction of the claim for the damages. Id.

SUBROGATION.

1. An equitable right to subrogation cannot exist where it cannot be made out without resorting to some agreement void for usury.
Perkins v. Hall (N. Y.) 751

2. One paying off liens upon another's realty, and receiving a mortgage void for usury, is not entitled to subrogation. Id.

3. An executor paying out of his own money preferred debts of testator is entitled to be reimbursed out of funds of estate in the hands of a subsequent administrator appointed on his removal, in preference to an unpreferred claim against the executor, the estate being insolvent.

V. SALE.
  a. In General; Notice, etc.
  b. Validity; Vacating.
  c. Deed; Purchaser.
  d. Redemption.
BRIEFS AND NOTES.

I. IN GENERAL.

1. Laws 1880, chap. 542, as amended by Laws 1881, chap. 361, and Laws 1882, chap. 151, in regard to taxes, are free from constitutional objection and valid.
People v. Horn Silver Mining Co. (N. Y.) 220

2. Laws 1869, chap. 909, § 4, amended by Laws 1871, chap. 283, providing for the appropriation of taxes to payment of municipal bonds in aid of railroads, applies to any municipality which has such bonds outstanding.
Clark v. Sheldon (N. Y.) 923

3. It makes no difference as to the duty of the county treasurer that the taxes were not expressly collected or paid over to him for said purpose. Id.

4. Section 4 is not in conflict with the Constitution. Id.

5. It is no defense to a proceeding by a taxpayer to compel such application that the petition does not put the amount of taxes claimed to be applicable to that purpose high enough; the county treasurer may be compelled to set aside for a sinking fund all the taxes which may appear to have been paid to him for that purpose. Id.

6. Nor is it an answer to such proceeding that if the county treasurer should do so, there would be a deficiency in other funds. Id.

II. CORPORATIONS.

7. Where a corporation had filed its certificate of organization on the 23d of June, 1884, but no practical organization or subscription to stock had been made until the September following, when the company announced itself ready for business, an assessment of taxes upon the capital stock for the year commencing July 1, 1884, is invalid and void, under Act of March 3, 1877, governing assessment of taxes in District of Columbia.
Anglo-American Ins. Co. v. Dist. of Columbia (D. C.) 355

8. In reviewing an assessment against a railroad, the court below may consider reports of the company under oath, as a means of testing its earning capacity.
People v. Hicks (N. Y.) 739

9. A foreign corporation mining ore and manufacturing it into base bullion, in Utah, and partly refining it in Chicago, and not having or carrying on in New York any refining or manufacturing establishment, and only delivering within that State its bullion to the United States assay office to be further refined for compensation, is not exempt from taxation under Laws 1881, chap. 361. Peckham, J., dissents.
People v. Horn Silver Mining Co. (N. Y.) 220

10. Under Act 1881, § 3, it is not sufficient to exempt a corporation from taxation that it is a manufacturing corporation, but it must also carry on manufacture within the State. Id.

11. Where the principal officers of the corporation have their offices in New York City, its directors' meetings are held and its dividends declared and paid there, and, in addition thereto, a substantial part of the regular business of the corporation is continuously carried on there during the whole year, the corporation is brought within the Act of 1881, as "doing business within the State." Id.

12. In computing the taxes to be paid by a manufacturing company, its entire capital stock was properly taken as the basis of taxation. Id.

13. By Laws 1885, chap. 501, the basis of computing a tax under Act 1881, § 3, to be paid by a corporation, was fixed as the amount of capital stock employed within the State. Id.

14. Where a judgment was entered for the tax before the passage of the Act of 1885, defendant can have no benefit from its provisions authorizing the comptroller to adjust all accounts against a corporation for all taxes and penalties under the Act of 1881. Id.

III. ASSESSMENT.

15. Assessment for water rates, against vacant lots in Brooklyn, under the Laws 1859, chap. 396, § 24, held, illegal and void, the statute failing to provide for notice to the lot owners or opportunity to be heard. Finch and Andrews, JJ., dissent.
Remsen v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 691

16. Where vacant lots, belonging to minors, had been sold to enforce such illegal assessments, and a proceeding was had to enable the owners to sell a part of the land to pay off the incumbrance, and the purchaser paid to the city the amount of the outstanding illegal tax sale certificates on account of the purchase money, held, that while the money remained in possession of the city, an action was maintainable by the lot owners to compel the delivery thereof to them. Id.

17. Municipal assessment for permanent improvements upon land are apportionable between the life tenant and the remainderman; ordinary taxes of government are properly chargeable to the life tenant alone. Authorities cited.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 804

18. An assessment will be invalid if there is any material departure from the statutory form of oath to be taken by the assessors and attached to the assessment roll.
Shattuck v. Bascom (N. Y.) 87

19. The substitution of "hereof" for "of proof" in the clause "value of the said real estate has been changed by reason of proof produced before us" in the assessors' oath prescribed by Laws 1851, chap. 176, will render an assessment under that Act wholly void. Id.

20. In the absence of notice of the completion of the assessment roll, the fifteen days during which a certiorari may be applied for will not be set running.
People v. Hicks (N. Y.) 739

21. The object of the notice of delivery of the assessment roll is to set running the fifteen days within which a certiorari may be sued out; and the omission to do so is not fatal to the validity of the assessment.
People v. Assessors of Wilson & Somerset (N. Y.) 51

22. Delay in delivering to the town clerk the verified assessment roll, required to be delivered on or before the first day of September, by Laws 1880, chap. 269, § 9, which does not result in prejudice to one claiming to be aggrieved by the assessment, and which permits the roll to remain open for inspection in the hands of the clerk fifteen days after notice, does not vitiate the assessment. Id.

23. The court of appeals will rest upon the judgments of the courts below as to valuations for assessment.
People v. Hicks (N. Y.) 739

24. Pub. Laws 1884, p. 269, supplementary to the Act to Regulate Practice of Courts of Law, limiting allowance of certiorari to review tax assessment, to recover which any sale has been made by virtue of any special or local law, to six years from such sale, is not retroactive.
Hunt v. State (N. J.) 114

IV. COLLECTOR; PENALTIES.

25. The Act of 1872, chap. 329, providing that if any collector shall willfully detain taxes collected for six months, etc., he shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned, etc., is not in conflict with the Constitution of this State which abolishes imprisonment for debt.
State v. Nicholson (Md.) 415

26. It is not necessary to aver in the indictment against tax collector, under Act of 1872, chap. 329, that the money is still detained. The indictment is sufficient if it avers that defendant was collector of the state and county taxes for the county, and as such, collected the taxes for the year. Id.

27. Defendant is liable to the penalties imposed by Act of 1881, § 2, for neglecting to pay the taxes within the time specified therein.
People v. Horn Silver Mining Co. (N. Y.) 220

V. SALE.

a. In General; Notice, etc.

28. A notice of sale, etc., required by Laws

1843, art. 3, § 20, made out in July, 1868, to the person appearing as assessed on the assessor's book for 1867, must be taken to be a notice to the then last assessed owner of the premises.
People v. Cady (N. Y.) 296

29. The affidavit of service of notice of sale, etc., required by article 3, § 23, of said Act, need not state the fact of residence of person making the affidavit. Id.

30. An affidavit stating that said notice was served by "leaving the same with a member of the family of the person last assessed as owner, at his place of residence, No. 68 Fifth Avenue," held, a sufficient compliance with article 3, § 21, of said Act. Id.

31. A commissioner of deeds is authorized to take said affidavit of service, and where the venue of the affidavit is stated as "City and County of New York," and the certificate thereto is signed by a person as "commissioner of deeds," the presumption is that the person so signing is a commissioner of deeds within the place stated in the venue. Id.

32. An advertisement of sale of lots must be sufficient in description to warn the owner and direct the attention of others to the particular property to be sold.
Hunt v. State (N. J.) 114

33. Under Laws 1843, chap. 230, art. 3, § 8, in advertising lots lying contiguous to each other and belonging to the same person, in one parcel, to be sold for nonpayment of taxes in New York City, the name of the person in whose name as owner or occupant the lots are assessed is to be used.
People v. Cady (N. Y.) 296

34. An action to prevent the treasurer of Queens County from collecting from trust funds in his custody the fees allowed upon tax sales to the several towns in the county, without the audit of the town board, is maintainable by a taxpayer, under Laws 1881, chap. 531.
Warrin v. Baldwin (N. Y.) 768

b. Validity; Vacating.

35. When a tax sale is for the aggregate taxes of several years, the entire sale will be rendered invalid, if the tax for any one of the years included is invalid.
Shattuck v. Bascom (N. Y.) 87

36. In this case, held, the return of taxes was made too late in time and too defective in form to constitute a valid basis for the sale of land.
Vandermark v. Phillips (Pa.) 905

37. Sess. Laws 1855, chap. 427, §§ 83, 84, give no authority to an owner of lots sold for taxes either to make the demand that the comptroller cancel the sale, or, upon his refusal, to review that determination.
People v. Chapin (N. Y.) 251

38. The statutory power of the comptroller, when exercised under those sections, is for the benefit of the purchaser and cannot be invoked by the owner of the land sold. Id.

39. The comptroller can be required by mandamus to hear an application by a purchaser at a state tax sale, to cancel the sale and refund the purchase money, on the ground of illegality of tax. Id.

40. The comptroller's power to cancel such sales may be exercised when the invalidity depends upon extrinsic facts to be established by evidence. Id.

41. The comptroller has power to receive affidavits and to administer oath to witnesses produced before him, on such inquiry. Id.

c. Deed; Purchaser.

42. After a tax sale and comptroller's deed given therefor, the original owner executed to a third person a deed of the land, which was in reality a mortgage, and the grantee therein sued the holder of the comptroller's deed to remove the same as a cloud on title, which suit resulted in a judgment in favor of such holder, thereafter the plaintiff in that suit reconveyed the land to the original owner. Held, that the original owner was not estopped by said judgment, in the suit brought by his mortgagee, from afterwards questioning the validity of the comptroller's deed, in an action against him by the holder of such deed.
Shattuck v. Bascom (N. Y.) 87

43. The county commissioners can only convey by deed what they have previously sold by public sale, excepting, perhaps, a conveyance to the owner by way of redemption.
Kunes v. McCloskey (Pa.) 601

44. The deed is merely evidence of title. Id.

45. The purchaser has an inchoate title the moment the property is knocked down to him, which becomes perfect with the payment of the purchase money. Id.

46. When land embraced by a junior title is only in part included under an elder warrant, and the land embraced by each warrant is assessed as two distinct tracts for the same years as unseated, and sold at the same time to two different purchasers, the seniority of the title must be made the test of right between the two purchasers. Id.

d. Redemption.

47. During the period allowed for redemption from a tax sale, the equitable title is in the owner; the legal title is in the treasurer or commissioners. Id.

48. A sale of land for a term of years for nonpayment of taxes in New York City is not rendered void by the fact that the notice to redeem required the owner to pay the tax with interest from the date of sale; whereas, the purchaser did not pay his money upon such sale until some time thereafter.
People v. Cady (N. Y.) 296

49. After the time of redemption has expired an equity remains in the owner, sufficient to warrant the permitting of redemption at any time before a public sale to other parties. Id.

TRIAL.

I. BY COURT.
II. PRACTICE; MOTIONS; COUNSEL.
III. EVIDENCE; OBJECTIONS.
IV. INSTRUCTIONS.
V. JURY; VERDICT.
BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See EVIDENCE; JUDGMENT; NONSUIT; PLEADING; NEW TRIAL; WITNESS.

I. BY COURT.

1. An action by a stockholder of a bank against its directors to call them to account as trustees is triable by the court.

Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick (N. Y.) 711

2. Under Constitution, art 4. § 22, when a trial is conducted by less than the whole number of the judges of a circuit court, a party may have the question reserved for the three judges in banc; and this decision will be conclusive.

Costigin v. Bond (Md.) 395

3. The motion for a reservation must be entered during the sitting at which the decision is made. Id.

4. Where the motion is not so entered, the court in banc has no jurisdiction. Id.

5. The word "sitting" does not mean the term but only the time until the court adjourns for the day. Id.

II. PRACTICE; MOTIONS; COUNSEL.

6. Trial when the motion for a reference is made upon an affidavit of plaintiffs' attorney, and also upon the pleadings and the bills of particulars, the court can judge whether any account will be involved and no opposing affidavit is necessary.
Untermeyer v. Bernhauer (N. Y.) 709

7. On a motion for compulsory nonsuit, it is the duty of the court to deduce from plaintiff's evidence every reasonable inference of fact in his favor.
Jones v. Bland (Pa.) 859

8. Counsel can not argue to the jury against the instruction of the court.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Boyd (Md.) 485

9. Where a complaint is dismissed on the opening of counsel, all the facts referred to in his opening or offers of proof should be considered unless objection to proof of such additional facts is made on the specific ground that it is not admissible under the pleadings.
Clews v. Bank of N. Y. Nat. Bkg. Asso. (N. Y.) 275

III. EVIDENCE; OBJECTIONS.

10. Where an offer of evidence as a whole includes irrelevant evidence, it is proper to refuse the whole offer.
Heath v. Slocum (Pa.) 648

11. Where an offer of evidence contains several subjects the court is not bound to treat it piecemeal, admitting part and rejecting the rest.
Citizens & M. Sav. Bank v. Gillespie (Pa.) 528

12. Where the assumptions contained in a hypothetical question are not proved, the question is inadmissible.
Reber v. Herring (Pa.) 841

13. A general objection to evidence is sufficient where the evidence is inadmissible in its nature.
Tozer v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 339

14. An error in the admission of evidence is not cured by striking it from the record and instructing the jury to disregard it. Authorities cited. Dis. Op.
People v. Smith (Pa.) 220

15. It is too late, after prayers granted, to raise the objection that evidence was illegal.
Lamb v. Taylor (Md.) 377

IV. INSTRUCTIONS.

16. It is error to grant instructions to the jury which are not sufficiently definite and are calculated to mislead.
Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Boyd (Md.) 485

17. A misleading charge is good ground for reversal.
Reber v. Herring (Pa.) 841

18. A prayer to instruct the jury "that, on the pleadings and all the evidence in the cause, their verdict ought to be for the defendants," is too general, and should be rejected.
Shipley v. Shilling (Md.) 418

19. A charge which is not an adequate presentation of the case to the jury is erroneous.
Reber v. Herring (Pa.) 841

20. If a request to charge be not supported by any evidence, the court may refuse it.
Humphreys v. Woodstown (N. J.) 109

21. The charge of the court, or refusal to charge, can be assigned for error only when the party is injured by the ruling. Id.

22. Mere technical error in the charge of the court is not ground for reversal.
Boswell v. Collins (Pa.) 487

V. JURY; VERDICT.

23. To authorize the judge to take from the jury the question of fraudulent intent arising upon the extrinsic facts and direct a verdict, the evidence must be undisputed.

  BRIEFS AND NOTES.

See ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS, 7–10; CEMETERIES; DEVISE AND LEGACY, IV.

I. CREATION; EXPRESS; IN GENERAL.

1. A deed of land in trust to sell and convey the same and invest the proceeds, and pay the income thereof to grantor's wife during life for her support and that of her children, created a valid power in trust to convert the land into money and invest the proceeds in securities in which the wife was to have a life estate only.
Nearpass v. Newman (N. Y.) 764

2. The reversionary interest in the land remained in the creator of the trust. Id.

3. The limitations and conditions of the trust followed the property into which the estate was converted. Id.

4. A subsequent agreement and quitclaim deed by the said grantor to the trustee were intended as security for the performance of grantor's agreement, and the grantor retained a reversionary interest. Id.

5. A subsequent conveyance by such trustee to a substituted trustee reconstituted the property a trust fund. Id.

6. By one clause of his will a father devised his residuary estate to his daughter, "to have and hold the same, unto her heirs and assigns forever," and in a following clause committed to her the guardianship of his grandchild, the child of a deceased daughter, with the words: "I enjoin upon her to make such provision for such grandchild out of my residuary estate now in her hands, in such manner, at such times, and in such amounts as she may judge to be conducive to the welfare of such grandchild and her own sense of justice and Christian duty should dictate." Held, such provision is not ground for a complaint by the general guardian of the grandchild to have a trust declared in her favor.
Lawrence v. Cooke (N. Y.) 101

7. A deed to A in trust for certain infants, with power to sell or mortgage without the appointment of a guardian, and granting the land, etc., to the party of the second part, and "to their heirs and assigns forever," etc., creates a valid general trust power wholly for benefit of the infants; and mortgages by A to third parties to secure her husband's debts are not a valid execution of the power and are void.
Syracuse Sav. Bank v. Holden (N. Y.) 706

8. A land patent is granted to the persons who are entitled and who have paid, and if another procures the patent he takes as trustee.
Kulp v. Bird (Pa.) 576

II. RESULTING.

9. A resulting trust can arise only when title has been obtained by fraud or purchased with the money of another.
Brickell v. Earley (Pa.) 520

10. The proof to establish a parol trust must in all particulars be clear and specific. Id.

11. A resulting trust in lands may be proved by parol.
Jackson's Appeal (Pa.) 850

12. Payment of purchase money, possession, and improvements by the cestui que trust, and declarations of the alleged trustee are evidence to prove a resulting trust. Id.

13. The Statute of Limitations is no bar to an action to establish a resulting trust where the cestui que trust continues in possession. Id.

14. When the cestui que trust occupies the land, the presumptions are wholly against the trustee. Id.

15. The court of common pleas may entertain a bill to establish a trust in lands situate in another county, when the parties are within its jurisdiction.

Jackson's Appeal (Pa.) 350

III. TRUSTEES.

a. Management of Trust, etc.

16. Where there has been an unauthorised payment of funds held in a fiduciary capacity, the loss must fall upon him who makes the payment.
Owings v. Rhodes (Md.) 407

17. A trustee paying an infant, without the sanction of the court, may be compelled to pay again to the infant when he comes of age.
Rogers v. Traphagen (N. J.) 476

18. Where the account is small, for the purpose of saving taking out letters of guardianship, the court will sometimes direct payment to a relative of the infant. Authorities cited. Id. 478

19. Where a trust fund was misappropriated by a trustee before his assignment as an insolvent debtor, it is not entitled to preference in payment from funds in assignees hands.
Cavin v. Gleason (Pa.) 285

20. The court may order trust property included in assignment for benefit of creditors to be restored to the trust; but to follow such funds they must be identified. Id.

21. A sale of real estate, under a power created by a will, should not be set aside, if the trustee has exercised care and caution, and has obtained a good price. Authorities cited.
Bleakley v. Bleakley (Md.) 395

22. Lands lying about ten miles from Baltimore, and surrounded by lands used for farming purposes, may properly be sold as a farm by the trustee. Id.

23. A petition by one not entitled to come in as complainant, filed in a suit terminated fifteen years before, against one not a party to, and who has not been appointed trustee in, the suit, and who has no court funds in his hands, charging him to be a self constituted trustee of certain funds in his hands, cannot be maintained, to make him account for his misdoings in regard to such funds, and to bring them into court for distribution, the suit having been instituted for an entirely different purpose.
Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

24. A fund held in trust under a will, and directed by a decree of the orphans' court "to be paid to defendant, to be applied to his personal support and maintenance, or in his discretion to the support and education of any children he may have, so as the same shall not be in any manner assignable or anticipated, nor liable to his debts or liabilities, or that the trustee may, if thought needful by him, apply the fund in like manner for the benefit of the said defendant and any of his children," is not attachable.
Prentice v. Pleasonton (Pa.) 484

b. Rights; Liabilities; Accounting; Commissions.

25. When, at the time of an assignment of all of her real estate by an aged person of weak mind, the persons to whom it was made held a power of attorney from her enabling them to take charge of her affairs, and had obtained from her absolute possession of all her estate, they were trustees for her; and the law will hold them to the strictest account for the property, and the assignment will be held void.
Morton's Admr. v. Morton (N. J.) 134

26. When the duties imposed upon the executors are active, they will be deemed trustees for the performance thereof, to the same extent as though declared to be so by the most explicit language.
Ward v. Ward (N. Y.) 67

27. Where a trust is devolved upon executors by will, an error in the executors' account may be corrected by the orphans' court in their subsequent accounts as trustees.
Griggs v. Shaw (N. J.) 472

28. A trustee inexcusably delaying accounting for trust money, and using it as his own, will be charged with interest.
Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

29. When the trustee is the husband of the cestui que trust, nothing short of clear and satisfactory proof will establish that the obligation of the former to the latter has been discharged or forgiven.
Rusling v. Rusling's Exrs. (N. J.) 129

30. The Statute of Limitations is not a bar to such trusts. Id.

31. A trustee can not be protected from accounting because of the lapse of time, or because he has kept no accounts, or has seen fit to appropriate and claim all the trust estate as his own.
Reeves v. Beekman (N. J.) 453

32. Where the auditor appointed to audit the account of a trustee refuses, for lack of vouchers, to allow certain credits claimed, finds numerous evidences of mismanagement through lack of business qualifications on the part of the trustee, but not through dishonesty, and accordingly reduces the trustee's commissions to the amount due him upon the business properly done, some of the exceptions to the account being dismissed and some sustained, it is not error to decree as to costs that they be divided between the estate and the accountant.
Kilgore's Appeal (Pa.) 201

33. The commissions of a trustee appointed by the circuit court are not a matter of right in the absence of a provision therefor made in the decree.
Rappanier v. Bannon (Md.) 420

34. An agreement upon a trustee's third accounting that he should receive 5 per cent commission on gross receipts of estate and that it should cover his second accounting, held, it was improper to allow him 3 per cent additional commission upon income upon which he had been allowed 2 per cent commission in first account.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER. See DEED; EASEMENT; EJECTMENT; FRAUDS; STATUTE OF; SALE; SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Where the consideration for the sale of land is the conveyance of other lands by vendee to a third person, and the latter deed is duly executed and delivered, the promise of the third person to the vendor: to pay him a certain sum as the consideration for the conveyance of the latter land, is not within the Statute of Frauds, and need not be in writing.

Freed v. Richey (Pa.) 153

2. The owner of two adjoining city lots, Nos. 141 and 143, conveyed lot No. 143 to defendant's grantor, by metes and bounds, as being twenty-two feet wide, "with the buildings and improvements thereon," "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging." The house on the lot conveyed extended beyond the line called for by the deed five feet on lot No. 141 on the east, up to the west wall of a building thereon, used as the east wall of the house, the greater part of which was on the land conveyed, but was not used as a party wall. The original grantor being still the owner of lot No. 141 brought ejectment for the said five feet of lot No 141. Held, said deed conveyed only that part of the house which is on the land described therein, and that no easement exists for the extension of the house upon the land not conveyed.
Griffiths v. Morrison (N. Y.) 773

3. The vendor is regarded as trustee of the land for the purchaser, and the purchaser as the trustee of the purchase money.
Bostwick v. Beach (N. Y.) 667

4. Where a decree is sought to be opened to let in defendant to claim interest on the purchase money, plaintiff should be let in to prove damages for deteriorations. Id.

5. The modified decree should provide for interest and damages. Id.

6. The vendee, having obtained a decree for specific performance, may be allowed the damages sustained during the pendency of the suit, by deterioration from waste committed by defendant. Id.

7. Bona fide purchasers, by virtue of a judicial sale of real property, obliged to yield their title to a superior title, are entitled to value of improvements.
Gittings v. Worthington (Md.) 442

8. A vendor in good faith is not responsible for his title, beyond his covenants. Id.

9. If a person in peaceable possession under claim of lawful title, but really under a defective title, makes in good faith permanent improvements, the true owner, who seeks the aid of equity to establish his own title, will be compelled to reimburse the occupant for his expenditure.
Thomas v. Evans (N. Y.) 800

10. Evidence that an amicable ejectment between vendor and vendee was for the purpose of hindering a judgment creditor of vendee from reaching the property, and that the payments of rent by vendee were to apply on the purchase money, should have been submitted to the jury; and if such intent was found to exist, the transaction would be void.
Miles v. Lewis (Pa.) 862

11. Vendee's testimony as to such intent was not incompetent. Id.

12. A vendor, upon vendee's request, may bring ejectment, take confession of judgment to be released on payment of sum due by vendee at stipulated time, and upon vendee's failure to perform condition, issue execution and recover possession of the land. Authorities cited. Id. 865

See CANALS; WHARVES.

1. The natural flow of water from a higher to a lower lot cannot, as a general rule, give a cause of action to one injured thereby.
Sowers v. Lowe (Pa.) 145

2. Plaintiff and defendant owned adjacent lots. Plaintiff's house was close to the line; defendant's thirty-two feet from it. The intervening space was sandy, and sloped from defendant's house to plaintiff's. Plaintiff's cellar was always dry until defendant changed the spouting which had formerly discharged into the street the water from defendant's house, and turned the spouts upon the space between the houses. The water then percolated through the sand, and plaintiff's cellar became damp, and the house was damaged. Held, that plaintiff had no right of action against defendant for the damages thus caused. Id.

3. A judgment recovered by a lower against an upper riparian owner, for diminishing the natural flow of the stream and polluting it by mine drainage is, in a subsequent action for a continuance of the same acts, conclusive evidence that defendant has no right to divert the stream.

1. Whether the dedication of a street is complete, as against the owners of the soil, is one for the jury; but where the facts are undisputed, it is a question of law.
Kennedy v. Cumberland (Md.) 409

2. The fact that vacant land within the city limits, laid out by the owner into lots and streets, is assessed by the city as "S's Addition," is of no weight in determining this question of acceptance. Id.

3. The acceptance by the City of Cumberland of its amended Charter of 1848 did not operate as an acceptance of streets previously laid out within the city limits, and dedicated to the public by the owners. Id.

4. An uninterrupted use of a street by the public for at least twenty years is necessary to establish a public highway by user. Authorities cited. Id. 412

15. The measure of damages is the difference in the market value of the property before the change in the immediately adjoining property and the market value after the change of grade in front of the property, with interest on the principal sum to date.

Freemansburg v. Rodgers (Pa.) 828

16. An assent by plaintiff when he was not the owner of the property will not bind him after he becomes such owner. Id.

17. On appeal to the common pleas from a report of viewers assessing damages for a change of grade of street, the opinion of the viewers that the change was a damage, after having testified to an acquaintance with the value of such property that they had viewed the premises, is admissible. Id.

18. The cause of action for damages accrues at time of physical change of grade of street. Id.

IV. ENCROACHMENTS; TITLE TO FEE.

19. Encroachments on a highway cannot be legalized by lapse of time. Authorities cited.

Humphreys v. Woodstown (N. J.) 114

20. An acquired public right to any part of a road cannot be lost by negligence of public officers. Authorities cited. Id.

21. The owner of a tract of land, on a plat of which a street was designated, but not then opened, conveyed a portion by a deed binding on west side of such street. Thereafter such street was closed by the public authorities with the acquiescence of the then holder of the abutting lot conveyed by said deed. Held, said deed did not convey fee in roadbed of such street, and that grantor was entitled to recover possession of the roadbed to the center.

WHARVES.

1. When the State, by the Act of 1813, granted to the City of New York wharf rights, it granted property in the land covered by the wharf; and an easement for approach of vessels to its front; and that easement the State could not destroy without compensation.

Williams v. Mayor of New York (N. Y.) 801

2. The Act of 1857, settling the bulkhead lines for the Port of New York, authorized the city to fill up and occupy the open space between the new line and the land; and such filling would give the new made land to the city. Id.

3. The State did, by its earlier Acts and their recognition in 1857, permit solid filling on its lands under water within the bulkhead lines, and by that process part with its title and transfer it to him who lawfully made the new land as an approach to the docks. Id.

4. When the city, being owner of the upland in front of which the harbor commissioners' line had been established under Act of 1857, made a deed to private individuals of "All that certain water lot or vacant ground and soil under water to be made land and gained out of the Hudson or North River or harbor of New York, and so much thereof as has already been made and gained," etc., together with the "estate, right, title and interest" that the city "may have or may lawfully claim in the premises conveyed," such deed conveyed the right to make and own a solid filling between an old wharf and a new one on the new line, and an easement, as against the State, for the approach of vessels over the land of the State under water in front of the harbor commissioners' line. Id.

5. It is not the effect of the Acts of the Legislature to convey to private proprietors all land belonging to the State between the land of such proprietors and the new bulkhead line.

Williams v. Mayor of New York (N. Y.) 301

6. When a private owner's land and wharf right will be taken away and destroyed by the new extension line and structures of the dock department of the City of New York, he is entitled to adequate compensation. Id.

7. Where parties make a special agreement as to the mode of delivery of a shipment of sugar and fix the amount which the owner or consignee should pay for wharfinger's charges, the agreement is valid and binding on such owner and consignee.

Woodruff v. Havemeyer (N. Y.) 776

8. The wharf owners are entitled to enforce the contract and recover wharfinger's charges. Id.

9. Laws 1872, chap. 320, not construed to prevent private wharf owner from entering into a contract for the landing and deposit of goods upon his wharf, upon such terms as may be agreed upon between himself and the owner of the goods. Id.

WILL. See DEVISE AND LEGACY; DOWER; EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

1. It appearing that testatrix, aged about seventy-seven years of age, was of testamentary capacity and free from undue influence, a will by her, disposing of her property differently than she had done in a former will, should be admitted to probate.

Miller v. Van Dyk (N. J.) 473

2. The question of testamentary capacity is for the jury.

Pennypacker v. Pennypacker (Pa.) 532

3. If, at the making of the will, testator was sound in mind, it is immaterial that he was unsound before or after. Id.

4. The burden of proving mental unsoundness is upon alleging party. Id.

5. If general or habitual unsoundness of mind be shown previous to the will, the burden of proving a lucid interval or restoration to sanity, at the time, is in turn thrown upon those who allege it. Id.

6. The presence of testator's brother and a nephew at the making of his will in which they are legatees, does not raise a presumption of undue influence. Id.

7. A will and codicil are to be construed as one instrument.

Ward v. Ward (N. Y.) 67

8. A father devised his property to his several children, giving a certain farm to his son G. After the making of the will, G. misbehaved himself, and the testator made a codicil whereby "for certain reasons" he revoked the gift to G. and gave him an annuity of one hundred dollars. Both the will and codicil were duly executed. Thereafter testator altered the word "one" in the amount of the annuity in the codicil to "two," and made a memorandum that he wished G to have "two hundred instead of one, as per codicil." The will and codicil were both admitted to probate, the latter in the condition in which it was before the alteration. Held, that the codicil, as well as the will, was properly admitted to probate.

Conover v. Conover (N. J.) 136

9. The latter part of a will varying from the former part controls.
